TO THE HIGH AND MIGHTY

Prince I AMES, by the grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland;

Defendor of the Faith, &c.

T may of some, and not without just cause (most gracious and dread Souereigne) be imputed vnto me for no small presumption, to present vnto your toyall Majesty (a Prince of so great learning and judgement) these homely fruits of mine endeuors and paines, taken in the Generall History of the Turks, and strange successes of theingreat and mightly Othoman Empires. Wheredunto for all that I was the rather induced, not only by the rate and wondestull clemencies judyned was of your heroiograu and most respleadons because of your heroiograu and most respleadons because call midde the leaft whereof is sufficient to have cheared vp.my weake and feeble spirits; but allowy the encouragement of the right Whethipfull my most especiall good friend Sir Peter, Man mood Knight of the Bath, the first uniquer of me to take this great worke in hand, and my continuall and onely comfort, stay, and helper therein. Which to do, I was also the more desirous, seeing divers little volumes, and small parts of the History presented vnto the greatest Princes: as the little Treatile of Paulus Jou de Rebus Turcicis, dedicated vnto the great and mighty Emperour Charles the fifth; and the small History of Calius Secundus, de Bello Melitens, vnto her late facred Majesty, of most happy and blessed memory, the rare Phoenix of her sex, who now refleth in glory with differs others of like fort by the learned Authours thereofstill commended, some to one great Prince of their times, some to others: all filling me with good hope that this whole and continuate History of that Northerne and war like Nation (which in More time by God his appointment hath brought such fatall mutations upon a great part of the World, as former times have seldome or neuer seene) drawne even from the first beginning therof (not together to my knowledge by my one before written) should with your most noble Majesty find no lesse grace and fauour, than hath almost every part thereof with other the aforesaid and such like most mighty and famous Princes : and the rather, for that your Majesty hath not disdained in your Lepanto or Heroicall Song, with your learned Muse to adore and set forth the greatest and most glorious victory that ever was by any the Christian confederate Princes obtained against these the Othoman Kings or Emperors. Besides that, the matter and argument of this History and such like (so much concerning the state and good of the Christian Commonweale in generall, neuer by any so much impugned or indangered, as by these the naturall and capitall enemies thereof) of right vinto none so properly belongeth, as vinto your most excellent Majesty, with the rest of the Christian Princes, sitting at the helme of your estates; who onely by your vnited forces) the barbarous enemies greatest terror) are able to give remedy thereunto: in the chiefelt ranke of whom, your facred Majelty, for glory, honour, itrength, and power (Godlong preserve the same) is now second vnto none. Thus persuaded and encouraged, I in all humble and dutifull manner do present unto your Majesty these my weake endeauors, according to my ability and meanes continued for some few yeares more: which how vnworthy soeuer they be of so great and Princely fauour, as well for the meannesse of me the Author, as for the plainnesse of the stile; yet if for the worthinesse of the matter, or of your own great and infinit clemency, you vouchsafe them your Majesties sauourable regard, they shall no doubt live no lesse fortunate, than if they had beene more happily borne or brought to light: serving (1f to no other vse) yet as faire warnings vnio such great ones as God hath here vpon earth exalted about the rest vnto the highest degrees of power and of state, for the good government and desence of his church and people. Accept them, I beseech you, most mighty Monarch, into your gratious protection, so shall I (if God spare life) be comforted and encouraged vinder so mighty a fauour to proceed to amend what shall be found amisse, and adde what future times and better helpe shall discouer and minister wato m for the perfection of this Hiftory : and according to my bounden duty incessarily in all humis lity pray unto the great God of all might and power (by whomall Kings and Pring ces reigne) to his glory long to preserue your most royali Majesty in blessed health and peace, to rule and reigne ouer vs and there your great kingdomes, to happily by you vnited and to like wife (his will so being) your most noble posterity

The Authors induction to the Christian Reader, vnto the Historie following.

Me Down He long and still declining state of the Christian Commonweale, with the viter ruine and subuersion of the Empire of the East, and many other most glorious Kingdomes and Provinces of the Christians, never to be sufficiently lamented, might with the due consideration thereof worthily moone cuen a right stony hourt to ruth : but therwith also to call to remembrance the different done wato the bleffed name of our Saujour Christ Iefus, the desolation of his Church here militant upon earth, the dreadfull danger dayly threatned unto the poore remainder thereof, the millions of foules caft headlong into eternall destruction, the infinite number of wofull Christians (whose grieuom groanings under the heavy yoke of infidelity no tongue is able to expresse) with the carelesnesse of the Great for the redress thereof, might give just causato any good Christian to sit downe, and with the heavy Prophet to fay as he didof lerufalem: O how hath the Lord darkned the daughter of Sion in his wrath! Lamen. Ieres and cast downe from heaven vnto the earth the beauty of Israel, and remembred not his foor. my, cap. 13. Roole in the day of his wrath! All which miferies (with many others fo great as oreater can none be) the Prince of darkenesse and author of all mischiefe hath by the persecuting Princes of all ages, and antient bereticks his minifers, labored from time to time to bring upon the Church of God, to the obscuring of his bleffed name and weter subver sion of his most facred word; but yet by none, no not by them all together so much preuasted, as by the fulfe Prophet Mahomet, borne in an unhappy houre so the great destruction of mankind: whose most groffe and blasphemous doctrine first fantasied by himselfe in Arabia, and So by him oberaded wnie the World, and afterwards by the Sarafin Caliphes (bu feduced successors) with greater forces, maintained, was by them, together with their Empire, diferfed ouer a great part of the face of the earth to the unipeakeable ruing and destruction of the Christian Religion and State: especialthen Asia and Africke, with some good part of Enrope also. But the writy of this great Alahometan Monarchy being once diffolued, and individed into many Kingdomes, and fo after the manner of worldly things drawing onto the fatall period of it felfe, in processe of time became of farre lesse force than before, and so leffe dreadfull water the Christian Princes of the thest, by whom these Sarafins were againe expalsed Grando in out of all the parts of Europe, excepting one corner of Spaine, which they yet held within the remembrance Spain was reone of all the parts of Europe, excepting one out of spatia, which they be removed alfo, af- courted from of our fathers, whill that by their victorious forces, they were thence at length happily removed alfo, af- courted from ter that they had poffeffed the fame about the pace of you yeares. In this declination of the Sarafins, the King Perdifirst Champions of the Mahometan superstition (who though they had lost much yet held they many king - nand in the domes both in Assault and Africke, taken for the many part from the Christians) arise the Turks, an obscure years, 1491. and base people, before scarce knowne when the World yet fierce and couragious, who by their walour first aspired onto the Kingdame of Persia, with dinercother large provinces : from whence they were about 170 yeares after againe expulsed by the Tarams, and enforced to retire them selves into the leffer Asia: where taking the benefit of the discord of the Christian Princes of the East, and the earetefacffe of the Christians in generall they in some good measure repaired their former losses againe, and maintained the flate of a kingdome at Iconium in Cilivia (now of chom called Caramamia) holding in their subjection the greatest part of that fruitfall country still feeking to gaine from the Christians what they had before loft unto the Tarters. Rut chan Rong dome of the Turks declining alfo, by the difmembring of the fame, there Steps up among the Tarkson Bythinia, one Ofman or Othoman, of the Oguzian solbe or family, a man of great spirit and valor, who by little and little growing up among st the rest of his countrymen, and other the effemings Christians enthat fide af Afia, at last like another Romulus, tooke upon him the name of a Sultanor King, and is right worthily accounted the first founder of the mighty Empire of the Turks: which continued by many discents directly in the line of himselfe, even unto Achimat, who now reigneth, is from a small beginning become the greatest terrour of the World; and holding in subjection many great and mighty Kingdomes in Afia, Europe, and Africke is growne to that height of pride as that it threatnest destruction unto the rest of the Kingdomes of the earth abouring with nothing more than with the weight of it felfe. In the greatnesse whereof is swallowed up both the name and Empire of the Sarafins, the glorious Empire of the Greekes, the renowned Kingdomes of Macedonia, Peloponefua. Epirus, Bulgaria, Scania, Bosna, Armenia, Cyprus, Syria, Bgypt, Iudea, Tunes, Algiers, Media, Mesopotemia, with a great part of Hungary, as also of the Persian Kingdome, and all those churches and places Comuch foken of in holy Scripture (the Romans only excepted:) and in briefe to much of Christendome as farre exceedeth that which is at this day left. So that at this prefint if you confider the beginning, progreffe and perpetuall felicity of this the Ochoman Empire, there is in this World nothing more admerable and strange; if the creatnesse and lustre thereof, nothing more magnificent or glorious, if the power and firength thereof, nothing more dieadfull or dangerous : which wondering at nothing but at the beauty of it felfe, and drunke with the pleasant wine of perpetuall felicity, holdeth all the rest of the World in fcorne, thundring out nothing but fiell bloud andwar, with a full per fuation in time to rule ouer all, prefining unto it felfe no other limits than the uttermost bounds of the earth, from the rifing of the Sun unto the going downe of the same. The causes whereof are many and right lamentable, but for the most part To Thut up in the counsels of the great, as that for meto feek mafter them were great folly : yet among It the reft, some others there be, so pregnant and manifest, as that the blinde World taket b thereof as it were a generall knowledge, and may therefore without offence of the wifer fort (as I hope) enen in thefe our nice dries be lightly touched. Whereof the first and greatest, is the just and secret indeement of the Almighing. who in justice deliveresh into the hands of these mercilesse miscreants, nation after nation; and King dome upon King dome, as unto the most verrible executioner of his dreadfull wrath to be punished for their fins : others in the meanewhile, no leffe finfull than they, in his mercy enjoying the benefit of a longer time calling them unto repentance. I ben, the uncertainety of Worldly things, which subject to perpetuall change cannot long flag in one flate, but as the fea it with the wind, fo are they in like fort toffed up and downe with the continual furges and waves of alteration and change : fo that being once growne to their beight, they there flay not long; but fall againe as fast as ener they rise, and so intime come to nothing? as we fee the greatest monarchies that ever yet were upon earth have done, their course being run court whom I ime now triumpheth, as no doubt at length it Shall over this fo great a Monarchy allo, when it shall but then live by fame, withe others now do. Next to thefe causes from above (without offence be it faid) is the small care the Christian Princes especially those that dwelt further off have had of the common state of the Christian common weale, whereof even the very greatest areto account themselves but as the print cipall members of one and the same body, and have or one ht to have as sharpe a feeling one of anothers harmes, as hath the head of the wrongs done wnto the feet, or rather as if it were done with them clues? in stead of which Christian compassion and vnity, they have ever, and even yet at this time are fo distilled among themselves with endlesse quarrels, partly for questions of Religion (never by the food to be determined) partly for matters touching their owne proper flate and louereigney, and that with fuch distrible and implacable hatred, that they never sould as yet (although it hash beene long willed) joyne their common forces against the common enemy but turning their weapons one opon monther (the more to be lamented) have from time to time weakned themselves, and opened what for him to devoure them one after another : whereas with their combined forces (the green enounts greates terrour) the might long fince not only have repressed his fury, and abated this prode, but mish finall damper, and which flory (God fauouring their fo bonourable attempts) have now precovered from him most of those three frian Kingdomes, which lie by force of aimst all rights boldet hat this day in most mistrable subjection and thraldome: many millions of the poore oppressed Shriftians to the meane time out of the furnace of the bulation in the auguish of their foules crying in vaine vmertier Christian wether for bediefer By Elwill discord the noble country of Gracia perished, when do the faither his line against the lon and the for against the father, and brother against brother, they so she was wall destribetion of themselves called in the Turke, who like a greedy Lyon bushing in binden lay in wait for show all So perilbed he Kingdomes of Bulgaria, Seruia, Bofna, and Approximately be finited thanks of who about is and Coppen, bettated as it were by the Christian Princes when neighbours by whom they might bring the fill feel velithed. So the most flourishing and strong Kingdomd of Hungary Din she religion whereof the forther of the Turkish Empire bath longer flucks, than in the conquest of any other Kinedome, by it actempted whatfocuer) divided in it felfe by the ambition of Princes, and thuild differ of the weaker fill calling wife

his aid the mighty power of the Twoke, is long fince for the most part become vato him aprey the poore remainders theref being at this day hardly defended by the forces of the Christian Emperonr, and of the Princes his Confederats, Coldometimes meeting together with fuch cheerfulneffe or expedition as the necelitie of lo great a matter requireth. Unto which fogreat a cause of the Common decay, may bee added the entil choice of our foldiers employed in those wars who taken up hand over head out of the promiseuous common people, are for most part votrainedmen, serving rather for shew and the filling up of number, than for wee and in no respect to be compared with the Turks Iani Zaries, and other his most expert souldiers, continually even from their youth exercifed in feats of Armes. Not to peake in the meane time of the want of the antient Martiall discipline, the wholesome preservation of most pursant Armics : which breedeth in the proud Enemy acontempt of the Christian forces with a full persuasion of himselfe, That he is not by such disordered and weake means to be withstood. But to come never whiche causes of the Turks oreatnesse, and more proper unto themselves, as not depending of the improvident carelesneffe, weakeneffe, discord, and imperfections of others : First, In them is to be noted an ardent and instnite defire of foueraignty, wherewith they have long fince promifed unto themselves the Monarchie of the whole world, a quicke motive to their haughty designes. Then, such arare white and agreement among st them, as well in the manner of their Religion (if it be foto bee called) as in matters concerning their State (especially in all their enterprises to be taken in hand for the augmenting of their Empire) as that therofthey call themselves Islami, that is to say, Men of one minde, or as peace among st themselves; Sothat it is not to bee maruelled, if thereby they grow strong themselues, and dreadfull worte others. loyne unto this their courage, conceined by the wonderfull successe of their perpetual fortune . Their notable vigilancie, in taking the advantage of every occasion for the inlarging of their Monarchie. Their frugalitie and temperatenesse in their dyet and other manner of living , their carefull observing of their antient Military Discipline, their cheerefull and almost incredible obedience unto their Princes and Sultans ; such, as in that point no Nation in the world was to be worthily compared unto them. All great causes why their Empire hath so mightily increased, and so long continued. Whereunto may bee added the two strongest sinewes of enery well gouerned Commonwealth, Reward propounded to the good, and Punishment threatned unto the offender, where the prize u for vertue and valour fet up, and the way layd open for every common person, be he never so meanly borne, to aspire unto the greatest honours and preferments both of the Court and of the Field yeacuen unto the neerest affinitie of the great Sultan himselfe, if his valor or other worth shall so descrue when as on the contrary part the disloyall or cowardly to to expect from the same souer aign power nothing but disgrace death, and torture, And yet these great ones, not contented by Such commendable and lawfull means Itill to extend or establish their far spreading Empire, if that point once come in question, they sticke not in their denillists policie to breake and infringe the Lawes both of Nations and Nature. Their leagues, grounded upon the Law of Nations, be they with neuer so strong capitulations concluded, or solemnity of oath confirmed, have with them no longer force than flandeth with their owne profit, feruing indeed but as foures to intangle other Princes in ontil they have fingled out him whom they purpofe to devoure the rest fast bound by their leagues, still looking on, as if their ownerurne should never come, yet with no more affurance of their safety by their leagues, than had the other whom they see perish before their faces. As for the kind law of nature, what can be thereun. to more contrary than for the father most unnaturally to embrue his hands in the bloud of his own chil. dren? and the brother to become the bloudy executioner of his owne brother? a common matter among the Othoman Emperours. All which most execrable and inhumane murthers, they couer with the pretended safety of their State, as thereby freed from the feare of all aspiring competitors (the greatest torment of the mighty) and by the preservation of the integritic of their Empire, which they therely keep whole and entire unto themselves, and so their it as it were by hand from one to another, in no part dismembred or impaired. By these and such like means is this barbarous Empire (of almost nothing) growne to that height of maiefly and power, as that it hath in contempt all the reft, being it felfe not inferiour in greatneffe and strength unto the greatest Monarchies that ever yet were upon the face of the earth, the Romane Empire only excepted. Which how farre it shall yet further fread none knoweth, but hee that holdeth in his hand all the Kingdomes of the earth, and with his word boundeth in the raging of the sea, so that it cannot further passe. Moucd with the greatnesse and glory of this so mighty and dreadfull an Empire, growne for the most part out of the ruine of the Christian Commonweale, with the veter subversion of many great and flourishing Kingdomes, and wofull fall of many morigh; puissant and mighty Princes, not without griefe to be remembred; I long since (as many others have) entred into the heavy consideration thereof, purposing fo to have contented my selfe with a light vice of that which might well bee for ever of all good Christians lamented; but hardly or never remsdied; contilithat afterwards led with a more ernest desire to know the strange and stall mutations by this bar, have us nation in former time brought upon a great part of the world, as also so much as I might to see so great a terror of the present time, and in what terms it standed with the rest, what with long search and much labor, must with some pleasure and myne own reasonable contentness, passed through the whole metanchy course of their tragical history; yet wishout purpose ever to have commended the same, or any partitions to the remembrance of posteritie; as deeming it an argument of too high a reach, and fister for some more happy wit better farnished with such helps both of nature and are as are requisit for the undertaking of sogreat a charge, than was my selfe, of many thousands the meanest. Being not unmindefull also of that which the Poet (keeping Decorum) sath in the like case, though farre lesse matter, of himselfe.

Cum cancrem Reges & prælia, Cynthius aurem Velit, & admonuit: Pastorem Titterepingues Pascere oportet oues, deductum ducere carmen,

When I did sing of mighty Kings, or else of bloudy War, Apollo pluckt me by the care, and said twent too far: Beseems a Shepheard Titterus, his sattings for to feed, And for to sit his rurall song wato his stender reed,

Besides that, so many difficulties even at the first presented themselves unto my view, as to overcome the fame, if I should take the labour in hand, siemed to mee almost impossible : for beside the sea and world of matter I was to paffe through (requiring both great labor and time) full of the most rare example both of the better and worse fortune in men of all sort & condition, yeelding more pleasure unto the reader, than facilitie to the writer : I faw not any among fo many as had had taken this argument in hand, whome I mught as a sure guid or Load star long follow in the course of this sugreat an history (many right worthy and learned men (whose memory my soul honoureth) contenting themselves to have with their learned pens involled in the records of neuer-dying fame, some, one great expedition or action, some another, as in their time it fell out : yea, the Turkish histories and Chronicles themselves (from whom the greatest light for the continuation of the History was in reason to have bin expected) being in the declaration of their own affairs (according to their barbarous maner) so sparing and short that they may of right be accounted rather short rude notes, than iust Histories ; rather pointing things out than declaring the same, and that with such obscurities by changing the antient and vouall names, as well of whole Kingdoms, Countries and Prouinces, as of Cities, Townes, Rivers, Mountaines, and other places, yea and oftentimes Menthemfelues into other frange and barbarow names of their owne denifing; in such fort as might well ftay an intentine Read r, and deprine him of the pleasure, together with the profit he might otherwise expect by the reading therof; whereunto to give order, perspicuitie, and light, would require no small travaile and fine: (Not to firake in the meane time of the diversitie of reports in the course of the whole History, fuch as is oftent mes most hard, if not altogether impossible to reconcile.) Notwithstanding all which defficulties, with many others more proper unto my felfe, having with long labour and diligent fearch p. fled through the course of the whole History, and so in some reasonable fort satisfied my selfe therein, I thought it not amiffe, as well for the worthineffe of the matter, as for the zeale I beare unto the Christian Commonwealth, and for the satisfying also of some others my good Friends very desirous of the same, to make proofe : fout of the dispersed Worker of the gright worthy men, I could set downe one or-derly and continuate History of this so mighty an Empire, with the great and fatall mutation, or rather Subuction of many right strong and slourishing Kingdomes and States (the proper worke of all mighty Empires, fill enercafing by the fall of others) wherewith this prond Monarchy bath already daunted a overal fart of the world, being so many and so strange, as that moe, or more wonderfull were not ever to be siene in any of the greatest Monarchies of antient time or memory; and so together, and as it were under one view, and at one flew, to lay open unto the Christian Reader what I was gladto feeke for out of the confused Labours of many. A Worke so long and laborious, as might well have deterred a right resolute and constant minde from the undertaking thereof; beeing as yet to my knowledge not undergone or performed by any. Wherein, among st such varietie, or more truly to say, contrarietie of Writers, I didnot content my selfe (as a blinde man led by his Guide happely having no better sight than himselfe) to treadibe steppes of this or that one man going for a while before mee, and by and by leauing me azaine stumbling in the darke : but out of the learned and faithfull works of many, according to the order of my simple judgement to make choice of that was most probable, still supplying with the perfections of the orocceding in better what I found wanting or defective in the weaker, propounding unto my felfe no other marketo aime the writing of at than the very truth of the History; as that whichis it selfe of power to give life unto the dead letter, thu History. and to couer the faults escaped in the homely penning or compiling thereof. Which the bester to performe, I collected to much of the History as posibly I could out of the writings of such as were themselves pre-Cent, and as it were eie- witneffes of the greatest part of that they writ, and so as of all others best able, most like also to have left unto us the very truth. Such is the greatest part of somuch of the History of the Greeke Empire as I have (for the bester understanding of the rising of the Turks in this History) (et downe. gathered out of the doings of Nicetas Choniates, Nicephorus, Gregoras, and Laonicus Chalcocondiles, all writing fuch things as they themsclues saw, or were for most part in their time, and necre unto them done. Such are the wonderfull and almost incredible wars betwint old Amurach the Gcond, and his foster childe the fortunat Prince of Epirus, of the Turks commonly called Scanderbeg, and by that waiward tyrant at his death, together with his king dome delivered as it were by inheritance with his funthe great and cruell Sultan Mahomet: all written by Marinus Barletius, himselfe an Epirot, and in all those troublesome times then living in Scodra, a city of the Venetians joyning woon Epirus. Such is the wofull captinity of the Imperiall city of Constantinople, with the milerable death of the Greek Emperour Constantinus Palæologus, and the fatall ruine of the Greeks Empire, written by Leonardus Chienfis, Archbishop of Mytslene, being himselfe then present, and there taken prisoner. Such is the lamentable History of the Rhodes, taken for most part out of la, Fontanus his three bookes de bello Rhodio, a learned man then present, and in great credit with Villerius the Great Master, at such time as that famous Island, after it had by him and the other worthy Knights of the Order, bin mast wonderfully of long defended, was to the great ruth of Christendome taken by the Great Sultan Solyman. Such a the most tragical History of Bajazet, Solymans youngest son, collected out of the notable Epifiles of Augerius Busbequius, Legationis Turcica, he himselfe then lying Embassador for the Emperour Ferdinand at Constantinople, and present in Solymans campe, at such time as he himselfe in per: Son went over with his army into Asia, to countenance his eldest son Selymus, who succeeded him in the Empire, against bis valiant younger brother Bajazot, and beside well acquainted with the great Bassaes, Achmet, Rustan, Haly, and others, oftentimes mentioned in the Hillory following. Such is also the History of the taking of the antient city of Tripolis in Barbary from the Knights of Maltaby Smanthe proud Baffa, written by Nicholas Nicholay Lord of Arfenile, present at the same time with the Lord of Aramont, then Embaffador for the French King unto Solyman. So might I say also of the miserable spoile of the fruitfull and pleasant Islands of the Mediterranian, made by Lutzis Bassa, Solyman bis brother in law and great Admirall: with the submitting of the Island of Naxos to the Turks obeisance, written by Iohn Crifpe, at that time Duke of the same Island. And so likewise of divers other parts of the History too long to rehearse. But for asmuch as every great and famous action had not the fortune to have in it a Calar, such as both could and would commend unto posterity by writing that whereof they might truly say, They were themselves a great part, many right excellent Generals contenting themselves with the honour of the field, and their glory therewoon, leaving the honourable fame thereof to be by others reported for lacke of such most certaine Authors or rather (as I before said) eie witnesses, I gathered so much as I could of that remained, out of the worker of such, as being themselves men of great place, and well acquainted with the great and worthy personages of their time, might from their mouthes, as from certaine Oracles, report the undoubted truth of many most samous exploits done both by themselves and others : as might Pau. Iouius from the mouth of Muleasses King of Tunes, from Valtius the great Generall, from Auria the Prince of Maphis, Charles the Emperour his Admirall, and fuch others: or els out of the writings of such as were themselves great travellers into the Turks dominions, and withall, diligent observers of their affaires and state, as were the Physitions Pantaleon, Minadoie, and Leunclauius (of all others a most curious searcher of their Antiquities and Histories) wato which great clerkes, and some others of that learned profession, we may worthily attribute the greatest light and certainty of that is reported of agreat part of the Turkish affaires. But these in the course of so long an Hiflory failing alfo (as by conferring that which is hereafter written, together with their Histories is easily to be perceived) to perfect that I had taken in hand, I tooke my refuge unto the writings of such other learned and credible Authors, as of whose integrity and faithfulnesse the World hath not to my knowledge at any time yet doubted: yea, for these few late yeares I was glad out of the German and Italian Writers in their owne language in part to borrow the knowledge of these late affaires : as also from the credible and certains report of some such honourable minded gentlemen of our owne country, as have either for their honors sake served in these late wars in Hungary, or upon some other occasion spent some good times in travelling into the Turks dominions, but especially unto the Imperial city of Constantinople, the chiefe (eat of the Turkish Empire, and place of the Great Turks ahode : amongst whom I cannot but deferuedly remember my kind friend and coulin Mafter Rog. Howe, wnto whose discreet and curious observations during the time of his late abode at Constantinople, I justly account my selfe for many things beholden. In which course of my proceeding, if the Reader find not himselfe so fully satisfied as he could desire, I would be glad by him my felfe to be better informed, as being no leffe destrous to learn the truth of that I know

Thus much I thought good to fet downe, to persuade the Christian Reader of the truth of the History following, wherein he shall find matter enough to wonder at, and no leffe strange than that, what soener it is that is written of the greatest Monarchies of antient time, unto whom for power and Majeky it weeldeth little : but fo much the more worthy our confideration than they, for that their periods already run, and fo their fury ouer past this in our time to flourisheth, and at this present so mightily swelleth, as if it would onerflow all, were it not for the mercy of God first, and then by the force of some few of the Christian Princes necrest unto fo great a danger, with their fo great charge, to their immortall glory, and benefit of the Christian Commonweale, mightily checked and kept within some bounds and compasse. This History for the most part thus as u aforefaid passed through, and brought to some good perfection, was yet by me againe laied aside, and like enough even as an abortive fruit to have perished in the birth before it was growne to perfection, had I not many times fainting in the long and painefull trau: Il therewith, by my especiall good and honourable friend, Sir Peter Manwood of Saint Stephens in the County of Kent. Knight of the bonourable Order of the Bath, a great louer and fauourer of learning (and in whose kee. ping it fo for the most part many yeares in fafety rested) been still comforted, and as it were againe revived. and finally encouraged to take it in hand, and as at first to perfect it; so now againe to continue it : wind whom (being the only furtherer, stay, and helpe of those my labours) thou art for such pleasure as thou findest therein in courtesie beholden, and I for ever bounden. Now, what I for my part have in this my long tranell performed. I leane it to thy good discretion to consider, contenting my felfe in fo great matter to have been willing to have done fom thing ; wishing no longer to live, than in some measure to be profitable to the Christian Commonweale, which long lince in my nur ling mothers house Lincolne Colledge in Oxford, where I was sometime fellow, I did purposeto performe, as it should please God intime to give me meanes and occasion : in which minde I hope by the goodnesse and mercy of Christ my Sautour so long as Iliue to continue. Only this favour (to conclude with) I request of thee, that if in this so long and perples ed an History (by piece meale of so many diversly handled) written by me in a World of troubles and cares, in a place that offoor ded no meanes of comfort to proceed in fo great a worke, thou chance to light upon some things otherwise reported than thou hast elsewhere read them (as I doubt not but thou maieft) not therefore forthwith to condemne what thou here findest, being haply taken from a more certainer porter than was that whereunto thou giveft more credit, or at least wife not written by me, as meaning in any i bing to prejudice the bester judgement, but to leave it to thy good choice in such diversity of reports to follow that which may feeme wato thee most true. By which courtese thou hast already encouragadme to joyne unto my former History a Continuation for some few yeares, in this Edition, and yet vaiel (God give me life and health) hereafter incourage me to performe some other Worke to thy no leffe con tenument. So wishing thee all happineffe, I bid thee farewell. From Sandwich the last of March, 1610.

RISING OF THE OTHOMAN FAMILIE, WITH ALL THE NOTABLE EXPEDITIONS OF

THE CHRISTIAN PRINCES AGAINST THE M.

HE glorious Empire of the Turkes, the present terrour of the world, hath among it other things nothing in it more wonderful or strange, than the poore beginning of it selfe, so small and obscure, as that it is not well known vnto themselues, or agreed vpon euen among the best writers of their Histories, from whence this barbarous nation, that now fo triumpheth ouer the best part of the world, first crept out or tooke their beginning. Some (after the manner of most nations) deriue them from the District spinions Trojans, led thereunto by the affinitie of the words Turci and concerning the Teucri, supposing (but with what probabilitie I know not) the beginning of word Turci or Turks to have bin made of the corruption of the word Teucri, the common name of the Trojans: as also for that the Turks have of long most inhabited the lesser Asia, wherein the ancient & most famous city of Troy somtime stood. No great reason in my deeming; yet give the authors thereof leave therwith to please themselves, as well as some others, which dwelling much surther off, borrow, or rather force their beginning from thence, without any probabilitie at al; and that with fuch earnestnes, as if they could not elsewhere have found any so honorable ancestors. Other some report them to have first come out of Persia, and of I wot not what city there to have taken their name :neither want their some which affirme them to have taken their beginning out of Arabia, yea and some out of Syria, with many other far set deuices concerning the beginning and name of this people: all serving to no better purpose, than to thew the vicertainty therof. Among others, Philip of Mornay the noble & learned French-E man, in his worthy work concerning the trunes of the Christian religion, seemeth (and that not without good reason) to derive the Turks, together with the Tartars, from the Icwes, namely from the ten Tribes, which were by Salmanafer King of Affiria, in the time of Ofeas king of Ifrael, carried away into captinitie, and by him confined into Media, and the other vnpeopled countries of the North, whose going thither is not vnaptly described by Esdras, 2 King cap 17. where among the great Lords of the Tartars, in the farthest part of the world Northward, 4.Eld.cap 13. euen at this day are found some, that stil retaine the names of Dan, Zabulon, and Nepthaly, 2 certain argument of their discent: wherunto also the word Tartar or Tatar, signifying in the Syrian tongue, remnants or leavings, and the word Turke, a word of difgrace, fignifying in Hebrew, banished men, seemeth right well to agree. Besides that, in the Northern countries p of Russia, Sarmatia, and Lythuania, are found greater store of the Iewish nation, than elsewhere, & so necrer vnto the Tartarians stil the moe: wherunto lo. whom the Greekes commonly call Tangrelipix, and some others, Seldwek, out Sides kind messes G I suppose) corrupted of the great familie whereof he was descended By the aid of this Tons the lot and the grolipix (for now we will fo call him, as by the name mot vied) Mabether the Perfian Sultan Profits Sultane Ouercame Pifafiris the Caliph of Babylon, his Arabians being not able to endure the force of his Turkish archers. This war thus happily ended, the Turks defiring to returne home requested of the Sultan leave to depart, and with a safe convoy to be conducted varo the river Araxis, and there to have the passage of that swift river opened vnto them, which was by the Perfians frongly kept by two Castles built vpon each end of the bridge, whorby the riuerwas to be patied. But Mahomet loth to forgoe such necessarie men, by whom he had oh. tained to great a victory, and purpofing to imploy them further in his feruice against the Indians would by no means hearken unto their request, but seeming the with to be discontent H ted commanded them to speake no more thereof, threatning them violence if they should more presume to talke of their departure. The Turks therfore doubtfull of their estate, and fearing further danger, fecretly withdrew themselves into the desattof Carauonitis: and for that they were in number but few, and not able to come into the open field against so many millions of the Sarafins, lived as they might, by continuall incurfions and roads which they made out of the defert forrest into the countries adjoyning : wherwith Mahomet greatly infenced, fent out an army of 20000 men, vnder the conduct of ten of his best Captaines, against them: who for want of water & other necessaries, doubting to enter the desart, encamped themselves in the side of the forrest, there to consult what course to take. But Tangrelipix who with his Turks lay a great way off in the couert of the woods and mountains, under- I. standing of the comming of his chemics, and of the maner of their lying, thought it best ypon the fudden by night to fet upon the Sarafins and Persians, if so happily he might ouerthrow them by policie, whom he was notable to encounter in plain battel. Vipon which refolution having trauelled 2 daies long march in the defart, the third day at night he fuddenly fet voon his enemies, lying negligently in their trenches, and by his vnexpected comming brought such a seare your them, that they without longer stay betooke themselues to slight. cuery man shifting for himself without regard of others. This victory so happily gained, and Tangrolipix now (beyond his hope) throughly furnished with armor horses, and abundance ot all things needful for the wars, kept the woods & forrolls no longer as a therefor out law, but thewed him telf in the open field, where dayly repaired vnto him numbers of logues and K vagabonds feeking after spoile; with many other desperand villains, who for feare of punishment were glad of such a refuge : so that in a short space his army was growned be soope ftrong; and so much the stronger, for that they had nothing to trust vitto more than the wald of themselves. Whilest Tangrolipix thus increaseth, Mahomet inraged with the current of his army, in his fury caused all those ten captains which had the leading therof, to have their cies pluckt out, threatning also to attire al the soldiers that fled out of the battel, in womans apparel, and so disgraced to carry them about as cowards and with all vaised a great army for the suppressing of the Turks. All things being now in readinesse, he set forward; when by the Mahometthe way the fouldiers whom he had fo threatned to diffgrace, fuddenly fled to the enemy : with whose comming Tangrelipix greatly encouraged and strengthned, resolved to give the Sul- L tan battell. And so boldly comming on, met with him avil spahan a city of Persia, where was fought betwirt them a most terrible battel, with wonderfull slaughter on both sides. In the heat of which battell, Mahomes unaduifedly riding to and fro to encourage his foldiers, falling with his horse, brake his necke : vpon which mischance both the armics comming so Tangrolipix by agreement, by common confent proclaimed Tangrolipix Sultan in tris Read; and to made him King and Persia, and of all the other large dominions vnto that kingdome Delonging. This was the first kingdom of the Turks, begun by the good for time of Tangrallpin about 214 yeres after their comming out of Scythia, in the yere also of our Lord, 104 of Confiants. nus Monomachus then reigning or a little before (according to the Turks account via the resign of Romanus Argirus, Conflutine his predeceffor. Tangrolipix with his Turkes thus possessed of the kingdome of Persia, held not himselfe therewith long content, but made war vpon his neighbor princes, especially against Pilafris the Caliph of Babylon, whom he in divers battels overthrew; and having at length flaine him, joyned his kingdomevnto his owne. After that, he fent Cutlu-Muses his consin, with an entlu-Muses armie against the Arabians, by whom he was ouerthrowne and put to flight. But returning feat by Tangraby Media, he requested of Stephan the Greeke Emperours Lieutenant, leaue to passe with his the Turket armie by the confines of his countrie: which his request Stephan not onely rejected, but also by strong hand sought to stop his passage; but ioyning battell with him, was by the Turks casily overthrowne, & himselfe taken. So Cutlu-Muses returning to Tangrolipix, and recounting vnto him the successe of his warres, persuaded him to turne his forces into Media, as a most fruitfull country and easie to be subdued. But he highly offended with the ouerthrow giuen by the Arabians, would not hearken vno him, but railing a new armie in hope of better fortune, went against the Arabians in person himselse. Cutlu-Muses in the meane time fearing the Sultans displeasure, fled with his followers and fauorites; and taking for his refuge cuitio stufes Pasar a strong citie of the Chorasmians, revolted from him: which the Sultan seeming not rebullethan gainst Tangera to regard, held on his intended iourny against the Arabians, by whom he was also put to the light, worst, and enforced with dishonour to returne. After that, he with part of his army be sieged Cutlu-Mules, who by the strength of the place, and valour of the people, for a great while notably defended himselse. in the meane time Tangrelipix, not vnmindefull what Cutlu-Muses had before faid vnto him, concerning the eafines of the conquest of Media(a countrey, as he fayd, defended but by women) sent Afan his brothers for, sirnamed the deafe, with a convenient armie to inuade the fame: who entring into the frontiers of that prouince, was there by the Emperours lieutenant ouerthrown, & himselse with the greatest part of his army slain: with which loffe the Sultan rather inraged than discouraged, fent Habramy Alim his brother again, with an army of an hundred thousand fighting men: with which so great a power the Emperours lieutenant thought it not good to encounter, vntill hee had procured further ayd from the Emperour, especially out of Iberia; and therefore kept himselfe with such power as he had, within his strong and seneed places. Which Alim perceiuing, & out of hope to draw him vnto battel, roaming vp and downe the Country, at last besieged Arzen, an open town, but ful of rich merchants, by whom it was (contrarie to his expectation) notably defended for the space of six dayes, until that at length the Turks seeing no other way towin it, fet fire vpon it in diuers places; by force whereof the inhabitans were enforced for safeguard of their lives to flie & to leave the towne with an infinite wealth to the spoile of the enemy. By this time was Liparites Gouernor of Iberia, come with a great power to the ayd of the Emperors Lieutenant in Media: whereof Alim having intelligence, without delay hasted with his armie towards his enemies: and meeting with them alittle before night, had with them a cruell fight; wherein the victorie fel unto the Christians, who had the Turks in chase a great part of the night:neuertheles Liparites valiantly fighting in another wing of the battell, was there taken, & so carried away prisoner: sor whose ransome the Emperor sent a great fum of mony, with certain presents to the Sultaniall which he sent back againe, & frankly set Liparites at libertie, withing him neuer to be are armes more against the Turks. And with him fent the Seriph, a man of great place among the Mahumetans, his Embaffador vnto the Emperour. Who comming to Constantinople, amongst other things, proudly demanded of the TheTurks Em. Emperor, to become tributarie vnto the Sultan, and so to becat peace with him for euer: buffedor con-Which his vnreasonable demaund was by the Emperor with no lessed distaine scornefully temated the Emperor with no lessed distaine scornefully temated the Emperor with no lessed distaine scornefully temated the Emperor with no lessed distained to reiected, & the Scriph fo dismissed. Which contempt of his Embassador the Sultan taking Tangalipiz in cuill part, as also not a little mooued with the death of his nephew, and losse of his armie, Empirert do. with all his power inuaded the Romane prouinces; but being come as far as Coime without midiest. any notable harme doing, for that the countrie people hearing before of his comming, had in time conucighed themselves with their substance into their strong houlds, whereof there was great store in those countries; and hearing also that the Greeke Emperour was raising a G great power to come against him at Cassarea; not daring to proceed any further, leaving so many enemies behind him, he fretting in himselse, returned into Media, where finding the people all fled into their strong townes, hee layd siege unto Mantzichiert, a Citie standing in a plaine champian Countrey, but strongly fortified with a triple wall and deepe ditches. This Citie hee furiously assaulted by the space of thirtie daies without intermission, but all in vaine, the same being still notably desended by Basilius Gouernour thereof, and the other Christians therein. The Sultan wearie of this siege, and about to haue risen, was by Alcan one of his chiefe Captaines, persuaded yet to stay oneday, for him to make proofe in, what hee were able to doe for the gaining thereof: whereunto the Sultan yeelded, committing the whole charge of the affault vnto him. Alcan the next day dividing the armie into two parts, H and placing the one part vpon the higher ground, of purpose with the multitude of their shot to have overwhelmed the defendants; with the other part of the armie, furnished with all things needfull for the assault, approached to the walls: the Sultan in the meane time with certaine of the chiefe Turkes, from an high place beholding all that was done. But this fo forward a Captaine in the middest of his endeauor lost himselfe, being slaine with a great number of his followers in approching the wall. His dead bodie knowne by the beauty of his armour, was by two valiant young men that fallyed out of the gate, drawne by the haire of his head into the Citie, and his head being forthwith cut off, was cast ouer the wall among the Turkes: wherewith the Sultan discouraged, and out of hope of gaining the Citie, tose with his army, pretending himselsewith other his vrgent affaires to be called home, and threatning I withall, the next fpring to returne with greater power, and to do great matters. But not long after, great discord arose betwixt the Sultan and his brother Habramie Alim, insomuch that the Sultan fought by divers means to have taken him out of the way: which Habramy perceiuing, fled to his Nephew Cutlu-Mufes, and ioyning his forces with his, denounced war vnto the Sultan his brother, who meeting with them not far from Pafar, ouercame them in plain battell, wherein Habramie was taken, and presently by the commandement of his brother put to death. But Cutlu Muses, with his confin Melech, and fix thousand Turks, fled into Armenia. and by messengers sent of purpose, requested of the Emperor Constantinus Monomachus, to be received into his protection. But the Sultan with his armie following them at the heels, they for their more fafetie were glad to flye into Arabia. The Sultan afterwards turning into Ibe- K ria, did there great harme, spoyling the countrey before him: against whom the Emperour fent Michael Acoluthus, a valiant captaine. Of whose approch the Sultan hearing, and that hee would vindoubtedly ere long give him battell, (deeming it no great honour vinto him to ouercome the Emperours feruant, but an eternall dishonor to be of him ouerthrown) retired with his army back again to Tauris, leaving behind him one Samuch with three thousand Turkes, to infest the frontiers of the Emperors-territories: which both he and other the Turks Captaines afterward more eafily did, for that Monomachus the Emperour hauing prodigally frent andlackeffer the treasures of the Empire, to increase his revenue, had imposed a tribute vpon the frontier ward the dreat countries of his empire, which were wont before to be free from all exactions, in lieu whereof inequalities they were bound to defend the passages from all incursions of the enemy : but now pressed L with new impositions, had dissolved their wonted garrisons, and left an easie entrance for the barbarous enemies into the provinces confining upon them. Besides that, the Emperours immediately following, and especially Constantinus Ducas, abhorring from wars, and given altogether to the hoording of treasure, gaue little countenance, and lesse maintenance, vnto men of feruice, which in (hort time turned to the great weakening, and in fine to the vtter ruine of the Constantinopolitan empire. At the same time also the gouernment of the Constantinopolitan empire, by the death of Constantinus Ducas the late Emperor, came to his wife Eudocia with her three fons, Michael, Andronicus and Constantinus, all very young: whose sex and tender yeres the barbarous nations having in contempt, at their pleasure grieuously spoyled the prouinces of the empire, namely Mesopotamia, Cilicia, Capadocia, yea and sometimes as farre M as Coelesiria. The report whereof much troubled the Empresse, and gaue occasion for many that loued her not, to fay, That so troubled an estate required the government of some worthie man. Wherfore the fearing left that the Senat making choice of some other, the and her children should be remoued from the gouernment, thought it best for the preservation of her state and her childrens, to make choice of some notable and valiant man for her husband, that

A for her andhers, thould take vpon him the managing of so weightie affaires. But to check this her purpose (the only remedy of her troubled thoughts) she had at the death of the late Emperor Conflantine her husband, at fuch time as the Soueraignty was by the Senat confirmed to her and her fons, folemnly sworne neuer more to marry; which her oath was for the more affurance conceived into writing, and fo delivered vnto the Patriarch to keepe. This troubled her more, than to find out the man whom the could thinke worthy of her felfe, with fo great honor. She held then in prison one Diogenes Romanus, a man of great renowne, and honorably discended; whose father having married the neece of the Emperor Romanus Argirus, and aspiring to the empire, being conuicted thereof, flew himselfe for seare to bee inforced by torments, to bewray his confederates. This Diogenes was by the late Emperor Constantine, for his good service against the Scythes (who then much troubled the empire) highly promoted. with most honourable testimony in the charters of his promotions. That such honours were bestowed upon him, not of the Emperors meere bounty, but as the due rewards of his worthy deserts. Notwithstanding after the death of the Emperor, he sick of his fathers disease, and fwelling with the pride of ambition, fought by fecret means to have a spired vnto the empire: wherof the empresse having intelligence, caused him to be apprehended & brought in bonds to Constantinople, where being found guilty of the foule treason, and so committed to safe keeping, was shortly after brought forth to the judgement seat againe, to receive the heavie fentence of death. In which wofull plight, standing as a man out of hope, and now veterly forlorn, he mooued all the beholders with a forrowfull compassion: for beside that he was a man of exceeding strength, so was he of incomparable feature & beauty, adorned with many other rare qualities and vertues answerable thereunto: wherewith the Empresse mooued with the rest, or pierced with some secret good liking, is hard to say, reuoked the sentence of condemnation ready to haue bin pronounced voon him, and giue him pardon. And shortly after ha. Dieginer Ro uing set him at libertie, sent for him as he was going into Capadocia his natiue country, and manus of a primade him Generall of all her forces, with a full resolution in her selfe to marry him, and to Empresse made make him Emperor, if the might by any meanes get the writing out of the Patriarchs hand, Ginerall of the wherein her oath for neuer marrying againe was comprised. For the compassing whereof, she entred into a deep device full of feminine policie with one of her Eunuches, whom the purposed to vie as her pander for the circumuenting of the Patriarch. This crafty Eunuch instructed by his mistres, comming to the patriarch Ioannes Xiliphilines, a man both for his place and integritie of life much honored, told him in great secret, that the Empresse had so far set her good liking vpon a young gentleman, a nephew of his called Barda (then a gallant of the court) as that she could be content to take him to her husband, and to make him Emperor, if the might by his holines be persuaded, that she might with with safe conscience do it, and by him be discharged of the rash oath she had vnaduisedly taken, neuer to marry again, wherof he had the keeping. The Patriarch, otherwise a contemner of wordly honours, yet mooued with fo great a preferment of his nephew, promifed the cunuch to do therein what soeuer the Empresse had desired, which he accordingly performed. And so sending for the Senators one by one, in whose good liking the matter chiefly rested, he with much grauity propounded to them the dangerous estate of the common-weale, with the troubles daily increasing, and the continual fear of forrein enemies, not to be repressed by the weak hand of a woman, or the authority of yong children, but requiring (as he faid) the valiant courage of some worthic man. After that, he began to find great fault with the rash oath which the Empresse had taken a little before the death of her husband, neuer to marry, and etterly condemning the fame, as contrary to the word of God, & uniustly exacted of her, rather to satisfy the jealous humor of the Emperor her late husband, than for any good of the common-weale:he in fine persuaded them, that the vnlawful oath might be reuoked, and the Empres fet at libertie at her pleasure, by their good liking to make choice of such a man for her husband, as might better vndertake foweighty affaires of the empire, more fit for a man, than for fo tender a Lady and 3 young F children. The greater part of the senat thus persuaded by the Patriarch, and the rest with gifts and promifes ouercome by the Empresse, the patriarch deliuered vnto her the writing she so much defired, & discharged her of her oath: wherupon she forthwith calling vnto her certain Eudostama/of her secret friends, married Diogenes, whom she caused to be proclaimed Emperour. Now Remanus, and thought Budocia after the manner of a woman, to have had her husband (whom she even from proclaimes him the bottom of despaire had exalted to the highest type of honor) in all things loyall & pli- G ant : whereunto he for a while at the first forced himselfe, but afterwards (beeing a man of a proud nature, and haughty spirit) became wearie of such observance, and began by little and little to take euery day more and more vpon him. And for that the imperiall prouinces in the East, were in some part lost, & the rest in no small danger; he, as well for the redresse therof, as for his owne honour, and to shew himselfe an Emperour indeed, and not the servant of the Empresse, left the court, and passed ouer into Asia, although it were with a smal army and euill appointed: for why, it was no casie matter for him to furnish out the army with al things necessarie, which by the sloth and sparing of the late Emperours, had, to the great danger and dishonor of the empire, bin veterly neglected. Neuerthelesse the Turkish Sultan, who at the fame time with a great power inuaded the prouinces of the empire, hearing of his comming, H and that he was a man of great valour, and doubting what power he might bring with him, retired himselfe; and dividing his army, sent the one part thereof into the South part of Asia, and the other into the North, which spoiled all the countrey before them as they went, and fuddenly surprising the city of Neo-Cæsaria, sacked it, and so laded with the spoile thereof departed. But the Emperor understanding thereof, and not a little grieued therwith, drawing out certain bands and companies of the best and most readiest souldiers in his army, and with them coasting the countrey to get betwirt the Turks and home, ysed therein such expedition. that he was voon them before they were aware, and fo fuddenly charging them, brought fuch a fearevpon them, that they betook themselues to their heeles, leaving behind them for hast, their baggage and carriages, with all their prisoners & bootie they had before taken at Neo-Cufaria, and in their late expedition: yet was there no great number of them flaine, for that the Christians forc-wearied with long trauell, were not able far to follow the chase. From thence tooke his way into Siria, he fent part of his army to Melitena, and carried himselfe from Aleppoa great booty both of men and cattel. At which time also the city of Hierapolis was yeelded to him, where shortly after he built a strong castle. But whilst he there staid, news was brought to him, that the other part of his army which he had fent away, was ouerthrown by the Turkes; for the reliefe of whom, he rose with all hast and marched towards them: but being in number far inferiour to his enemies, hee was by them as he lay encamped, inclosed round in such fort, as it was thought almost impossible for him to haue escaped: at which time also the Gouernor of Aleppo traiterously revolted from him, and joined his forces with the K enemy, making now no other reckoning, but affuredly to hauetaken him: but whilft the turks thus dream of northing, but of a most glorious victorie, and were in mind dividing the spoile, the Emperor without so much as the sounding of a trumpet, suddenly issuing out of his trenches, when they least thought he durst so have done, and resolutely charging them home, put them to flight, and had of them a notable victory, had he throughly profecuted the fame: after that having taken divers towns, he came to Alexandria, in Cilicia, and there all about in the country bilited his army, because of the approch of winter, and so returned himselse to Confantinople. The next Spring the Turks, according to their viuall manner invading the frontiers of the empire, did much harme about Neo Cafaria: whereof the Emperor advertised, went thither with his army, and quickely repressing their fury, tooke his journey to the river Euphrates, where leaving part of his army with Philaretus for the keeping of those frontiers, he himselse retired Northward into Capadocia. But after his departure, the Turkes setting vpon Philaretus, put him to flight with his garrifons and taking the spoile of the frontiers, entred into Capadocia, wasting all as they went; and afterwards turning into Cilicia, sfacked Iconium, a rich populous city. Wherof the Emperor understanding at Sebastia, made towards them: but hearing by the way that they had ranfackt the city, and were for feare of his comming already retired, he fent Chatagurio gouernor of Antioch, with part of his army to Mopsiphestia, to stop the Turks of their passage. But they in the plains of Tharsus were before distressed by the Armenians, and stript of all their rich prey; and hearing farther of the approch of the Emperours power, fled by night and so escaped: which the Emperor under standing, and M having now well quieted those provinces, and the yere far spent, returned again to Constantinople. But after his departure, the Turks again inuading the frontier provinces, he fent Manuel Comnenus, a valiant young man, Generall against them; who so prevailed, that the Emperor enuying at his honour, tooke from him a great part of his army, and fent him with a small

A spowen into Syria: But as he was upon the way, he was by the Turks entrapped nonce untor Sobaftiae and there taken, most pare of his armie being at the same time overthrown and slaind: with which loffe, the Emperour being troubled, made great preparation to go himfolinin person against his enemies who encouraged with the former victorie, ceased not to infest his retritories. In the meane time by great fortune came Manuel Commenus home, together with the Turke that tooke him; who being fallen into the displeasure of the Sulvan fled vnto the Emperour with his prisoner of whom he was honorably entertained. All things now in a Yesdines, for fo great an expedition as the Emperour had in person purposed, he set forward and after long travell baving passed Cefarea, he incamped at a place called Cryapega:wherefor feuere execution done vpon certaine mutinous fouldiers, one of the legions of his armyrole Disgonis goals in mutinie against him : whom (for all that) he quickly pacified with the terror of the rest of with agreed his army, which he threatned to turne you them if they proceeded to forget their duty: after the Tarks. that, removing to Theodosopolis, he divided his army, and fent Ruselina one of his best cand tains, with one part thereof against Chliat, and another part he sent to be siege Mantzicierts. retaining with himselse therest, being of no strength. The Turkes in Mantzicierts, finding themselves not able long to hold out, sell to composition, and yeelded the citie. But shortly after the fouldiers left there in garrifon for the keeping thereof, going out to feek for forrage, were by the Turks suddenly oppressed which the Emperour understanding, sent thither one Disciplion to Bryennius, with certaine companies to relecue the citie, who encountring with the Turks, and finding himselfe too weak, sent vnto the Emperour for aide: who not knowing the Arength of the enemies, blamed him of cowardife, yet fent unto him Nicephorus Bafilacem with part of his armie; who ioining his forces with Brienniu, and giving the Turkes battell put them to flight. But following too fast vpon them vnto their trenches, and Bryennius making no great hast after, he had his horse slaine under him, and so on foot heavily laden with armour, and not able to thift for himselse, was there taken and brought to the Sultan : who honorably entreated him, and oftentimes questioned with him concerning the Emperous, and shewing him his owne power, examined him also of the Emperours, Tangralipix was now dead, and the Sultan now in field against the Emperour, was Axan his fon, a man of great wisedome & discretion, who confidering the doubtful event of battel, sent embassadors vuro the Emperor to intreat with him of peace. But hee (persuaded by some of Axanibe Suihis captains, that this motion made by the Sultan for peace, proceeded but of a meere feare balladors onto and diffrust he had in his own power, or els to gain time untill some greater strength came) Disceres so had small regard of the embassadors or their message, but proudly willed them to tell their frace master, That if he were desirous of peace, he should get him farther off, and leave the place wherin he lay incamped, for him to lodge in and so without other answer, commanded them away. Now had the Emperor (as is before faid) fent away part of his army by Rufelins against Chlist, whom he fent now for in haste again : but he hearing of the approch of the Sultan, by the perswassion of Tarchomiates, one of his captains, was retired for his more safety back into the Romane frontiers, leaving the Emperor destitute of his help. At which time also a company of the Scythians which served in the Emperors camp, revolted to the Turks; not without lome inspition, that the rest of their fellows, which remained would ere long do the like: nevertheles the Emperor prefuming of fuch strength as he had, or carried headlong with his owne fortune; refolued to glue the Turks battell, and therefore putting his men in order fet which them. Who somethat troubled with the Emperors so sudden a resolution, as being yet in some hope of peace, yet having pur themselves in order of battell, received the enemics charge's Hill giuling a little ground, as men not greatly defirous either to fight or flie. This Agite continuith long sethe day now declining the emperor doubting left the Sultan should fend part of Hisarmy to affault his camp (from which he was now drawne somewhat far, and had left the fame but weakly manned) caused a retreat to be sounded, & so began orderly to retire himifelt with them that were about him which others a far off in the battell beholding, p and supposing him to have fled, began themselves to flie amain. Of which to shameful slight and fijdden fexie Andronicus (the fon of John Ditens, the late emperor Confiantine his brother, 16/14 Touces a and by him blested Cafar, who with his fonnes feeretly enuice at the honenwood Diogenes) was notable traytor the capite for he commanding a great part of the army, gaue it fift out to fuch as were about fight of the com Him that the emperor fled and to increase the feare, turning his horse about, and sowards the priors army camp as fast as he could: after whom at the rest most disorderly followed: which the emperor G beholding, and therewith not a little troubled, made a stand, labouring in vaine to have staid the rest: for now the turks incouraged with the sudden slight of the Christians, began hardly to pursue them, as men already ouerthrown by the hand of God; whom for all that the emperor with such as yet stood with him, for a space notably resisted. But being for saken by the greater part of his army, & oppressed with the multitude of his enemies, being wounded him felfe, and his horfe flain vudet him, he was taken all imbrued with his own bloud, & the bloud Emperaters of his enemies, of whom he had wounded & flain many. The Sultan advertised of his taking, at the first beleeved it not, supposing it rather to have been some other great manivntil that he was both by them, whom he had but a little before fent embassadour vnto him, & by Basilacism One of his captaines then prisoner with him, assured that it was vadoubtedly he, which H Basilacian brought before him, to see if he knew him, fell downe prostrate at his feet, as before his dread Lord & Soueraigne. The Emperor brought before the Sultan, and humbling himselse in such sort as best beseemed his heavy fortune, the Sultan presently tooke him vp, and thus cheerefully spoke vnto him : Grieue not noble Emperour (faid he) at thy mishap, for such a the chance of war, overwhelming sometimes one sometimes another : neither feare thou any harme for a will whethe not as my prifoner, but as an Emperour : which he accordingly did, prefently appointing him a princely paullion, with all things answerable to his estate, setting him oftentimes at his own boord, and for his fake enlarging fuch prisoners as he required. And after he had thus for certain daies honorably vied him, and discoursed with him of many things, he concluded a perpetuall peace with him, vpon promise of a marriage to be made betwixt their children; 1 and to with a fafe convoy fent him away with greater honor than was at an enemies hand to haue been expected. The Emperour in Turkish attire, which the Sultan had bestowed vpon him, comming to Theodolopolis, there said the curing of his wounds, & afterwards accompanied with the Sultans embassadors, set forward toward Constantinople. But all was now there changed: for vpon the report of his captiuitie, Iohn the Cafar with Pfellow one of the chiefe Senators, & others of the same faction, which alwaies enuied at the honor of Diogenes, presently tooke the imperial gouernment from Eudocia the Empresse, and thrusting her into monasterie which she had built neere to Propontis, set vo Michael Ducas her eldest sonne, Emperour, in stead of Diagenes: whose simplicitie Casar his vncle abusing with the rest, did, now what they lift. And hearing that Diogenes was now (contrary to their expectation) fet K at libertie by the Sultan, and comming towards the emperiall city, sent out letters every way in the new Emperors name, to all the gouernours of the provinces whereby he was to passe, not to receive him as Emperour, or to do him any honour: which Diogenes understanding, staid at the castle of Docia, whether some of his friends with such power as they were able to make, reforred vnto him. Against whom, Cafar with the contrary faction first sent his sonne Constantine, and after that Andronica his eldest son, both Diogenes his mortall enemies, with a great army: by whom Diogenes, with his friends and followers, were ouerthrowne and difcomfitted. Diagenes himselfe flying to the citie of Adana, was there hardly besieged by dronicus, and in the end glad to yeeld himselfe, vpon condition, that he should resigne the em-Empero tetes pire, and fo foreuer after to lead a private life. For whose safetie, certaine of the chiefe of the Prifont by An- clergie sent of purpose from Michael the Emperor, gaue their faith: so Diogenes all attyred in black, yeelded himselse to Andronicas, by whom he was brought to Cotai, then the metropoliticall citie of Phrygia, there to expect what further order should be taken for him from the court : during which time he fell licke, being (as many supposed) secretly poisoned. But whilst he there lay languishing, an heavier doome came from the young Emperous, That he should have his eies put out : which was forthwith in most cruell manner done, the clerging men that had before for his fafety gaged their faith, crying out in vaine again (fo horrible a death of Olige crueltie. Thus deprived of his fight, he was conveyed into the Island of Prota, where his eight for lack of looking to, putryfying, and worms breeding in them, with fuch an odious fmell, 45 that no man could abide to come nigh him, he in (hort time after died, when he had raigned three yeares, eight moneths. All which miserie was thought to have hap pened ynto him through the malice of Cafar, without the knowledge of the young Emperour his nephewers tan freeth to Axan hearing of the milerable end of the late emperor Diogenes, was therwith much grigued and the more, for that the league which he had to his good content to lately made with hims

A was thereby come to nought; wherfore inteuenge thereof, he with great power inuaded the imperially proteinces; nor for spotle and booty only, as in former time, but now to conquer and to hold the father Against whom, Michael the Emperor sent Hanc Commenus his Lieutenant. with a great atmy who meeting with the Turks, & joyning battell, was by them ouerthrown with all his army and taken priloner, and glad afterwards for a great fumme of mony to tedeeme himlel . After which ouerthrow, the Emperor fent his vncle Cafar with another armyagainst them, who was by Ruselim; that had before revolted from the Emperour, overthrowne at the river Sangarius, and taken prisoner; whom he for all that shortly after set at libertie againe; and joyning with him against the Turks, were both together by them discomfitted and taken prisoners, but afterwards redeemed Cafer by the Emperour, and Rulelius by his wife. This Rufeline was a notable traitour, who joyning with the Turks, did what he lift in the provinces of the Empire in the leffer Afiastor the repressing of whom the Empefor fert Alexim Commenus, a young man, but very politick and couragious, who lecretly pra-Ctiling with the Turks that were great with Rufelins, had him at last by them for a sum of mony betraied into his power: who forthwith fent him to Constantinople to the Emperor, by whom he was imprisoned, but afterwards fet at liberty and imploied against Bryennius and his brother, then vp in rebellion against the Emperour.

But to come neerer to the Turkish affaires. Catlu-Muses, who with his cousin Melech and Custo Muses with his spiral with his spiral with his spiral others, were for seare of Tangrolipix their cousin fled into Arabia, as is before declared, now and tensines in the beginning of the reigne of Axan, returned; and as the enuious competitors of his king- 14/2 up armits un the Deginning of the reigne of Axam, returned and as the children of the reigne of their friends and partakers, were now ready to have tried the matter with him by plain battel. Against whom also, the Sultan on the other side had brought into the field his whole forces, & was now likewise ready to have incountred them neere vnto the city of Eres. But whillt the Turks thus divided, flood ready to defroy themselves, the Caliph of Babilon (from whom though the Turks had taken all temporall soueraigntie, yet in matters of religion still held him in great reuerence and esteem, as their chiese Bishop, & the successor of their great Prophet) considering that nothing could be more dangerous to his feet and religion, than that civil discention, the late consuston and veter ruine of the Sarafin empire, and authority of the Caliphs; and fearing the like effect in these new Sarafins, now the chief stay of the Mahometan superstition: setting aside all pontificall formality wherby he was bound not to go out of his own house, came with all speed even as the armies were now ready to joyn battel, & thrusting himselse into the middest betwirt them, what with the reverence of his person, what with his effectuall persuasion, wrought so much and prevailed so far with both parties, that they were content to lay down their weapons, and to fland to his order and judgment : which was, That Axan the Sultan should still injoy his Amost burilak kingdom and territories, whole and entire vnto himselse as he did: and that Cullu. Muses and order christiancom. his fons, aided by him, and so inuading the prouinces of the Constantinopolitan empire, moneweale. should therof subdue so much as they could vnto themselves, & to be thereof accounted the only Lords and gouernors: which order as it was vnto the Turks, and for the maintenance of the Mahometan superstition, very wholsome and commodious, so was it vnto the Christian commonweale and religion most dangerous and hurtfull, as in processe of time by proofe it appeared. For by this mean in (hort time after Cutlu. Muses with his cousins and sons subdued all Media, with a great part of Armenia, Capadocia, Pontus, and Bythinia, and so a great part of the leffer Asia. By the aid of this Cutlu. Mules, and the fauor of the foldiers, Nicephorus Botoniates aspiring to the Empire of Constantinople, displaced his master the Emperor, Michael Ducas, after he had raigned fix yeros & fix moneths, and in the habit of a Monke thrust him into an Abbey: which vsurper by the just judgement of God, was at length requited the trans of euen with the same measure, and in like manner served by Comnenus, who thrusting him out, diates weiters fucceeded himselfe in the empire. Much it was that this Cutlu-Mufes, with his fons and kinf. about the fucmen did for the inlarging of the Turkish empire, by the helpe of the great Persian Sultan: efforts whose forces together with their own, in divers countries conducted by these worthy lea-missions ders his nigh kinsmen, and doing great matters, gaue occasion for themselves to be accounted Sultans, though indeed they were none, neither their names such, as are by some antient writers, & others of later time also reported; but vnto the Turks themselues by those names, either for Sultans, vnknowne. Out of these great commanders, all borne of the Selzuccian family, hath Aithones, and others following his report, derined their Dag right paffafalometa, Me. G leclas, and Belchiaroc, whom they suppose to have orderly succeeded a see conherwish called Tangrolipix, in the Turkish empirejand to have done great matters awhereastheth by there port of the Turks themselves, and the relation of the Greeks, it appears plainly A sar (more truly called Ax-ban, that is to fay, the White king) to have bin the for of Tangnolipix and ro have fucceeded him in the empire; and that by him the emperor Diogenes was taken, and not by Apasalemus as they vainely imagine. As for Aspasalemus, whom the Turks by that name know not either any thing of his doings, it feemeth to have been a name corrupted of Mis pam Sallarius, the brother of Tangrolipix and Habrami, and not his fonnes fon as they would have it. In like manner Meleclas also seemeth to have been forged of Melech the son of Habras mi, Tangrolipix his brother, and not of Aspasalemus, as some without any good ground report. H Whom they finding to have been all great men in the Selzuccian family, with some others alfo, have both corrupted their names, and given vnto them an imaginarie foueraigntic and fuccession in the Turks first empire, such as beside that the Turks themselves acknowledge not, is easile to be refelled out of the histories of the Greeks, who had with them still much to do. Wherefore leaving those supposed princes of the Turks with their imaginarie succession, and doings, vnto the authors thereof, following more certainties, to geturn againe to the course of our history. Axan the Sultan at the same time that he had by the mediation of the Chaliph (or not long after) fallen to agreement with his coufin Cutlu-Mafes : to increhie the honour of his nation and the bounds of his empire, gaue vnto Ducat and Melech, two of his nigh kinsmen, the gouernement of Damasco and Aleppo, with that part of Syria which joyneth vnto them, of purpose that way to incroch vpon the Ægyptian Chaliph, who then had under his jurisdiction, all, as far as Laodicea in Syria; yet not with so large priviledge as had Cutlu-Muses, vnto whom and his posteritie he had yeelded the absolute honour of a Sultan or King, ouer such countries and provinces as he should win from the Christians: but vnto these others his kinsmen, he gauethe gouernement of the aforesaid cities of Damasco and Aleppo, in the frontiers of his dominion in Syria, conditionally, that they should still remaine his vassals, and hold of him as of their fourraigne, what so ever they had, who neverthelesse in short time mightily prevailed upon the Ægyptian, still increasing the who neverthelesse in short time might by prevailed whose name together with their Empire, Turkish territoric with the losse of the Sarasins, whose name together with their Empire, was now by the Turks almost quite driven out of Asia.

The general Historie

But these proud branches of the Turkish Empire, thus overspreading the lesser Asia, with the greatest part of Syria, were in short time after by the mercy of God, and the valour of the most Christian and most religious princes of the VVest cut shorter, and brought againe into some better order. The full discourse whereof, worthy eternal memory, by others inrolled in the antient records of fame, I purpose not at large to follow, but in briefe to touch, for the orderly continuation of the present historie, hasting to the doings of this victorious nation of latter times, wherein we are to make a longer stay, as more pertinent

It fortuned that whilst Cutlu-Muses and his sons, supported by the Sultan Axan their kins-Melech with his coulin against the Egyptian Caliph in Syria on the other: that one Peter, 2 French Hermite mooned with a denout zeale, according to the manner of that time, went to visit the sepulchre of our Sauior, with the other holy places at Ierusalem: who comming into The description termed than feared: yet under such simple & homly feature lay unregarded a most subtil sharp M stians, so great and heavy, as that greater or more intollerable could none beiwherwith not

He commeth to Ierusalem, and performing his devotions there, faw the grieuous misery of the poore deuout ChriA little grieued, he entred into a deepe discourse thereof with Simon the Patriarke and Abbot of the monasterie of the Christians (there before built by certaine Italian Merchants) and with the mafter of the Hospitalers, by whom he was fully informed thereof, as of whatfocuer elfe he required. After much graue conference, it was at length agreed voon amongst them, that the Patriarke and the grand Master, should in their own, and the names of the other oppressed Christians, write their letters vnto the Pope and the other Christian Princes, concerning their miscries; and to crave their aid for the recovery of those holy places out of the hands of those cruell Infidels: of which letters the devout Hermit promifed himself to be the trustic carrier. and of their petitions the most carefull foliciter. Whereupon the Patriarke and grand Master. in the name of the poore oppressed Christians wrote their letters vnto this effect :

We the citisens of the holy Citie, and countreymen of Christ Ielus, dayly suffer those things which the Leners of Christ our King (affered but once, in the last daies of his mortalitie. We are dayly buffeted, sourged, arbert terus. and viersed : enery day some of us are brained, beheaded, or crucified. We would flie from citie to citie, km, and of the which the remotest parts of the earth, and removue out of the middle of that land where Christ our Sautor grand Master write the remotest parts of the earth, anaremouse out of the missing of the tiespitative of the tiespitati (facred with the birth, doctrine, death, resurrection, and ascension of our Saulour) without inhabitants Pope and other and Priests; and that there should first lacke such as would indure death and martyrdome, than such as chissian trinwould inflict the fame and that there should not be which would willingly die for Christ, as in battell, baife of the opso long as there were any that would fight against them. These things truly we most miserably suffer : profed christiyet was there a time when as our anceltors feared no fuch thing, either to them felues or their posteritie. 1em. And now perhaps the Christian kingdomes of the West line likewise without the least suspicion of feare: but let them be moved by our example and testimony. The strength of the Turks is dayly increased and ours diminished: The continuall gaining of new king domes gives hithem courage: They have already dewoured the whole world, in hope. The forces of the Turks are fiercer and ftronger than the forces of the Sarafins, their policies deeper their attempts more desperat, their endeauors greater, and their successe fortunator, Tet have the Sarafins attempted both Romes: they have besteged Constantinople, and have was Romeaud Comfted not onely the sea coasts of Italy, but even the heart of the land also. Then why should the king domes sanimople, of the Welt presume themselves to standin safety and out of all perill, when as the chiefe fortresses of the cased Noun world hane beene fo indangered ? what may the rest of Christendome promise unto it felfe, fecing that Roms, or aem D Ierufalem (the feat and fectacle of the Christian Religion) bath beene besieged, taken facked, rafed, and Kome. triumphed upon? feeing that of the Christian profession remaine but the poore and weake reliques in comparison of the antient whole entire body? This land, which is dayly besprinkled with our bloud, yea the blond it selfe cryeth out for revenge. And we your most humble suppliants, proftrate at your feet. call upon the helpe, aid, mercie, faith, and religion, of you most blessed Father, of the Kings, Princes, and Potentates ; Christians not in name and profession onely, but in heart, soule, and spirit. Before the tempest thunder, before the lightning fall upon you auert from you and your children the storme hanging ouer your heads : defend sis your poore Suppliants, deliver your religion from most wicked and accurfed stauerie. You shall in so doing deserue immortall fame, and God shall require your so great valour in this world with terrestriall king domes, and in the world to come with eternall bliffe, whose sacred inheritance p you hall have defended from the rage of hell.

With these letters, and plenty of other secret instructions, the deuout hermit returning into Italie, and comming to Rome, deliuered his letters vnto Vrban the second of that name, then Pope, with a ful discourse of the miseries of the Christians under the Turkish thraldom, which he had feene at Ierufalem and other places as he trauelled requesting his holy care for the redreffe thereof: with whom he fo prevailed, that shortly after, he calling a Councellat The Constitute Claremont in France, among other things, propounded the miserie of the poore oppressed Christians at Ierusalem, as an especiall matter to be considered of. And having caused the aforesaid letters, directed vnto him and the other Christian Princes, to be openly read in the F Councell, whereunto three hundred and sen Bishops were then out of divers parts of Christendom assembled, with the Embassadors of all countries, much moved the whole assembly to compassion: at which time also the hermit (whose flowing eloquence fully counternaised what wanted in his feature, standing up in the midst of the Councell, deliuered his message in the name of the afflicted Christians, with their heavie groanings and teares: which as they could not be in letters expressed, so were they not hardly by the religious hermit (as by him) G who having both lately seene both the miserie of the men, and desolation of the places, and at the heart touched with the griefe thereof) fo lively represented, as that it moved the whole affembly with the like simpathy of heavinesse and griefe. Which the Pope perceiving tooke thereupon occasion to enter into a large discourse concerning that matter, with many effectuall reasons persuading the Fathers and Princes there present, of the necessitie of so religious a Warre to be taken in hand, for the deliuerance of their oppressed brethren out of the thraldome of the Infidels; and now as well as with their present Decree, as afterwards at their retume home into their Countries, by all meanes to further the same. Which notable perfurtion, with the heavie complaint of the Hermit, and the equitie of the Gaufe, fo much moued the whole Councell, and the rest there present, that they all as men inspired with one H An expedition Spirit, declared their confent by their often crying out, Deus vult, Deus vult, God willeth aged vipulty it, God willeth it: which words fo then vitered by way of applaule, were in the great and the County of the most facred expedition following, much vsed of the denout Christians, as the fortunate significant following the start of the second of the denout Christians, as the fortunate significant following the second of the denout Christians of the second of the se corffirm og nall of their cheerefull forwardnesse, euen in their most dangerous enterprises. Strange it were to tell, and hardly to be beleeued (but that the antient Histories beare witnesse of the proffed in the like) how farre in one daies space the report of this religious decreed warre was by flying

The Councell dissolued, and the reuerend Fathers returning euerie man home into his owne countrey, it pleased God by their effectuall persoasions so to worke with the rest of the Christian Princes, and people in generall, that in all countries and provinces in Christendom, were shortly to be seene men of all forts in great number, with red Crosses on their brests (the cognifance of that facred expedition) readie of themselves to spend both life and goods for the defence of the Christian Religion, and recourse of the Holy-Land. The number of whom is of divers diverfly reported, but of most supposed to have beene three hundred thou-The chiefecom- fand fighting men : Of whom the chiefe Commanders were, Godfrey Duke of Lorraine, with mandos of the his two brethren, Euflace and Baldwin, all of the honourable house of Buillon; Hugh Syrnatheir expedition med the Great, brother to Philip then the French King; Raymond and Robert Earles of Flanen into the Ho- ders , Robert Duke of Normandie, William the Conquerors sonne , Stephen de Valoys Earle of Chartiers: Ademar Bishop of Podie, the popes Legat; and Peter the Hermit, not to be numbred among st the least, as chiese author of this most famous expedition: vnto whom many K other honourable Princes joyned themselues, as partakers of their trauels, though not with

> The first that set forward in this expedition, was one Gualter Sensauier a noble Gentleman, with a great band of men: not long after whom followed Fuer the Hermit, with fortic thoufand moe, who both travelling thorow Germany, Hungaria, and Bulgaria, were glad oftentimes, especially in the further part of Hungarie and Bulgaria, to open themselues a way with the fword; and so with much labor, and no lesse losse came at length to Constantinople: where they were not greatly welcome vnto the Emperour Alexius Comnenus; who guiltie vnto himfelfe of the vnlawfull meanes whereby he had extorted the Empire from Nicephorus his predecessour, had that expedition of the Christians into the East, in distrust, as purpo- L fed against himselfe: vntill that fully resolued to the contrarie, by the Hermit and others; and that a farre greater power was comming after, for the inuafion of the Turks, and recouerie of the Holy-Land, he was content to relieue them now wearie of their long trauell: and afterward to make roome for them that were to come, shipped them over the strait of Bosphorus into Afia; who marching forward into Bithynia, encamped their Army in the countrey not farre from the Citie of Nice. In the meane time Godfrey with his brethren, and diuers other Princes that had joyned themselues vnto him, with the Germanes and Lorranois, and the greatest part of the Armie, followed the same way that the Hermit had taken before him. At which time also Hugh the French Kings brother, with the Legate, the two Roberts (the one Duke of Normandie, and the other Earle of Flanders) and the rest of the French M Commanders, passing ouer the Mountaines into Italie, came to Rome, with a wonderfull great Armie: where taking their leaucof the Pope, because they would be leffe troublesome unto the Cities and Countreys whereby they were to paffe, they divided their great Armie into three parts; whereof the one part went to Brundusium, and the other to Bary, and the

A third to Hydruntum, vnto whom also Bohemund one of the great Princes of Apulia, joyned himselse with twelve thousand good souldiers that followed him. From these three ports the Christian army departing, and crossing the Adriaticke, arrived in safety at Dirrachium, and night hereabout vpon the coast of Dalmaria from whence they trauelled by land thorow Macedonia, to Constantinople; were they met with the Duke Godfrey and the rest of the Armie: Godfrey dute of whom also at the first, Alexius the Emperouris reported to have but coldly entertained, as Buillongandibe jealous of his owne cleate; untill that better perfuaded of their designements and good mea- Printer, mice ning towards him, confirmed by many rich presents sent vnto him by these strange Princes, together accome he loyned with them in league : wherein it was agreed, That the Emperor during the time of this expedition should furnish them with new supplies of men, armour, victuals, and what soeuer else they should want : in regard whereof, the Princes on the other side promised to restore again vnto the empire, what provinces, countries, or cities they should happily gain out of the hands of the Turks and Sarafins, the City of Ierufalem only excepted: which agreement was afterward on the suspicious Emperors part but slenderly performed. Neuerthelesse. this league so made, hee granted them passage, and so transported them ouer the strait into Afia: only Bohemund, for an old grudge betwixt the Emperour Alexius and his father, would not come to Constantinople, hut marching with his army thorow the vpper Mysia and Thracia, came fooner than any man had thought, vnto the strait of Hellespontus, and so passed.

Now had Gnaker, and the Hermit Peter, with their Army, lien two moneths in the countrey about Nice, expecting the comming of the rest of the Christian Princes: for why, they thought it not good before their comming to attempt any thing against the enemie, whom they knew to lie not farre off very firong. But the common fouldiers wearie of fo long lying, and nought doing, and pinched with some wants, and withall disking of Gualter their chiefe Commander, and the Hermit Peter, (of whose integritie and holinesse they had a greater opinion, than of his prowesse and direction) rose vp in mutinic, and displacing Gualter, made choice of one Raymund a valiant Germane Captaine, for their Generall: by whose conduct they tooke Exorgum, a Towne of purpole for faken of the Turks. For they long before vnderstanding what a tempest of warre was growing upon them out of Europe, sought by all means to cut off these that were already come ouer, as the forerunners of a greater Army following : and therefore had left them this Towne, as a bait to traine them out of their trenches. And after that the Christians were thus possessed of the Towne, having layd certaine strong ambushes, they droue out certaine heards of cattell the more to allure them: all which certaine companies of the Christians brought in without any losse, the Turks still winking thereat. With which bootie the Christians encouraged, went out three thousand of them to take in a little towne not farre off; who were by Turks cut off and flaine enery mothers sonne, as they were about to have divided the spoile. Which overthrow reported into the Towne, discouraged even the chiefe Commanders of the army, fo that they resolved no more to try the fortune of the field, before the comming of their friends. Neuerthelesse the common souldiers condemning them of cowardife, chose them a new Generall, one Godfrey Burel, whom they now requested not, but enforced to goe out to reuenge the death of their fellowes. Which their rashnesse not long after turned to their own destruction: for ten thousand of them going out of Exorgum, to fortage the countrey, were by the Turkes entrapped, and almost all flaine, except some few, which by speedy flight escaped. The Turks prosecuting their victorie, layd hard siege to them in the Towne also, vntill they had partly with famine, and partly with the sword consumed the most part of them. The Hermit with the poore remainder of his army tooke his refuge to Cinite, a Towne not farre off, before abandoned by the Turks; wherewith much adoe he defended himselfe vntill the comming of Duke Godjrej and the rest of the Princes.

Cutlu-Muses the Turke was now dead, having left vnto his fon Sultan Solyman many large countries & provinces, altogether gained from the Christians in Asia, whom he held in great subjection and thraldome. This warre-like Prince having discomfitted and almost brought to nought the hermits forces, was no leffe carefull for the withstanding of the great army following:which now being come into Bithynia, & lying before Nicomedia, remouing thence, laid fiege to the city of Nice, called in antient time Antigonia, of Antigonia, the fon of Philip that mice beforeship built it; and afterwards Nicea, of Nicea the wife of King Lyfimachus. deuout Greeks, Christians; but in such thraldome vnto the Turks, that they could not do any G thing for the deliuerte of themselues. This siege indured longer than the Christian Princes had at the first supposed : who although they to the vttermost of their power forced the cirie on three fides, yet was it fill notably defended, new supplies still comming from the Turks by the lake of Ascanius joyning voon the other side of the Qitie. Bur after that the Christians. possessed of the lake, began on that side also to lay hardly vnto the citie, the Turks discouraged, and feeing themselves beset round with their enemies, yeelded up the city the fifth of Iu-1 0 9 7 ly, in the yeare 1097, after it had been fifty daies besieged. But whilest the Christians thus lay at the fiege, the Turks affailed the quarter of the camp where the Legat lay ; by whom they were notably repulsed, and with great losse inforced to retyre vnto the mountains. In this ca ty, amongst the rest of the Turks, was taken Solymans wife, with two of her children, whom the H Princes sent prisoners to Constantinople. This City so woon, was according to the agreement before made, restored vnto Alexim the Emperour, whose sleet had in that siege done good feruice, by taking the lake from the Turks.

The city of Nice thus woon, the Christian Princes remouing thence with their army, and marching thorow the country, came the fourth day after vnto a river which watred many rich pastures; where as they were about to have incamped, for the commodiousnesses of the place. and refreshing of the army, suddenly news was brought into the quarter where Robamund lay, now busic in casting up his trenches, That the Turks with a great Army were ready even at hand to charge him. For Solyman having railed a great power of his owne, and aided by the Sultan of Persia his kinsman, was now come with an army of 60000 strong to give the Chri- I flians battell : of whole approch Bohemund advertised, left the fortifying of his trenches, and putting his foldiers in array, fet forward to meet him; fending word to the rest of the Princes A craff battle that lay a far off, to be ready as occasion should require, to relieve him, These two armies conducted by their most resolute chiefetains, meeting together, joyned a most fierce and terrible battell, where in a fhort space the Turks lay slain vpon heaps, in such fort that they served the Christians in stead of bulwarks. But whilest Bohemund thus prevailed in the battell certain of the Turks horsemen wheeling about, brake into Bohemunds camp (not as then altogether fortified, and but flenderly manned) where among the women, and other weake persons there left. they raised a great tumult and outcry, to the great appaling of them that were fighting in the battel which Bohemund perceiuing, withdrew himself with certain companies vnto the camp, K from whence he with great flaughter repulfed the enemy. But returning again into the battel, he found there a great alteration: for his foldiers whom before he had left as it were in posses. fion of a most glorious victory, were now so hardly laid vnto by the Turks, as that they were ready to have turned their backes and fled. Neuertheleffe, by his comming in, the battell was notably reftored, and again made doubtful when the enemy perceiving how much the affaulring of the camp had troubled the Christians in battell, sent out certaine troups of horsemen again to affault the same, and had not failed undoubtedly to have taken it, being as aforesaid not yet fortified, had not Hugh the French Kings brother come in good time to the rescue: who comming in with 30000 hor temen, after he had relieved the camp, entring directly into the battell, was notably encountred with a foundron of fresh souldiers of the Turks, by them L of purpose reserved for such eyent. There began a battell more terrible than the first, with most doubtfull victorie : but at the length the Turks wearie of the long and cruell fight, and feeing most of their fellowes slaine, began by little and little to give ground, and so retired into the mountains, which were not far off. In this battell, which continued a great part of the day, were flaine of the Turks 40000, and of the Christians about 2000. The next morning Bohemand, with the French Kings brother, came againe into the field, in fuch order as if they should presently have given or received battell: where after they had stayd a great while, and faw no enemy to appear, they fell to the honest buriall of their dead; which were easily known from the Turks, by the red croffes vpon their garments, the cognisance of their sacred warre-Salyman figure. Salyman flying with the remainder of his army notably diffembled his loffe, giving it out M that he had gotten the victorie:yet by the way as he went he burnt vo the coutry villages, and destroied or carried away what soeuer els he thought might stand the Christians in any stead, if they should further follow after him, leaving nothing for them but the bare ground.

After this victoric, Bohemand and the Christian Princes, without resistance marching

A through the hot and dry countries of the leffer Asia, came to Antiochia a Citie of Pissdia, Antioch in Viwhich they took with small labour: and so marching vnto I conium the principal city of Cilicia, neere unto the mountaine Taurus, were there also of the citisens courteously received. where they staied certaine daies for the refreshing of the Armie. From thence they set forward roward Heraclea, where a great power of the Turks were reported to be affembled. But Heracles yelthey, together with the garrison souldiers, vpon the approach of the victorious Army of the ded, Christians, for fook the city and fledithe citisens being Christians (as they were yet generally in all the Provinces of the leffer Afia, but in great subjection to the Turkes) and now rid of their cruel masters the Turkish garrisons, came forth, and meeting the Princes, cladly veelded themselves with their city vnto them, as vnto their deliverers. Here the Christian Princes sully infth aced of the great feare and desperation of the Turks, who now in no place durst abide their comming; for the more speedy taking in of those countries but lately oppressed by the Turks, divided their army into two parts, leaving the one part thereof with Baldwin and Tancred in Cilicia, for the full subduing thereof, (who in short time tooke the cities of Tarsus. Edeffa, and Manuffa; with all the rest of the country, the Turks daring not any where to abide their comming:) the other part of the army in the mean time entring into the leffer Armenia; tooke the fame from the Turks, which the Princes gaue to one Palmurus an Armenian, who had in that expedition done them great feruice. From thence they tooke their way into Capadocia, which they also subdued, driving out the Turks in every place, and tooke the Cities of Cæfarea and Socor, where they staied a few daies for the refreshing of the army : with like fuccesse they passed thorow the rest of the Provinces of the lesser Asia, of late possessed by the Turks, still chasing them out before them, and setting at libertie the poore oppressed Christians of those countries. Whereof Solyman (crauing aid of Axan the Persian Sultan his cousin) grieuously complained, by his letters to him directed in this fort : The famous Citie of Sultansolvman Nice with the country of Romania, which we by your aid and power have gotten from the kingdome of the buletter unio Greeks and of your bounty possessed, the Christians of the kingdome of France have againe taken from vs, that enfan sul-Thus was the late erected kingdome of the Turks in the leffer Afia, by these valiant Christian champions againe brought low, and they glad to retyre themselves further off into the mountains and more Easterne countries, untill this heat was ouerpast; and that they, taking the benefit of the troubled state of the Greeke Empire (afterwards rent in funder by ambition and civill discord, the ruine of the greatest monarchies) recovered not only their former state, but became also dreadfull vnto the Greeke Emperors themselves: vpon whom they dayly gained in one corner or other, still maintaining the honour of their estate vntill the rising of the othe-

man Familie, as in the processe of this History shall God willing be declared. These victorious princes (then, and to the worlds end samous) not contented, to their immortall praise to have thus driven the Turks out of the lesser Asia, and recovered so many countries; bound themselves, as well the Princes as the common soldiers, by solemne oath, ne- The Christians uer to returne againe into their countries, vntill they had accomplished that facred war with by Outh, near the conquest of the Holy city. So mounting together the high mountain Taurus, and descen- to return watth ding thence as into another world, they came to the city Marefia, which they tooke without the Holy cine. resistance, the Turks there in garrison being by night before for seare fled:where the Christians for the refreshing of themselves certain daies staid. In the mean time Robert Earle of Flanders with 1000 men at armes, was fent out to give summons vnto a city called Artasia, about 15 miles distant from Antioch: when as the citisens beholding the ensignes of the Christians, fuddenly tooke vp armes against the Turks there in garrison, which had of long holden them in subjection, and prevailing upon them, slew them every mothers son: whose heads they prefented vnto the Earle, and received him into their Citie. The Turks to revenge the death of their friends, and to recouer againe the citie before the comming of the rest of the armie, sent out about 10000 men out of Antioch; for thither was affembled a great power of them to have hindred the further proceedings of the Christians: and being come neer to Artasia, they fent before certaine ftrag ling companies, of purpose to draw the new come Christians out of the city, lying in the mean time in ambush with the rest, of purpose to entrap them with these stragling companies the Flemmings fallying out lustily, encountred, and easily put them to flight, the Turks indeed flying of purpose to bring them within the danger of the other, lying in ambush. After whom the Flemmings eagerly following, were before they were aware enclosed round with their enemies, and there had vindoubtedly perished, had not the Citisens G

(being Christians) prefently fallied out and right worthily relieued them. Shortly after, the Christian Princes marching forward with their army, were encountred

by the Turks at the river Orontes, who had there thought to have stayd their surther passage: with whom Robert Duke of Normandie, who had the leading of the vantgard, had a hard conflict, untill that the Turks, discouraged with the sight of the armie still comming on, for sooke the bridge, and betook themselues to flight. So the Christians passing the river, came and indetiction sy camped with their army before the famous City of Antioch, the one and twentieth day of O Rober, in the yere 1097: the gouernor whereof vnder the Persian Sultan was one Cassianu. (of some also honoured with the name of a King) who at the comming of the Christians, had with him in the city feuen thousand horsemen, and twentie thousand foot of the Turk, with H great store of victuals, and all manner of other provisions necessary for the defence thereof.

The deficiention This citie, called in antient time Epidaphane, or Epiphane, and of the Hebrewes, Reblatha, of the formers formetime the feat of the Syrian Kings, and afterwards the motropolitical city of Syria, hauing under it an hundred and fifty Bifhops, (famous formany things, and among ft others, for that it was the feat of the bleffed Apostle S. Peter, and first place whereas the professors of the Christian religion tooke the name of Christians) is scituate vpon the river Orontes, about twelue miles from the sea, and was then strongly fortified both by Nature and Art, being compassed about with a double wall; the vttermost wherof was of hard stone, and the other of bricke, with 460 towers in the same, and an impregnable castle at the East end thereof, whereunto was joyning a deepe lake, comming out of the great river, which watered the South fide I of the citic. Round about this strong citie (one of the most assured refuges of the Turks) although it were in circuit great, lay the Christian Princes encamped, except on that side which being defended with the high broken mountaines, is not there to be befieged. Vpon whom the Turks out of the citic, during the time of the fiege made many a fierce and desperat sally, being stil by the Christians most valiantly repulsed: specially at the bridge which the Chris stians had made of boats for their more commodious passage to and fro ouer the river. In this fort was the fiege continued untill the beginning of Februarie, with many a bloudy skirmith. At which time such abundance of raine fell, as that hardly could a man find any place to lie dry in; and the scarcitie of victuall grew so great in the campe, that many (horrible it is to fay) to affuage their hunger, were glad to eat the dead bodies of their late flaine enemies. In K these extremities many died of hunger and cold; yea, their horses also perished for want of meat, so that in the whole campe were scarely left two thousand horses fit for service, the rest being either all dead, or brought so low, as that they were altogether vnseruiceable. These miseries dayly increasing, divers men of great account, whom no terror of the enemie could have difinald, began fecretly to withdraw themselves out of the camp, with purpose to have stolne home; among whom were Peter the hermit author of this war, and Tancred the nephew of Bohemund, who taken by the way, and brought backe with the rest as fugitiues, were sharply reprehended by Hugh the French Kings brother, as cowards, and traitors to their brethren and fellow foldiers, and so inforced to take a new oath for their fidelitie and perseuerance. Bohewand in the meane time going to Arthusia a towne not far off, by good fortune cut off a great L part of the Turks there in garrison: who after their vsuall manner sallying out to have cut off the forragers of the Christians, were now themselves caught tardy: wherby the country for a time was more open for the distressed Christian soldiers to seeke abroad for reliefe. But this libertic fo lately gained lasted not long, when newes was brought vnto the campe, That the Turks in great number, out of the provinces about Aleppo and Damasco, were comming vnto the reliefe of their besieged friends in Antioch. Neuerthelesse, the Christians trusting to their own strength & the strength of the place wherin they were incamped, lay stil, & at their com-ming so incountred them, that they slew 2000 of them, & put the rest to slight. In which conflict the Christians got great store of prouision and victuals which the Turks had thought to have put into the city. The heads of the slain Turks the Christians set upon stakes before the M city, to the more terror of the defendants. This ouerthrow of the Turks, wherein Casianus had lost his eldest fon, with others of his best captains, so daunted the besteged, that they requefled a truce for a time of the Christian Princes: which granted they of the city came oftentimes into the campe, and they of the campe likewise into the city: Casianus sil expecting tenetians with a great fleet of two hundred gallies fcowring the feas, under the conduct of Henry Contarenus the Bishop, and of Vitalis the Dukes son, meeting with the gallies of Pisa at the Rhodes, and falling out with them, had with them a great fight, wherin the Venetians having the upper hand, tooke eighteene of their gallies, and in them fine thousand souldiers; whom they feeing to be marked with the red croffe, the cognifance of the facred war, they prefently fet at liberty, together with the gallies, detaining onely thirty of the better fort as hostages. Afterthat, the Venetians failing into lonia, tooke the city of Smyrna, and spoiled all along the coasts of Lycia, Pamphilia, and Cilicia, before for seare abandoned by the Turks.

The truce before taken between the Turks and the Christians at the fiege of Antioch, being in (hort time after broken by the death of one Vollo a Frenchman, flaine by the Turks; the war was again begun and the city more hardly laid vnto than before. At which time the gouernor, who in the time of this long fiege, which had now continued nine moneths, had loft most part of his best soldiers, was glad for the defence of so great a City, toyle the service of divers Christians, then dwelling in the city. Among whom was one Pyrrhus, a citien of great reputation, vnto whom he had committed the guarding of a tower, called the two Sifters; but afterwards S. Georges tower. This Pirrhus had fecret intelligence with Bohemund Prince of Antiochberrai-Tarentum, with whom he agreed to give him there enterance into the city, vpon condition, diagna, that he should of the other Christian Princes procure the government of the city to himself; and that he with the rest of the Christian citisens in the city, might be at his hands well vsed? which thing being eafily obtained, all things agreed ypon, Bohemund with his fouldiers were by night by Pyrrhus let into the city, who made way for the rest of the army to enter. The city thus taken, many of the Turks fled into the castle, the rest were put to the sword, man, woman and child; and among them also many of the Christians, the furious souldiers taking of them no knowledge. Great wealth was there found, but small store of victuals. Cassanue the Callianus es late gouernor flying out of the city to faue himself, in wandring thorow the mountains, fel in- dioch in figure to the hands of the Christian Armenians, who lately thrust out of Ierusalem, were fled thither saine. for refuge by whom he was there flaine. In the city were flaine about ten thousand persons. Thus was the famous city of Antioch, which the Turks had long before by famin taken from the Christians, againe recovered the third day of Iune, in the yeare of our Lord God, 1098. I O Q & The poore oppressed Christians in Ierusalem hearing of this so notable a victory, gaue secret thanks vnto God therfore, and began to lift up their heads, in hope that their deliuery was now at hand. Of this victory, the Princes of the army by speedy messengers and letters, certified their friends in all countries, so that in short time, the same thereof had filled a great part of the world. Among others, Eohemund Prince of Tarentum, vnto whom the city was deliucred, fent the joyfull newes thereof vnto Roger his brother Prince of Apulia: whose letters as the most certain witnesses of the history before reported. I thought it not amisse here to set down:

Isuppose you to have understood by the letters of your sonne Tancted, both of the great feare of some The letters of of vs, and the battels which we have of late with our great glory fought. But concerning the truce, and Prince of Tathe proceeding of the whole action it had rather you should be certified by my letters, than the letters of rentum, to his others. King Cassianus had required a time of truce : during which, our fouldiers had free recourse brother Roger into the Citie without danger, untill that by the death of Vollo a Frenchman, flaine by the enemie, lia, concerning the truce was broken. But whilest it yet seemed a bard matter to winne the Citie, one Pyrrhus a Citi- the winning Sen of Antioch, of great authoritie and much deuoted unto me, had conference with me concerning the of Antioth. yeelding up of the Citie , yet upon condition, that the government thereof should be committed to me in whom he had reposed an especial trust. I conferred of the whole matter with the Princes and great Commanders of the armie, and casily obtained that the government of the Citie was by their generall confent allotted unto me. So our armic entring by a gate opened by Pyrthus, tooke the citie. Within a few daies after the towne Aretum was by us affaulted, but not without some losse and danger to our per-F fon by reason of a wound I there received. I affure you much of the valor of your son Tancied, of whom I and the whole armie make such account and reckoning, as is to be made of a most waliant and resolute Generall. Farewell. From Antioch.

Editain van licutenant) with a great army besieged Edessa, with purpose after the taking thereofitchaue G relieued the citie of Antioch. But this being notably defended by Baldwin, left there of purposewith a strong garrison for the desence thereof; the Turke fearing in the meane time to lose Antioch, the lasest resuge of the Turks in all those pasts, rose with his armie, and set sorward against the Christians: where by the way, it was his fortune to meet with Sanfadolus, Ceffianus his fon, but lately fled from Antioch, by whom he vnderstood of the losse of the city, and by what means the fame was most like again to be recourred:vpon which hope, Corbanas with his mightic army kept on his way, with a full resolution to set all vpon the fortune of a battell. Whole comming much troubled the Christians: for that although they were possested of the citie, yet was the Castle still holden by the Turks. Neuerthelesse leaving the Earle of Tholous in the city, with a competent power for the keeping in of them in the castle, they H tooke the field with the whole strength of the armie, and so in order of battell, expected the comming of their enemies: who couragionfly comming on, as men before refolued to fight, ioyned with them a most terrible and bloudie battell. Neither were they in the meane time idle; for that the Turks having in the castle received invnto them certain supplies from Corbands, fallied out vpon them that were left for the fafegard of the citie, and had with them a cruell conflict. Thus both within the citie and without, was to be seen a most dreadful fight towards fore of resolute men, with great slaughter on both sides: yet after long fight and much effusion of bloud, the fortune of the Christians prevailing, the Turkes began to give ground, and aftercourragain the wards betook themselues to plain slight, whom the Christians hardly pursuing, made of them city of Antioch a wonderfull flaughter. In this battell were flaine of the Turkes aboue an hundred thousand, and of the Christians about foure thousand two hundred. There was also taken a great prey; for besides horses & other beasts for burden, were taken also five thousand camels with their lading. The next day, being the 28 of lune, the castlewas by the Turks (now dispairing of relecte) yeelded up unto the Christians.

Antioch thus taken, Hugh the French kings brother, sirnamed the Great, was sent from the rest of the Princes to Constantinople, to have delivered the citie vnto Alexim the Emperor according to the agreement before made. But he, guilty in conscience of his owne foule dealing with them, vnto whom he had fent no reliefe at all during the long and hard flege of Antioch; neither performed any thing of that he had further promifed, and therefore knowing himselfe hated of them; had in distrust so great an offer of the princes, so eaill descrued, and K therefore refused to accept thereof. Whereupon Bohemand by the generall consent of the noteround the whole armie was chosen Prince, or (as some call him) King of Antioch.

After this long fiege and want of victuals, enfued a great plague in the armie of the Christians, the Autumne following, whereof it is reported fifty thousand men to have died, and among them many of great account. But the mortalitic ceasing, the Christians in Nouember following, by force tooke Rugia, and Albaria, two cities, about two daies journey from Antioch: where diffention arose betwixt Bohemund and Raimand, who of all others only enuied at the view his preferment vnto the principalitie of Antioch: Bohemund for the common causes sake, Beliemand and gaue way vinto his adversarie, and retired with his souldiers backe againe to Antioch; after whom followed the Duke Godfrey, and the Earle of Flanders with their regiments. The rest L of the Princes wintred some at Rugia, some at Albaria, from whence Raimund made fundrie light expeditions further into the enemies countrey: but the foring approching, the Christian Princes with all their power tooke the field againe. Bohemund with them that remained with him, departing from Antioch, besieged Tortosa. Raimund in the meane time with the rest, befieging the citie of Tripolis: who become much more infolent than before, by reason of some fortunate roades he had made upon the enemies the last winter, ceased not still to maligne Rohemund and his proceedings: matter enough to habe divided the whole power of the Christians, and to have turned their weapons upon themselves: which Bohemund well considering, rose with his armie; and because he would not with his presence trouble the proceeding of the religious warre, retired himselse to Antioch. After whose departure, Godfrey and the M Earle of Flanders, took Gabella, a citic about twelue miles from Laodicea, and from thence returned againe to the fiege of Tortofa, whither Raimund came also with his armie, having before driven the Gouernour of Tripolis to such composition as pleased himselfe, and to furnish him with such things as he wanted. Thus was Tortosa hardly on three sides besieged

A by the Christians, but so notably defended by the Turks, that after three months hard siege. the Christians were glad to depart thence: and marching long the sea side, spoiled the countrey about Sidon. But for a finuch as that city was not easily to be won, they left it, and encamted before Ptolemais, which they also passed by: the governour thereof sending them out victuals with such other things as they wanted; and voon summons given promising to yeeld the city after they had once won the city of Ierusalem. From thence they came to Castarea in Palestine, where they solemnly kept the feast of Whitsontide and so to Rama, which they found for feare forfaken of the Infidels. Marching from Rama, and drawing neere to Icrufalem they in the vantgard of the army, upon the first descrying of the Holy citiv, gauc for iov The extending divers great flouts and outcries, which with the like applause of the whole army was so dou- in finant won the bled and redoubled; as if therewith they would have rent the very mountaines, and pierced first describe the highest heavens. There might a man have seen the demont passions of these most worthing of the best pair. and zealous Christians, vetered in right divers manners: some, with their eies and hands cast vp towards heaven, called aloud vpon the name and help of Christ Iesus, some, prostrat vpon their faces, killed the ground, as that whereon the Redeemer of the world sometime walked: others, joyfully faluted those holy places which they had heard so much of, and then first beheld: in briefe, every man in fome fort expressed the toy he had conceived of the fight of the Holy city, as the end of their long trauell.

This most antient and famous city, so much renowned in holy Writ, is scituate in an hilly countrey; not watred with any river or fresh springs, as other famous cities for most part be. neither yet was it well feated for wood, or passure groundsbut what wanted in these, and sich other benefits of nature, was by the extraordinary bleffings of the most Highest so supplied. as that the lewes there dwelling, so long as they kept the ordinances of the Lord, were of all other people in the world justly accounted the most happy & fortunate. Yet in those so blesfed times, was this city for the fin of the people of tentimes deliuered into the enemies hand. and the glory thereof defaced; as well appeareth by the whole course of the historie of holy scripture, as also by the antient and approved histories, as well of the Iewes themselues, as others. Neuertheleffe it still rose againe (though not in like glory as before in the time of king Dauid, Solomon, and the other next inceeding kings) and io was ftill repeopled by the Iews, til that at last according to the foretelling of our Saujour Christ, it was with a great and of all others most lamentable destruction, vtterly rased and destroicd by the Romans, under the leading of Vespasian the emperor, and his noble som Titus, 40 yeres after our Sauior his precious death and passion. Since which time, it was neuer vntill this day againe repaired, or yet well inhabited by the lews but lying buried in the ruins of it felfe, all the reigne of Domitian, Nerua, and Trajan, untill the time of the great Emperour Aline Adrianus, it was again by him re- teraftiem reedified about the yeare 136, and after the name of him called Ælia; who together with the edifiedly the name changed also in some part the antient scituation of the city. For whereas before it was great Empirer feated upon the steep rising of an hill, in such fort that towards the East and the South, it o. are uerlooked the whole ground, having only the Temple and the castle called Antonia, in the Abelge dishighest part of the city, Adrian translated the whole city vnto the very top of the hill, so that Havand forthe place where our bleffed Sauior suffred his most bitter passion, with the Sepulchre wherin twee of the holy he was also laid, and from whence he in glory rose againe, before without the city, were then the first straight from whence he in glory rose againe, before without the city, were then the first straight from whence he in glory rose againe, before without the city, were then the first straight from whence he in glory rose againe, before without the city, were then the first straight from whence he in glory rose againe, before without the city, were then the first straight from whence he in glory rose againe, before without the city, were then the first straight from whence he in glory rose againe, before without the city, were then the first straight from the first stra inclosed within the wals thereof, as they are at this day to be seen. Yet for all that, the Em- distinction peror being dead, in processe of time this new built city recovered again the antient name of Vellasianus Ierusalem, wherby it hath euer since, and is at this day yet known. This city fore edified, the the impero, Emperor first gaue to the Iews, whom he afterwards that tout agains for their rebellion, and rand the his gaue it to the Christians to inhabit ouer whom one Marke first Bishop of the Gentiles there, warming and had the charge. But for a smuch as the Roman Emperours were at that time altogether Idola- "coursed" out ters and perfecutors of the poore Christians, the Church also at Ierusalem, with others, endu-the invideding red fundry and many grieuous perfecutions, vnder the Emperors Antonius, Commodus, Senerus, Godfir of nud. Maximinus, Valerianus, Aurelianus, Dioclefianus, & Maxentius, till that at length Constantine the there can the Great, converted vnto the faith of Christ about the yeare of Grace 320, suppressing the Partition of the gan Idolatry, gaue generall peace to the afflicted Church: whereby the Christian Church at "% Ierusalem for the space of three hundred yeres after, happily flourished under the Greek emperors, vntill the time of the Emperor Phocas; who having most cruelly slain the good Empe-

rour Maurice with his children, and so possessed himselfe of the empire, gaue occasion there. by vnto Chofroe the Persian King, in reuenge of the death of Maurice his father in law, with all his power to inuade Syria: who as a tempest bearing downe all before him, tooke also by force the city of Ierusalem, having that yere, which was about the yere six hundred and ten; flain almost an hundred thousand Christians. But Phocas the vsurper beeing by them of his guard most cruelly staine, and Heraclius succeeding in his stead, Chofree was by him againe dris uen out of Syria, and the holy city againe recourred, about theyere 624. In these great wars against the Persians, Heraclius had vied the help of the Arabians, called Scenite, a warlike people of Arabia Deferta, altogether giuen to the spoile: who the wars now ended, expecting to have received their pay, were contrary to their expectation, and without all reason rejected by them that should have paid them, with very foule and contumelious words; as, that there was not mony enough to pay the Christian soldiers of the Latines & the Greeks, much lesse those vile dogs (whom they fo called, for that they had but a little before received the damnable doctrine of the false Prophet Mahomet, the great seducer of the world, who even in that time flourithed.) V pon which discontentment they at their returne revolted from the Empire, and joined themselues vnto their great Prophet, and so afterwards vnto the Caliphs his successors. extending his doctrine, together with his foueraigntie, to the vtmost of their power and that with fo good successe, that in short time they had ouerrun all Ægypt, Syria, the land of Promise, and taken the holy city. With these (the disciples of Mahemet and his successors, the Sarafins, for so now they would be called) the Greeke Emperours insuing had for certaine veres diuers couslicts, with diuers fortune, for the possession of Syria. But at length wearied out, and by them ouercome, they left the aforefaid countries wholly to their deuotion. Hereby it came to passe, that the Sarasins for the space of 370 yeres following held these countries, with many others in great subjection, oppressing still the poore Christians in Ierusalem with most grieuous tributes and exactions wnto whom they yet left a third part of the city for them to dwell in, with the Temple of the Sepulchre of our Sauior, and mount Sion; not for any deuotion, either vnto them, or those places, but for that it yeelded them a great profit by the recourse of deuout Christians travelling thither:reserving in the meane time vnto themsclues, the other two parts of the city, with the Temple of Solomon, before re-edified by the Christians. Now whilest the Sarasins thus triumph it in the East, and not in the East only, but ouer a great part of the West also; contenting themselves with such tributes as they had im- K posed vpon the subdued nations and countries sup start the Turks, a wagrant, sierce, and cruell people; who first breaking into Asia (as is before declared) and by rare fortune aspiring vnto the kingdome of Persia, subdued the countries of Mesopotamia, Syria, with the greatest part of the leffer Asia and Iudaa, together with the Holy City: who both there and in all other places, held the poore oppressed Christians in such subjection and thraldome, as that the former gouernment of the Sarafins seemed in comparison of this to have been but light and eafie. Neither was there any end or release of these so great miseries to have been expected, had not God in mercy by the weake meanes of a poore hermit, stirred vp these most worthy Princes of the West to take vp arms in their defence, who having with their victorious armies recouered the lesser Asia, with a great part of Syria, were now come unto this Holy City.

gerufalem befich ged by the Christians.

The gouernor of Ierusalem vnderstanding by his espials, of the proceedings of the Christians, had before their approch, got into the city a very strong garrison of right valiant souldiers, with good store of all things necessarie for the holding out of a long siege. The Christians with their army approching the city, encamped before it on the North; for that toward the East and the South, it was not wel to be besieged, by reason of the broken rocks and mountaines. Next vnto the city lay Godfrey the Duke, with the Germains and Loranois:ncere vnto him lay the Earle of Flanders, and Robert the Norman: before the West gate lay Tancred and the Earle of Tholous: Behemund and Baldwin were both abfent; the one at Antioch, the other at Edessa. The Christians thus strongly encamped, the fifth day after gaue vnto the city a fierce affault, with such cheerefulnesse, as that it was verily supposed, it might have beene even then M woon, had they been fufficiently furnished with scaling ladders: for want whereof, they were glad to give over the affault and retire. But within a few daies after having supplied that defect, and prouided all things necessarie, they came on agains afresh, and with all their power gaue vnto the City a most terrible assault, wherein was on both sides seene great valour, poA licie, and cunning, with much flaughter, vntill that at length the Christians weary of the long fight, and in that hot countrey, and most feruent time of the yeare, fainting for lacke of water were glad againe to for lake the affault, and to retire into their trenches : only the well of siloe veelded them water, and that not sufficient for the whole campe; the rest of the wels which were but few, being before by the enemie either filled vp or elfe poyloned.

Whilefi the Christians thus lay at the fiege of Ierusalem, a flect of the Genowaies arrived The Genowater at loppa; at which time also agreat fleet of the Ægyptian Sultans lay at Ascalon, to have come to the brought reliefe to the befieged Turkes in Ierufalem, whereof the Genowaies understanding. and knowing themselves to weake to encounter them at sea, tooke all such things out of their thips as they thought good, and fo finking them, marched by land vnto the campe. There was among ft the fe Genowaies divers enginers, men (after the manner of that time) cunning in making of all manner of engines fit for the befieging of cities: by whose device, a great moving tower was framed of timber and thick plancks, couered ouer with raw hides, to faue the fame from fire: out of which the Christians might in fafety greatly annoy the defendants. This tower being by night brought close to the wall, serued the Christians in stead of a most fure fortres in the affault the next day: where whilf they ftriue with warlike valor & doubtful victory on both fides, from morning vntil mid-day, by chance the wind fauoring the Christians, caraed the flame of the fire into the faces of the Turks, wherwith they had thought to have burnt the Tower, with such violence, that the Christians taking the benefit therof, and holpen by the tower gained the top of the wall:which was first footed by the Duke Godfrey, and his brother Eustace, with their followers, and the enfignes of the Duke there first fet vp, to the great en-

men and children, without respect of age, sex, or condition: the slaughter was great, & the sight lamentable, all the streets were filled with blond, and the bodies of the dead, death triumphing in every place. Yet in this confusion, a wonderfull number of the better fort of Turks. A most crueit retiring to Solomons temple, there to do their last denoire, made there a great and terrible fight, was the state of the solomons temple. armed with despaire to endure any thing; & the victorious Christians no lesse distaining, after the chostian the winning of the city, to find there fo great refishance. In this desperat conflict, tought with and the tuest, in the wonderful obstinacie of mind, many felon both sides: but the Christians came on so fiercely, remple of tewith defire of bloud, that breaking into the temple, the formost of them were by the prosse of rujatena them that followed after, violently thrust upon the weapons of their enemies, & so miserably couraging of the Christians, who now pressing in on every side, like a violent river that had broken ouer the banks, bare downcall before them. All were flain that came to hand, men woflaine. Neither did the Turks thus oppressed, give it over, but as men resolved to die, desperatly fought out with inuincible courage, not at the gates of the Temple only but even in the midst thereof also, where was to be seene great heaps, both of the victors and the van quished; flaine indifferently together. All the pauement of the Temple swam with bloud, in such fort, that a man could not fet his foot, but either upon fome dead man, or ouer the shooes in bloud. Yet for all that, the obstinate enemy still held the vaults and top of the Temple, when as the darkenesse of the night came so fast on, that the Christians were glad to make an end of the flaughter, and to found a retreat. The next day (for that proclamation was made, for mercy to be shewed vnto all such as should lay down their weapons) the Turks that yet held the vpper part of the Temple, came downe and yeelded themselves. Thus was the samous City of Icrufalem with great bloudshed, but far greater honor, recoursed by these worthy Christians, in the years 1099, after it had beene in the hands of the Infidels about four hundred yeares.

The next day after, having buried the dead, and cleanfed the city, they gave thanks to God with publike praiers and great rejoycing. The poore Christians before oppressed, now ourcome with vnexpected joy, welcommed their victorious brethren with great joy & praife; and the foldiers embracing one another, sparing to speake of themselves, freely commended each others valour. Eight daies after, the Princes of the army meeting together, began to confult about the choice of their king; among whom was no such difference, as might wel shew which was to be preferred before the others. And although enery one of them for proweffe & defert, feemed worthy of fo great anhonor, yet by the generall confent of all, it was given to Robert Duke of Normandie: who about the fame time hearing of the death of the Conquerour his Father; and more in loue with his Fathers new gotten Kingdome in England, in hope thereof, refused the Kingdome of Ierusalem, then offered vnto him: which at his returne he found possessed by William Rufus his younger brother, and so in hope of a better, refusing the G

worse, vpon the matter lost both.

Godffer Dake of Buillonby the generall confest of th:

After whose departure, Godfrey of Buillon Duke of Loraine (whose ensigne was first displaid vpon the walls) was by the generall confent both of the Princes and the armie, faluted King. He was a great foldier, and endued with many heroicall vertues, brought up in the court christian army of the Emperour Henrie the fourth, and by him much emploied. At the time of his inauguracoolen first king tion, he refused to be crowned with a crowne of gold: faying, That it became not a Christian man there to weare a crowne of gold, where Christ the Sonne of God had for the saluation of mankind, sometime worne a crowne of thorne. Of the greatest part of these proceedings of the Christians, from the time of their departure from Antioch, vatill the winning of the Holy Citic, Godfrey by letters briefly certified Bohemund, as followeth:

Godfrey of Buillon, to Bohemund King of Antioch, greeting.

Ofier long trauell, having first taken certaine townes, we came to Ierusalem : which Citie is enuironed with high hils, without rivers or fountaines, excepting onely that of Solomons, and that a very little one. In it are many Cisternes, wherein water is kept, both in the Citie and the Country therea. bout. On the East, are the Arabians, the Moabits and Ammonits. On the South, the Idumaans, Agyptians and Philistians : Westward alongst the sea coast, lie the Cities of Ptolemais, Tyrus, and Tripolis: and Northward, Tiberias, Cefaraa Philippi, with the countrey Decapolis and Damafco. In I the affault of the Citie, I first gained that part of the wall that fell to my lot to affaile, and commanded Baldwinto enter the Citte: who having flaine certaine companies of the enemies broke open one of the eates for the Christians to enter. Raymond had the Citie of David, with much rich foile reelded wate him. But when we came unto the Temple of Solomon, there we had a great conflict, with fo great flaughter of the enemy, that our men flood in bloud about the ancles: The night approching, wee could not take the upper part of the Temple, which the next day was yeelded, the Turkes pittifully erging out for mercie : and fo the Citie of Terusalem was by vstaken, the fifteenth of July in the yeare of our redemption 1099, thirtie nine daies after the beginning of the fiege, foure hundred and nine yeares after it fell into the hands of the Sarafins in the time of Heraclius the Emperour. Besides this, the Princes with one consent saluted mee (against my will) Ring of Ierusalem : who although I feare to K take upon me fo great a Kingdome, get I will doe my denoire, that they shall easily know me for a Chrifian King, and well deferning of the univerfall Faith; but lone you me as you do, and fo farewell. From lerusalem.

Whilest these things were in doing at Ierusalem, such a multitude of the Turks, and Sarasins their confederates (now in their common calamitie all as one) were assembled at Ascalon(a citie about fine and rwentie miles from Ierusalem) to reuenge the injuries they had before received, as had not before met together in al the time of this facred war. Against whom, Godfrey (the late Duke, and now King) affembled the whole forces of the Christians in those countries, and leaving a strong garrison in the new woon citie, set forward: and meeting with L them, joyned a most dreadfull and cruell battell; wherein (as most report) were stain of the Infidels, an hundred thouland men, & the rest put to flight. The spoile there taken, far exceeded showfund larts all that the Christians had before taken in this long expedition. Godfrey after so great a victorie, returning to lerufalem, gaue vnto God most humble thanks. The rest of the Princes returned either to their charge, as did Bohemund to Antioch, Baldwin to Edessa, Tancred into Galiley, whereof hee was created Prince; or else having now performed the vetermost of their vowes, returned with honour into their owne countries. This was of all others the most honourable expedition that ever the Christians tooke in hand against the Infidels, and with the greatest resolution performed; for the most part, by such voluntarie men, as moued with a deuout zeale, to their immortal praise, spared neither life nor living in desence of the Christian M faith and religion; all men worthy eternall fame and memory. Not long after, enfued a great pestilence (the ready attendant of long war and want) wherof infinit numbers of people died, christian King and among the rest Godfrey, the first Christian King of Ierusalem, never to be sufficiently commended:who with the generall lamentation of all good Christians, was honourably bu-

Godfrey of

A ried in the Church of the Sepulchre of our Sauior on the mount Calvary, where our Savior fuffered his passion; in which the Christian Kings succeeding him were also afterwards buried. He departed this life the eighteenth of Iuly, in the yeare of our Lord 1100, when hee had yet scarce reigned a full yeare. Whose tombe is yet at this day there to be seen, with an honorable infeription thereupon.

After the death of Godfrey, the Christians made choice of Baldwin his brother, Countie of Baldwin Coun-Edessa, who leaving his former gouernment to Baldwin syrnamed Burgensis, his neer kinsman, brother was came to Ierusalem honorably accompanied, and was there by the Patriarch on Christmasse Goulder, second day with all solemnitie crowned King, Anno 1101. He, aided by the Venetians and Genoa's Koltenfalm. at sea, and by Bohemund King of Antioch by land, took from the Infidels the city of Casfaria Stratonis, standing upon the sea side, and ouerthrew certain companies of the Egyptian Sultans at Rama. But vnderstanding that the Christian Princes of the West were comming to his aid with a new power, hee glad thereof went ro meet them, and fafely conducted them to Ierusalem alongst the sea coast, by the cities of Berythus, Sydon, Tyre and Ptolemais, all vet holden by the Enemy. At which time the Turks at Ascalon having received great avd from the Arabians and Egyptians, inuaded the country about Rama, where betwixt them and the Christians was fought a most cruell battell, wherein the Christians received a most notable ouerthrow, many of their great Commanders being there flain; and amongst the rest, Stephen Earle of Charters (but lately returned home from the former expedition, and now come back againe) and Stephen Earle of Burgondy and Tholous; yea the King himselfe hardly escaped the Enemies hand, and after many daies came at length to loppa, after it had bin constantly before reported him to have been in that battellalfo flain. Who having there in hast repaired his army, came again speedly upon his enemies, fearing as then nothing lesse, and overthrew them with such a slaughter, as that they had small cause to rejoice of their former vi-Aorie. Neither were the reft of the Christian Princes in the other parts of Syria and Palestine in the mean time idle, but fought by all means to inlarge their territories. Tancred prince of Galile having raised a great power, tooke Apamea the metropolitical city of Coelosyria, and after much toile won also the city of Laodicea. Baldwin also the Gouernor of Edessa, befieging the city of Carras, had brought the befieged Turks to fuch extremity, that they were about to have yeelded the city; when suddenly he was set upon by a great army of the Turks fent from the Persian Sultan for the reliefe of the besieged; and being there overthrowne, was himselse there taken, with Benedist the Bishop, and one Iosceline his kinsman: Who after five yeares imprisonment, found means with the Turk that had taken them, to redeem themselues. to the great offence of the Persian Sultan, and of the Sultan Solyman.

King Baldwin after the late victory lived for a feafon at some good rest in Ierusalem, vnmolested of his enemies: but knowing his greatest safety among such warlike people, to consist in arms, he vpon the fudden raifed the whole strength of his kingdom, and laid siege to Ptolemais otherwise called Acon, a city of Phænicia, standing vpon the rivage of the sea; where he found such resistance, that he was glad to raise his siege and depart, having done nothing more than spoiled the pleasant places about the city. By the way in his return backe again it fortuned him to meet with certain companies of the enemies adventurers, by whom he was in a skirmish mortally wounded, although he died not thereof in long time after: for albeit that K. nathwin the wound was by his furgeons healed up, yet was the griefe thereof fo great, that at length it mortally wound brought him to his end. Yet lie notwithstanding the former repulse, the next yeare encouraged by the comming of the Genoa fleet, laid hard fiege again to Ptolemais both by fea and Ptolemait work land, which after twenty daies fiege was by composition yeelded vnto him.

Shortly after, the Gouernor of Aleppo, with certain other of the Turks great Captains in those quarters, having joined their forces together, and so invaded the countrey about Antioch, were by Tancred (whom Bohemund at his departure into Italy had left Gouernor of that city) notably encountred and put to flight. At which time also the Caliph of Egypt, sending great forces both by sea and land against the King of Icrusalem, was in both places discomsited, at land by the Christians, and at sea by tempest.

Bohemund in the mean time with a great army of voluntary men and others (wherein hee is reported to have had five thousand horseand forty thousand soot) returning towards the holy Land, in reuenge of many injuries done by Alexton the Emperour, vnto the Souldiers of this facted war, contrary to his faith and promise to them before given; by the way landed G his men in Epirus, and grieuously spoiled the countrey about Dirrachium part of the Emperors dominion. Neither made he an end of spoiling, vntill he had inforced the Emperour for redresse of so great harms, to make peace with him, and again by solemne oath to promise all securitie and kindnesse vnto all such Christian souldiers as should have occasion to travel to or fro thorow his countries during the time of this religious war. After which agreement hee put to sea again, and so returned for Ierusalem. But whilft he staid at Antioch, he shortly af-Bediemund dies ter there died in the yeare 1108, leaving the principalitie thereof unto his yong fon Behemund a child, under the tuition of his nephew Tancred.

Siden won.

Yet were the cities of Berytus, Sidon, and Tyre, along & the sea coast, in the enemies possession: for the gaining wherof Baldwin the King raised a great army, and so came & laid siege H to Berytus, which after many sharp assaults he at length won the 23 day of Aprill, in the yere 1111, and put to sword most part of them that he found therein. The same yeare also he assifted by a fleet fent vnto him out of Norway, befieged the city of Sydon; which the Citisens (seeing themselves now beset both by sea and land) at length yeelded vnto him by composition the 19 day of December. After which victorie he dismissed the fleet, and returned himselfe in triumph to Ierusalem. Now of all the samous cities alongs the sea coast of Phoenicia and Palestine, from Laodicea to Ascalon, was only the city of Tyre that remained in the enemies hand: which City Baldwin also hardly besieged; neuerthelesse it was so well desended by the Turks, that after he had all invain lien before it the space of 4 months, he was glad torise with his army and depart. It fortuned that within two yeares after, the Turks with a mighty army fent from the Persian Sultan, inuaded the country of Coelifyria, where spoiling all before them as they went, they came and incamped upon the sea coast necre unto Tyberias. Against whom Baldwin gathered the whole strength of his kingdom; with whom also Tancred (who now reigned in Antioch, the yong Bohemund being dead) with the County of Tripolis, and the rest of the Christian Princes, joined their forces: who all together marching forward, came and incamped not far from the enemy, being in number far more than they. Mendus Generall of the Turkes army (for fo I find him called) understanding of their approch, sent out certain companies of his men to skirmish with them; against whom the Christians also sent out others, who incountring them, easily put them to flight, beeing before commanded so to do, of purpose to K draw the Christians into the danger of a great strength lying in ambush to intrap them: which according to the Turks defire fell out; for the Christians fiercely pursuing the flying enemy fel into the ambush, and so before they were well aware, were belet on all sides by their enemies: to whose rescue other companies of Christians comming in, and others also from the Turks, both the great armies were at length drawn into the field, where betwixt them was joined a most fierce and terrible battell, with great slaughter on both sides; but at length the multitude of the Turks preuailing, the Christians were put to the worse, and so glad to fly:after whom the fierce enemy hardly followed, not without great flaughter: in which flight the King himselfe hardly escaped, with Arnolphus the Patriark. Whilft Baldwin was thus busied abroad, the Turkes and Sarafins from Afcalon came and befreged Ierufalem, beeing then but 4 weakly manued: but hearing of the kings comming, and that the army of the Christians daily increased with new supplies out of the VVest by sea, they retyred home again, having burnt certain flore-houses full of corn, and spoiled such things as were subject to their fury.

Long it were to recount all the hard conflicts and combats this king had with the Sarafins and Turks, which for breuitie I passe ouer, contented to have briefly touched the greatest. In the last yeare of his reign, having for certain yeares before lived in some reasonable peace, he made an expedition into Egypt, where he with much difficultie won Pharamia a strong city vpon the sea coast, which he joined vnto his own Kingdome. After that, he went to the mouth of the river Nilus, and with great admiration learned the nature of that frange river: and hauing therin taken abundance of fish, he returned into the city, and there with the same seasted M himselfe with his friends. But after dinner he began to feel the griefe of his old wound, and growing therof ficker and ficker, returned with his army toward Ierufalem, where by the way necrevito a City called Laris he died (to the great griefe of all the Christians) in the yeare 1118. His dead body being brought backe vnto Icrusalem, was there royally buried, neere vnto his brother Godfrey, after he had reigned eighteen yeares: whose sepulchre is yet there also to be feen, fast by the sepulchre of his brother.

The late King thus dead and buried, the Christians with one confent made choice of his Baldwin Brad coufin Baldwin, firnamed Brugensis, gouernor of Edessa, who by the name of Baldwin the second King of Irrawas the second of Aprill, in the yeare 1118, solemnly crowned King of Ierusalem. He was of falen. stature tall and well proportioned of countenance comely and gratious, having his hair thin 1118 and yellow, his beard mingled with some gray haires, hanging downe to his brest; his colour fresh and lively for one of his yeares. He was a man of great courage, and therefore no lesse redoubted of his enemies, than beloued of his subjects, who had in him reposed great hope both for the defence and inlarging of that new gained kingdome. Against him the same summet the Caliph of Egypt, aided by the king of Damasco and the Turks, in reuenge of the losse he had in the expedition the yere before received, raifed a great power to invade him both by fea and land. Against whom Baldwin also opposed himselfe with his whole strength, and so came and incamped within the fight of his enemies. In which fort when both armies had lien the one facing the other by the space of three months, they both role; the Christians fearing the multitude of the Turks, and the Turks the valor of the Christians, and so retyred without any notable thing done.

This yeare died Alexius the Greeke Emperor, who even from the beginning of this facred War, secretly repined at the good successe of the Christians in Syria, although his Empire were thereby greatly inlarged : after whom fucceeded Calo loannes his fonne, who all the time of his reign right worthily defended his territories in the lesser Asia, against the inuasion of

Not long after, Gazione of the greatest Princes of the Turks in the lesser Asia, with the King of Damasco, and Debeis King of Arabia, joining their forces together, with a great army inuading the country about Antioch, came & incamped not far from Aleppo: against whom Riger Prince of Antioch, not expecting the comming of Baldwin and the other Christian princes his confederats, but prefuming of his own strength, went forth with greater courage than discretion, whereunto his successe was answerable; for encountring with them at too much odds, he was by them in a great battell ouerthrown, where himselfe was flain, with most part of his army. Of which fo great a flaughter, the place wherein this battel was fought was afterward called the field of bloud. But whilft the Turk's after forgreat a victorie carelesly and at pleasure romevp and down the country, Baldwin setting vpon them ouerthrew them with a great flaughter, and so put them to flight. After this victory gained by the Christians the fourteenth of August, in the yeare 1120, King Baldwin in great triumph entred into Antioch, 1120 and so joined that principalitie vnto his ownerkingdome,

The yeare following, the Turks with another army inuaded the same countrey againe: for repressing of whom, whilst Baldwin and the other Christian Princes were making their preparations, it fortuned that Gali their great Commander suddenly died of an Apoplexy i vpon whose death they retyred without any further harm doing. Neuerthelesse the next spring, the 1 1 2 2 King of Damasco aided by the Arabians, entered againe with a great army into the countrey about Antioch, and there did some harme : for the Antiochians now destitute of their owne Prince, and Baldwin (who had taken upon him their protection) beeing far off, and otherwise busied at Ierusalem, were much more subject vnto the inrodes of their enemies (stil at hand) than before when they had a Prince of their own still present among them. But Baldwin aduertised therof, was making toward them with a puissant army, sooner than they had thought it could have bin possible. Of whose approch the Turks understanding, retyred again out of the Country: after whom the King thinking it not good to make further pursuit, turned a little out of the way, and took by force Garaze, one of the strongest castles of the kings of Damasco, built but the yeare before; which because it was not without great charge and danger to be den he rased down to the ground.

Baldwin notwith standing that he had many times thus honorably repulsed his enemies, wifely confidering how he was on the one fide befet with the Turks, and on the other fide with the Sarafins which yet reigned in Ægypt (the Kingdome of Ierusalem lying as it were in the mouth of them both) thought it good betime to craue aid of the Christian Princes of Europe; and to that purpose had sent divers his Embassadors unto divers of them, but especially vnto the Venetians, whom of all others hee thought fittest at his need to yeeld him reliefeby G fea. It fortuned in the mean time, that Balas the Persian Sultan with a great army of the Turks inuaded the country about Antioch; whereof Baldwin understanding (although he certainly knew he should ere long receiue aid from the other Christian Princes his friends, but especially from the Venetians, and might therefore with great reason have protracted the war until their comming; yet being theswith much moued, or else his destiny for equiring, raised such forces as he had of his owne, and without longer staying for his friends, with greater courage than good freed fet forward; and so joining hattell with the enemy, was therein overthrown. with the greatest part of his army, and himselse taken prisoner in the fight, with certain other of his best commanders, who all together were carried away captings wnto Carras.

Vpon the report of this ouerthrow, and taking of the King, the Caliph of Egypt on the H other fide took occasion with all his power to invade the kingdom of Jerusalem, and having in himselse purposed the vtter ruine thereof, beside the great army, which hee sent thither by land (which lay incamped not far from Ascalon) he put to sea a huge fleet also of you fail for the diffreshing of the sea towns, which he well knew were nototherwise to be won, This fleet of the Sarafin Kings (for Egypt with the kingdomes of Tunes and Moroccowere yet in poffession of the Saratins) ariting at Ioppa, there put ashore their land forces, and hardly belieged the town both by sea and land. But whilest they thus lay in great hope to have won the town Dominicus Michaelduke of Venice, firred up by Calixius then Bishop of Rome, came to Cyprus with a fleet of two hundred fail for the reliefe of the Christians in Syria and the holy land; and hearing of the diffresse of Ioppa, nothing dismaid with the number of the Ene- I mies fleet, hasted thither, and came so suddenly vpon them, that he had (as some report) ouer, throwne them before they could put themselves in order or be in readinesse to fight: or as fome others fay, after a great and doubtfull fight, having funk or taken many of them, and put the rest to flight, he obtained of them a most glorious, victorie. With like good fortune also were the Sarafins querthrowne in a fortunate battell at land neere unto Afcalon, by the Lord Euflace, vnto whom the defence of the kingdom was committed after the taking of the King, who not long after so great a victory died, no not long after fo great a victory died,

Toppa relieued as is aforefaid, the Duke of Venice trainelled by land to Terufalem, where he was honorably received by Guarimund the Patriark, and the confederation before made betwixt King Baldwin and the Venetians, youn the fame conditions folemnly again renued.

The Sarafins thus notably discomfited both by fea and land, and the Christians therby not a little encouraged, and joining their forces together with the Venetians, came and the first of March laid fiege vnto the antient and strong city of Tyre,; which they having beset both by sea and land, gaue therunto many a sharp assault; which the Turks, as men fighting for their liues and wines right valiantly repulled. In which for the fiege was continued longer than the Christians had at the first thought should have needed; yet at length after four moneths fiege, the Turks fore weakened with often affaults, and hardly pinched with want of food, all their flore being spent, yeelded the city by composition. Thus was the city of Tyre (the most famous port of Phoenicia) yeelded vnto the Christians the twenty ninth of Iune, Anno 1124 The third part of this city was given to the Venetians, according to the composition made. I betwixt them and the Kings of Ierusalem, That of all such cities as were by their helpe won from the Infidels in Syria, they should have a third part, with one street, and free traffick in all the rest of the cities of the kingdom of Ierusalem. Shortly after was King Baldwin, set at libertie for the ranfom of an hundred thousand ducats, after he had bin eighteen months prisoner among the Turks.

The Duke of Venice having now spent almost three yeares in this sacred expedition, and well confirmed the state of the Christians in Syria, returning home, by the way tooke the Islands of Chios, Rhodus, Samos, Mitylen, and Andrus, with the city of Modon in Peloponelfus; all places belonging to the Greeke Emperour. Which he did in reuenge of the injuries done by the Emperor in the time of his absence : who enuying at the successe of the Christi- M ans in Syria, as had his father Alexius before him, had in the absence of the Duke infested the territories of the Venetians, for the which he was now justly requited with the losse of a good part of his own.

Baldwin also not vamindfull of the injuries vato him before done by the Turks, in requitall thereof, inuaded the country about Damasco, and there in three notable battels overthrew the King and spoiled the country; wherein hee took so great a prey, that therewith he redeemed his daughter, whom he had at the time of his deliuerance left in hostage with the Turks for the paiment of his ranfome. He also ouerthrew the Sarafins at Ascalon, who aided by the Caliph of Egypt, had fundry times inuaded the country about Ierusalem. And so having wel repressed his enemies, for a space lived in peace.

Not long after, Hugh Paganus first Master of the Templers (an Order of Knights first be- Damasco in our in the reign of this Baldwin) before tent to crave aid of the Christian princes of the West by the Christian against the Turks and Sarasins, returned with a great number of zealous Christians, ready to lay down their lines for defence of the Christian faith and religion: with whom Baldwin and the other Christian Princes of Syria joining their forces, set forward and besieged Damasco. the regal city of the Turks in those quarters. But such was the strength of this city with the valor of the defendants, and contagiousnesse of the airc, that the Christians (the heavens as it were then fighting against them) were glad to raise their siege, in vain begun, and so to retire.

While things thus passed in Siria, Falk County of Turin, Mayn, and Anjou, a man almost of fixty yeares, bauing as he thought best disposed of his rhings at home, had for deuotions fake taken upon him an expedition into the Holy land. In the time of which his preparations Embassadors came vnto him from king Baidwin, offering him in mariage Melisenda (or as some cal her Margaret) his eldest daughter, with succession into the kingdom of Ierusalem in dowry, if he should survive the King; and in the mean time to content himselfe with the cities of Tyre and Ptolemais. Of which offer he accepted, and fo held on his journy before intended. It fortuned about three yeares after, that the King fell dangerously sick, and feeling his death drawing on having laid afide all regal dignitie, caused himselfe to be removed out of his own palace, into the Patriatks house, which was necret vnto the Temple of the Sepulchre, & there calling voro him Fulk the County his fon in law, with his daughter, and his fon Baldwin, then But two yeares old in the presence of the Patriarke and divers other Princes and great Commanders, commended vinto them the government and defence of the kingdome, appointing Fulk to fucceed him : and taking vnto himselse the habit and protession of a Monke, if hee should have longer lived, presently after gave up the ghost the two and twentieth day of Au- The death of guft, Ashd 1231 whereof he reigned with much trouble thirteene yeares, and was folemnly Buldwin the feburied in the temple vpon mount Calvary, with the other two Kings Godfrey and Baldwin his King of Icrafa.

The Kings funciallended, the Princes of the kingdome with one accord made choice of 112 k Fulk the old County Earle of Anjou, for their King : who the fixt of September was with all folemnitleby Williamithe Patriark crowned in Ierusalem. This man in the beginning of his reign befide his troubles abroad, was also vext with domesticall and intestine discord; Pantius County of Tripolis (teking by force of arms to have rent the dukedom of Antioch from the kingdom. And Hugh County of Ioppa, for feare of due punishment for his treason, joining himself with the Sarasins of Ascalon, and so with them insesting the territories of Ierusalem. to the greathurt of the Christian State, and advantage of the Infidels. Which troublesome broiles were yet afterward by the King, partly by force, partly by the mediation of the Patriark and other princes (who feeing the danger therof like to enfue, had interpoled themselves) well appeared. Vengeance yet neuertheleffe still following both the aforefaid traitors: Pontim being thorry after flain by the Turks, and Hugh dying in exile.

Besides these domesticall troubles, the Tutkes also inuaded the countrey about Antioch, where they were by the fudden comming of the King ouerthrown, with the loffe of their tents and exceeding great riches. And that nothing might be wanting vnto the disquieting of the flate of that new erected kingdom not long after, John the Conftantinopolitan Emperor (togetherwith the empire, inheritoral fo of his fathers malice against the proceedings of the Christians in Syria) with a purifiant army passing thorow the lesser Asia, and by the way raking by force Tarfuithe metropolitical city of Cilicia, with the whole province thereinto belong it warme and befreged Antioch, which Fulk but a little before had, together with Constance the daughter and Heire of the late Duke of Antioch , given in marriage to Raimand County of Poyton, for that purpose sent out of France. But in this so dangerous a state of that Chaiftian kingdom, the other zealous Christian Princes interposed themselves as mediators between the Emperor (pretending the same to belong vnto his Empire) and Raimund G that was in possession thereof: and in fine brought it to this end, That Raimund for the present fubmitting himselsevnto the Emperor, should from thenceforth hold his dukedome of him, as of his Lord and Soueraign. Vpon which agreement the Emperour returned vnto Tarfus, where he wintered, and so afterwards to Constantinople.

Much about the same time, Sanguin one of the Turks great Princes inuading the Countrev about Tripolis, belieged the castle of Mont-Ferrand; vinto the reliefe wherof Fulk comming with his army, was by the Turks ouerthrowne, and for the fafegard of his life glad to take the refuge of the castle, the County himselse beeing in that battell taken prisoner. After which victorie, the Turkes laid harder frege vnto the Castle than before; the besieged in the meane time being no lesse pinched within with famin, than pinched without by the enemy. In this H the Kings hard distresse, the other Princes having raised the whole power of the kingdome. were comming to his reliefe: whereof the Turk hearing, offered of himselfe to give them all leave freely to depart, and to fet the County at libertie, to that they would deliver vnto him the Castle. Of which his offer they gladly accepting, yeelded vp the strong Hold and so departed. The King by the way meeting with the army, thanked his friends for their forwardnesse, and so returned to Ierusalem.

Emperor.

About foure yeares after, John the Constantinopolitan Emperour with a great army came the Greek Em. again into Syria, with purpose to hauevnited the famous City of Antioch vnto his empire, seem seekerin Transe to have and so to have made a way into the kingdome of Ierusalem, whereafter hee had now a good just the, while longed. But comming thither in hope to have found the Cilicians and Syrians ready I to have received him, he was deceived of his expectation, being shut out of the Latines, and not suffered to enter but vpon his oath, and that with some few of his followers; and so after due reuerence done unto him, quietly to depart, without any stir or innouation in the city. In reuenge of which difgrace, at his departure hee gaue the suburbs of the City as a prey to his greedy foldiers, pretending the same to be done for want of victuals: who made haucek of all that came to hand, not sparing the very fruit trees, but cutting them down to dresse their meat withall. Having thus vnder colour of necessitie revenged the disgrace received, he returned into Cilicia and there wintred: where one day for his disporrhunting of the wild boar, and hauing wounded him with his boar-spear, the wild beast therwith inraged, and with all his force bearing forward upon the weapon, forced the Emperours hand backward upon the point of a poisoned arrow that was hanging in a quiuer at his back, and so was therewith lightly wounded. Neuerthelesse as light as the wound was, such was the strength of the poison, that the griefe thereof still increasing, and his hand and arm more and more swelling, there was no remedie to be found, but that his arm must be cut off: which desperat and wncertain cure he abhorring, and in the extremitie of his pain oftentimes faying. That the Greek Empire was not to be gouerned with one hand; ouercome with the firength of the poison died. In whose place fucceeded his yongest son Emanuel, Alexius and Andronicus his two elder sons being both dead at his fetting forth vnto this fo vnhappy an expedition. It fortuned about this time also, that the kingdome of Ierusalem beeing now at peace, that Fulk the King with the queen his wife lying at the city of Ptolemais in the time of Autumn, L it pleased the Queen for her disport to walk out of the city, vnto certaine pleasant sountaines there by in the country; for whole companie the King would needs go also, with certaine of his Courtiers: where by the way it chanced that certaine boyes running along the field, put vp an hare that was fitting in a furrow; after which all the Courtiers on horseback gallopped amain, with notable outcries and hollowing. Among the reft, the King to be partaker of the sport, forcing his horse to the vetermost of his power, in the midst of his course sell, together with his horse foundring under him, and in falling chanced to fall his head under the horse; death of Fulk with whose weight and the hardnes of the saddle he was so crushed, that the braines came out both at his note and ears. In this pittifull case being taken up for dead, and with great healinesse being carried back, he yet breathing lay speechlesse three daies, and so died the thirteen M of November, Anno 1142. His dead body afterwards brought to Ierusalem, was there with great magnificence, and the generall lamentation of all his fubjects, buried with the other Kings his predecessors.

Now had the late King left behind him two fons, Baldwin about the age of thirteen years and Almerick about the age of feuen. Of the elder of these two the Christian Princes made Baldwin, third choice, who by the name of Baldwin the third, was (together with Melefinda his mother, part- of that name, ner with him in the kingdome) vpon Christmas day with great solemnitic crowned King of walden. Ierusalem, in the yeare 1142. About which time Sanguin the Turk, taking hold of the discord 1142 betwixt Raimund Prince of Antioch, and lescelin county of Edessa, came & with a great power besieged Edessa, the County being at the same time absent; and did so much, that at length he took the city by indermining it, where the bloudy Turk exercised all manner of crueltie voon the poore Christians in the city. By the losse of this samous city, so large a territory fel again into the hands of the Turks, as that three Archbishopricks were thereby drawne from the Church of Antioch. The Turke encouraged by this victory, Araitwaies after besieged Cologenbar, another strong town of the Christians. One night drinking liberally with his friends, he was by one of them in his drunkennesse stabled, and so slain, and the siege raised. In whose stead Woradin his fon succeeded.

Baldwin in the first yeare of his reign recovered from the Turks the castle of Sobal, a strong Hold beyond Iordan, which he notably fortified for the defence of that side of his kingdom against the incursions of the Turks. But the next yeare undertaking an expedition against the King of Damasco, he was by Noradin the Turke, the Kings sonne in law, so hardly beset in his returne, as that it was accounted a thing miraculous, how he with his army escaped his

The report of the losse of Edessa, with the miseries there endured by the Christians, being bruted thorow all parts of Christendom, greatly mooued the Christian Princes of the West. Whom Engenius the third then Bishop of Rome, ceased not both by himselfe and by his Legats, to stirve to take that facred war in hand. And therein wrought so effectually, that almost in every province of Christendom preparation was made for the relief of the distressed Christians in Syrians. Of all others, Conrade the third, then Emperour of Germany was most forward, who aided by the German Princes and others, with an incredible number of voluntarie conrade q. E.m. ward, who aided by the German r international and the state of the perior of Germany and the rewith fee for many, taker upward on this facred expedition. Of this his deuout purpose he had before certified Emanuel and bin an Exthe Greek Emperour, thorow whose countries hee was to passe, crauing that hee might by his pedition into good fauor fo do, and for his money to be relieued with victuals, and other fuch things as hee should have need of for himselfe or his people, promising in most quiet and peaceable maner to passe, without any harm doing unto his territories or subjects. All which the Greek Emperor, commending his zeale, feemed in most large terms willingly to condescend vnto. Neuertheleffe he inwardly repined therat, wishing indeed no bester successe vnto the Christians in this fo honorable an expedition, than did the Infidels themselues, as by the sequell of his doings well appeared. For Conrade with his populous army, indeed a terror vnto the Greekes, entring into the confines of the Constantinopolitan Empire, found all things in shew friendly (for why, Emanuel had before given out ftreit command, that good flore of victuals & all other necessaries should be ready at all places to be sold as the army was to passe) but they were not far come into the country, but that in the tail of the army still followed certaine strong companies of the Greeks, to keep the fouldiers from fragling from their enfigues, roaming about in the country, now and then cutting them (hort as they took them at advantage. And stil the further they trauelled, the more it was to be seene in the countenances of the discontented Greeks, how vnwelcome guests they were. Yet still on they went thorow the countries of their diffembling friends, little differing from open enemies, until they came to Philippopolis; in departing from whence, such discord rose betwixt them that were in the rereward of the army & the Greeks that followed them, that it was like to have come to plain battel, had not those broils by the discretion of some of the wifer fort bin in good time appealed. So marching on they came to Adrianople, & in few daies after to the plain called Cherobachi, thorow which the river Melas hath his course which in summer being almost dry, in Winter or any other great downefall of water, right fuddenly ouerfloweth his bankes, and fo drowneth the whole countrey, that then it feemeth no more a river bu a fea, and swelling with the wind, is not to be passed ouer but by great boats. This river then suddenly rising by night, by reason of the great rain that then fell in such abundance as if the floud gates of heaven had bin opened, for overflowed the place wherein the army lay incamped upon the fide thereof, that with the violence of the water were carried away not only many weapons, faddles, garments, and fuch @ other the foldiors necessaries, but euen the hories and mules, with their burthens, yea & great. numbers of armed men them felues also, a most miserable & lamentable thing to behold. Many valiant men there fell without fight, and died, no man killing them: to be tall helped not. neither did valor stand them in any stead; they perished like hay, and were carried away like chaf, with such outcries and lamentation, that they which saw it verily said that the wrath of God was broke into the camp: such a sudden inundation had ouerwhelmed all, that happy was he could make shift for himselfe, without regarding one another. This missortune fore troubled the Emperor with his whole army : neuerthelesse the water being again fallen, & all put in fo good order as in fuch a confusion was possible, he marched on to the imperiall City. which the fuspitious and malitious Greek had before notably fortified, and ftrongly manned the with armed men gliftring vpon the walls, as if it should have bin presently assaulted.

Conrade approching the city, was not suffered to enter, but persuaded by the Greek Emperour, forthwith to transport his army ouer the streight, with promise to supply his wants with what soeuer he should require. Which was done in such hast, as if nothing had bin further ro have bin regarded, but only to have them shipped ouer. In which service the Greekes spared no labor or kind of vessell that might serve to transport them. The Greeke Emperour in the mean time, by men secretly appointed for that purpose, keeping account of the number that passed, untill that wearied with the multitude, they ceased further to number them. But when they were once shipt ouer, then began the couers malice of the Greek Emperor forthwith to appeare. For, betides that they trusting to his promises, had brought little or no provision ouer with them, the country people by his appointment brought nothing vnto them to fell as before: and they of the towns and cities that their gates against them as they marched, not affording them any thing but at an extreme rate, for which they would first receive their mony by ropes cast down from the wals, and then deliuer them what they pleased therefore, yea and oftentimes nought at all. Among many other vile practifes not befeeming Christians, the mischicuous Greeks to porton the soldiers; mingled limewith the meal which they sold vnto the army, where f many of the hungry foldiers greedily feeding, died. Whether the Greeke Emperor were priny thereoor no, is not certainly known, but certain it is he caused counterfeit mony to be coined, of purpose to deceive them: and in brief, there was no kind of mischief to be practifed against them, which either he himselfe denised not or fer not others to denise K. to the intent that their posteritie, terrified by this so vnfortunat expedition, might for ever be afraid to take the like again in hand. And that nothing might be wanting that malice could denife he had fecret intelligence with the Turks themselves concerning the freength of the army plotting vnto them the means how the same might best be deseated; whereby it came to passe that some part thereof was by Pamplano a captain of the Turks overthrown necre Bathis, and many flain. But attempting to have done the like vnto that part of the army that pale fed thorow Phrygia, they were themselves overtaken in their owne device, and overthrowing with a great flaughter. After which, the Turks in great number, to flay the Christians further passage, kept the river Mocander, incamping you the further banke of that winding Ricounter fur uer with a most huge army. There these worthy Christians right well declared that it was but L their patience, that the Grecian legions that had before so long followed them, with their countries and cities they had passed by, were not to them become a prey. For the Emperout comming to the river fide, where was neither bridge nor boat to passeouer, and finding the great army of the Turks on the other side ready to giuehim battel if he should adjunture the river, with their archers standing upon the very bank side; he retyred a little out of the danger of the foot, and there incamping, commanded his fouldiers to refresh themselves and their horses that night, and to be ready against the next morning to join battell with their enemies they were fo far come to feek for. Little reft ferued him that night : early in the morning beforeday he arose, and arming himselfe, put his whole army in order of battelle and id also the enemy on the other fide of the river, with their battalions orderly placed, and their archers were on the bank fide, ready to give the first charge on the Christians, if they should adventure to come ouer. Both armies thus standing in readinesse, the one in sight of the other, and nothing but the winding river betwixt them ; the Emperour before refolued to fight with cheerfull countenance and speech encouraged his men as followeth.

lies ran with bloud, and the fields were couered with the bodies of the dead. Many of the G Italians were wounded with the Turks arrowes, and but few or none flain : but what a multim tude of the enemies there fell, the fundry and huge heaps of bones, to be compared unto great hils, did long time after well declare; whereat every man that trauelled that way did worthis Nicetas Cho- ly wonder, as did I my felfe, faith Nicetas Choniates in reporting this history. Not much volike that, is reported of the Cimbers, flain by Marine in fuch number, that of their bones the counhand Com- try people about Marcellis where the field was fought; long'time after made walls for the des neno Impera- fence of their vineyards.

After this fo great a victorie, the Christians without resistance came to I conium the chief feat of the Turkish Kings in the lesser Asia, which they hardly belieged. Neuerthelesse such was the frength of the city, being frongly fortified both by nature and art together with the H valor of the defendants, that lying there long they little prevailed, preffed in the meane time with greater extremities and wants in the camp, than were the befieged in the city wherupon enfued fuch a mortality (people daily without number dying in the army) that the Emperor was glad to raise his siege and to return into his own country. The chiefe cause as wel of this fo great a mortalitie, as of the ouerthrow of fo notable an action, most men a cribe vnto the malice of the Greekes, who not without the privitie of their Emperour (as it was commonly bruted) mingled lime with the meale which they brought to fell into the army, whereof the hungry fouldiers desirously feeding, were therewith poisoned, and so miserably died. Of the certain time of this journy of the Emperors into Afia, Authors agree not; howbeitwee must

This expedition though not fo fortunat as lewas at the first well hoped of, yet profited the Christian commonweal in this, that the Turkes therewith throughly busied, and doubtfull of the event thereof, Baldwin in the mean time fortified Gaza (fometimes a famous city of the Philliftims, but as then ruinous) which ferued as a most furebulwarke for the defence of that part of his kingdome towards Egypt; and also for the diffresting of Alealon, the only refuge of the Egyptians left in that country: which firong city flanding upon the fea fide, hee with all the power of his kingdome afterward befreged both by fea and land: vnto the relief wherof the Caliph of Egypt (after he had beene fine moneths by the Christians besieged) sent a strong fleet of seventy gallies. At which time also on the other side Noradin the Turke (who had now got into his hand all the kingdome of Damafco) to withdraw the Christians from K the fiege of Ascalon, befieged Paneada, from whence he was by the valour of the Citifens repulled, as was also the Caliphs fleet at sea, and the siege at Ascalon continued. Whereat length the Christians after long batterie had made a breach in the wall; but giving thereunto an affault, they were with great loffe of their men repulsed, and the breach again by the enemic repaired; who to the greater despight of the Christians, hanged over the wals in ropes the dead bodies of their flain: with which spectacle the chiefe commanders of the army were for moued, that they with all their power returned agains to the affault, with a full resolution to ingage thereon their whole forces; which they so couragiously performed, that the besieged discouraged with the great flaughter of their men, and now with true valor ouercome, craued parley, and so couchanting that they might with their lives in safety depart, agreed to yeeld vp the city, which they accordingly performed. The spoile of the city was given to the soldiers, and the gouernment thereof vnto Almerick the Kings brother, Earle of Toppa. By this victory great fecuritie was gained vnto that fide of the kingdome, the enemy having now no. place left in those parts whereon to set his foot.

The bonorable expedition of Lewis King of

About the same time also (or as some write, even at the same time together with the Emperor) Lews the French King the eighth of that name, took you him the like expedition for the reliefe of the Christians in the Holy land: who fetting forward with all the Chiualrie of France, and accompanied with divers other great Princes, with a right puiffant army came to Grecks, and in Constantinople, where he was by Emanuel the Emperour honorably received with all the outchiffian prin. ward shows of feigned curtesie that could be deuised : but having passed the streit, and landed M ett of Spila, in Asia, he found nothing answerable to that the dissembling Greek had before most largely brought to me. promifed. And to diffres him the more, he was by falle guides before corrupted by the emperor, conducted thorow the most desolate and barren countries, where by the way a wonderfull number of his Souldiors perished of hunger and thirst: many of them also being cut off in the streit and difficult passages, or as they strayed from the army by the Turks themselves, appointed by the malicious Emperor for that purpose. Yet after many dangers passed, and his army forewasted, he came at length into Syria, and laid siege vnto Damasco the royal seat of Damasco in Noradin the Turkish King; which he so notably impugned, that the defendants were almost by long the out of hope to be able for any long time to hold out. Neither had it otherwise hapned, had Freuch king. not Envy, the inseparable attendant of all honourable actions, frustrated so great a hope: for the befreged Turks beeing brought to great extremitie, and now even at the point to have yeelded the city, certain of the Christian princes of that country, understanding that the king had promifed the government of that so famous a City vnto Philip Earle of Flanders, if it should be won, and secretly grudging to have a stranger preferred before themselves, corrupted alfo(as fome fay) with the Turkes gold, fraudulently perfuaded the King to remoue from that part of the city where he lay, and might in fine have taken the same, to another far stronger, where after he had lien a great while, thrining with no small extremities, he was inforced for want of victuals, to raise his siege and depart. And so without any thing done worth the remembrance, returned again into France, detesting the very name of Emanuel the Greeke Emperor, by whose sinister dealing so notable an expedition was brought to be of none effect, to the great discouraging of all other Christian Princes for taking the like again in hand.

Now had the state of the Christians in Syria, for certain years after the aforesaid expeditions, rested in good peace: when Noradin the Turk, moued with some injuries done by the Christians vnto the Turks and Arabians who by the leave of K. Baldwin dwelt in the forrest of Libanus, came and streitly besieged Paneade a city of the Christians there by : vpon whom the Paneade takes Christians in the city, now brought vnto great extremity, made a most desperat sally, and had and sacked by with the Turks a sharp and cruel fight; but oppressed with the multitude, and inforced to retyre, they were so hardly pursued, that the Turk's together with them entred the city, and out to sword all that came in their way. Neuerthelesse the greater part of the Citisens (by good fortune) had in good time before retyred themselves into the Castle, which was of great Arength, and there flood vpon their gard. Of whose distresse, with the taking of the city, Baldwin hearing, raised a great army, and so set forward to relieue them. But Noradin hearing of his comming, and doubtful of his own strength, after he had taken the spoil of what he could, fet fire on the city and so departed. The citisens thus deliuered, repaired again the wals of the Paneade again city, the Kings power still defending them: Noradin with his power all the while lying close repaired by the in the woods not far off, still awaiting the offer of some good opportunitie to take the Christians at advantage: which shortly after fell out according to his ownedefire; for the King doubting no such matter, but supposing him to have bin quite gon, having at his returne sent away all his footmen, followed after himselfe, accompanied only with his horsemen, and they also not very strong but as he was passing the river Iordan, he was suddenly set vpon by Noradin & the Turks, and after a sharp conflict ouerthrown. The king himself with some few hardly escaped to Saphet, a town thereby; most of his nobility being there either slain or taken prisoners: among the rest, Bertrand of Blanquefort master of the Templers, with divers others of great name fel at that time into the enemies hands, and so were caried away prisoners.

After this victory, Noradin strengthned with new supplies from Damasco, came againe and besieged Paneade, in good hope that the Citisens, discouraged with so great an ouerthrow of the King, and out of hope to be by them reiieucd, would now either yeeld the city, or else nor be able long to hold it out. But the King contrary to his expectation, had in shorter time than was thought possible, raised a great power, and aided by the prince of Antioch and the Countie of Tripolis, was marching to the reliefe of the city. Of which approch Noradin understanding, although he had made divers breaches in the walls, and brought the citifens almost to vtter despair, rose with his army and departed. And so Baldwin having now twice relieved the befreged city, returned also to Icrusalem.

Many an hard conflict with the Turks had this yong King afterwards, during the fortunat time of his reign, wherein that trouble some Kingdome happily sourished amidst the miscreants; all which to recount were long and tedious. Yet among other things it is worth the remembrance, how that Noradia the Turke, then King of Damasco, besieging Sueta a Cassia belonging to the Kingdome of Ierusalem, was in a set battell by Baldwin ouerthrowne and put to flight, with the losse of the greatest part of his Army. King Baldwin had before married Emanuel the Greek Emperors neece : and now the fame Emperor, by Guido Stephanus and G Trifling his Embassadors, requested to have given him again in mariage one of the Kings nigh kinswomen. Vnto whom the King, after mature deliberation had concerning the matter, of fered him Marilde, an honorable Lady, the fifter of the County of Tripolis; whom the Emperor refused : and afterward by the consent of the King made choice of Mary the daughter of Raimund Prince of Antioch, lately dead. Which the County of Tripolis taking in euill part. in reuenge thereof, by certain men of war whom he put to lea, grieuously insested the frontiers of the Emperours Dominions. Now during the time that the mariage was in folemnifing, the King made his abode at Antioch, at which time he fortified the castle of Pontisservoon the river Orantes, against the incursions of the enemies. But lying there, he according to his wonted manner, to preuent ficknesse, voon the approach of Winter tooke physicke of Barac a H Iew, the Countie of Tripolis his Physician. After the taking whereof he fell presently into the bloudy flix, and afterward into a confumption: whereby it was verily supposed that hee was poyloned by the lew; and the rather, for that some little part of the same medicine that was left, being giuen to a Dog, he thereof in short time died. The King thus languishing in pain, to change the aire, remoued first to Tripolis, and afterward to Berytus, where he departed this troublesome life, to liue with his Sauiour Christ in blisse for euer. His dead body was afterwards with generall mourning of his Subjects conucyed to Ierusalem, and there solemnly interred by the body of his father. He departed the thirteenth of February, in the yeare of Grace 1163, when he had reigned 21 yeares. He was a man fo gratious, that not on. ly his friends, but even the Infidels themselves (as it is reported) lamented his death. Insomuch that Noradin King of Damasco, his antient enemy, beeing incited by some of his Captaines to inuade his Kingdome at such time as his funeralls were in solemnifing, refused so to do; answering, That compassion and regard was to be had of the just forrow of the Christians his subjects, for that they had lost such a King, the like was hardly againe to be found in the

But leaving the Kingdome of Ierusalem with the greater part of Syria thus victoriously gained from the Infidels; let vs for the orderly continuation of our History againe returne to fee the proceedings of the Turks at the same time in the lesser Asia also: wherein they yet held the state of a kingdome, though not so great as before the comming of the Princes of the West into those countries. After the death of Sultan Solyman (with whom Duke Godfrey and the other Christian Princes had much to do as they passed into Syria) as is aforesaid, one Differed among Mahomet succeeded him : betwixt whom and Master Sultan of Iconium great discord arose, 10. 1 let left Afia, which at length broke forth into open war, to the further weakning of that late shaken kingdome. For the maintenance of which quarrell, as profitable for his state, John Comnenus the Greeke Emperour gaue and to Masut against his enemy Mahomet. Neuerthelesse in short time the two Infidels (professing both one superstition) became friends, and joining their forces, ouerthrew the Emperour with his whole Army as hee lay at the fiege of Iconium; at which time he himselse with much ado escaped by slight. Masur afterwards having got into Atalast the sul- his hands the whole kingdome of the Turks, at the time of his death divided the same among san dissuits his three fons: Vnto Cliz afthlan his eldest fon he gaue I conium his chiefe city, with the towns and provinces subject thereunto. Vnto Ingupasan his other son (or rather as some will have it, his fon in law) he allotted Amasia and Ancyra, with the fruitfull country of Cappadocia, and the places adjoining. But vnto Dadune his other fon or fon in law, he gaue the great cities of Casfaria and Sebastia, with the large countries thereabouts, all sometime a part of the Greek Empire, but then a portion of the Turks, Long it was not after this division of the kingdom, but that these brethren after the manner of ambitious men, forgetfull of the bonds both of loue and nature, fell at discord among themselues: the Sultan seeking the destruction of Iagupasan, and he likewise of him, and that not by secret means, but even by open force of armes. Emanuel the Greeke Emperor in the mean time wishing the destruction of them both, heartily rejoiced thereat, and by Embassadors secretly animating the one against the other, yet M in open shew more fauouring the part of Iagupasan than of the Sultan, by whose aid he obtained against him many notable and bloudy victories: infomuch that the Sultan beeing weary of the quarrell, was glad not onely by his Embassadors to seeke the Emperors fanor, but even in person himselfe to go and meet him, as he came with his army out of Syria, and so to accompanie him vnto Constantinople, where he was together with the Emperour most honorably received, with all the fignes of joy and triumph that could possibly be deviled. The Emperor no leffe rejoycing to be fued vnto by fo great a Prince, than did the Sultan at his so honorable entertainment.

Among other queint deuises of many, for the solemnising of so great a triumph, there was some from an active Turke who had openly given it out, That against an appointed time he would from teres. the top of an high tower in the tilt-yard flie by the space of a surlong: the report whereof Nicolas Co had filled the city with a wonderfull expectation of fo strange a noueltie. The time prefixed shirmer ada being come and the people without number assembled, the Furke according to his promise, nu le many upon the top of an high tower shewed himselfe; girt in a long and large white garment, gathe- many this red into many pleits and foldings, made of purpose for the gathering of the wind: wherwith the foolish man had vainely persuaded himselfe to have houered in the aire, as do birds vpon their wings or to have guided himselfe as are ships with their sailes, Standing thus hovering agreat while, as ready to take his flight; the beholders still laughing, and crying out. Flice Turke, flie, how long shall we expect thy flight? the Emperor in the meane time still diffuading him from so desperate an attempt; and the Sultan betwixt seare and hope hanging in doubtfull suspence what might happen to his countryman. The Turke, after he had a great while houered with his armes abroad, (the better to have gathered the wind, as birds do with their wings) and long deluded the expectation of the beholders, at length finding the winde fit, as he thought, for his purpose, committed himselfe with his vaine hope unto the aire: but in flead of mounting aloft, this foolish Icarus came tumbling downe with such violence, that he brake his necke, his arms, his legs, with almost all the bones of his body. This foolish flight of the Turke gaue such occasion of sport and laughter vnto the vulgar people (alwaies ready to scoffe and jeast at such ridiculous matters) that the Turks attending vpon the Sultan could not walke in the streets underided, the artificers in their shops shaking their arms, with their gooles in their hands as did the Turke, and still crying out, Flie Turke, flie: whereof the Emperor hearing, although he could not choofebut therat finile himfelfe, as not ignorant of the scoffes and taunts of the vulgar people; yet in fauour of the Sultan, who was not a little grieued therewith, he commanded such their insolencie to be restrained.

The folemnitie of the triumph ouerpassed (which by an ominous earthquake at the same time hapning, was somwhat obscured) the Emperor to shew his wealth, & togratise the Sultan, gaue vnto him many rich & royall presents, with such a masse of treasure, as that he much wondred thereat. In requitall wherof, and in token of his thankefulnesse, he again honored the Emperor with the name of his father, and terming himselfe by the name of his son, promised to restore vnto him the city of Sebastia, with the territory thereunto belonging, then part of Dadune his inheritance. Neuerthelesse, all this was nothing else but meere dissimulation, as afterward by proofeappeared: for returning home, bee thrust Dadune indeed out of Sebastia, which he spoyled, with the country thereabout; and forgetfull of his promise, kept it wholly to himselse; and by force tooke also from him the city of Casarea, with the country of Amafia, by him before but lately possessed. In like manner he bent his forces also vpon I agupasan his other brother, who in the very preparation of those wars died: by whose vntimely death the city of Ancyra, with all his dominions in Capadocia, fell into the Sultans hands. Who now possessed of all his fathers kingdome, and swelling with pride, forgetting all former curtesies, inuaded the Emperors territories, and took from him the city of Laodicea in Phrygia; where he did great harme, as also in the country therabouts, killing the people as he went, or else carrying them away with him captines. For the repressing of which outrages, the Empetor with a strong army passed ouer into Asia, and there in the frontiers of his territories fortified Dorileum against the incursions of the Turks. In performing whereof, he, to the example and fitting vp of others, carried the first basket of stones himselfe vpon his shoulders; and vsed such further diligence, that in short time the city was compassed about with strong wals, and deepe ditches, maugie the Turks, who ceased not with continuall alarmes and skirmithes to haue hindred the worke. With like care, and for like purpose he also sortified Subleum, another firong Hold; and leaving in either place a firong garrison, returned again to Constantinople. Neuertheleffe the Turks ceased not with continuall inrodes to doe what harmes they might vpon the frontiers of the Empire, although not altogether with fo good successe as before. perour and the

before, being many times cut off by the garrifons of the late fortified towns: which grieuan. G Vnhindate be- ces still increasing, caused the Emperor to expostulate with the Sultan, as with an vnthankful mixibe Em- man, and forgetfull of fo great kindnes before done vnto him, as the establishment of him in his kingdome came vnto: who with no lesse vehemencie vpbraided him againe with inconstancy & breach of promise, as wel for fortifying the aforesaid places contrarie to the league betwixt them, as for that having promised much more, hee had thereof performed nothing. Thus vnkindnes daily growing vpon euery trifle (asit commonly falleth out among menof great spirit, and jealous of their owne honors) it was daily expected, when the matter should fall out into open and bloody war, both of them being men of great valor, and apt to reuenge the least injurie to them offered. Yet was it the Sultans manner, warily to mannage his warres by his politique and expert captaines; whereas the Emperour being of an hotter nature, and H couragious aboue measure, commonly in all his great expeditions aduentured his owne perfon, without respect what danger might thereof insue vnto himselfe or his state. Long it was not but that the Emperour, fully resolued to be reuenged of so many wrongs done to him and his subjects by the Turks, raised the whole power of his empire, both in Europe and Asia. in fuch fort as if he had therewith purposed, not onely to have rased to the ground I conium the regall seat of the Turkish Sultan, but even veterly to have destroied the whole Nation of the Turks. Thus with a most puissant and populous armie, wel appointed of all things necessarie. he passed ouer into Asia, and so in good order marching through Phrygia, Laodicea, Chonas. (called in antient time Paffas) S. Archangel, Lampis, Calanas, (where the head of the great and famous river Mocander rifeth, whereinto the river Marsyas falleth) and from thence to Chonia, he with cuill lucke, and worfe fpeed, paffed by Myriocephalon, an old ruinous castle. ominous by the name thereof, as by the event in short time after it prooued. And albeit that he marched very circumspectly, still intrenching his armie in every place where he lodged. yet could he make but small speed, by reason of the multitude of his cariages, and of the base people that attended the same. The Turks in the mean while oftentimes shewing themselves in troupes, and in places of advantage skirmishing sometime with one part of the armie, and fomtime with another, but never daring to adventure the fortune of a iust battell: yet by such meanes were the victuallers of the armie oftentimes cut off, and the passages for the Emperor made very dangerous. And the more to diffresse the Christians in their long trauell, they found the countrey before them of purpose destroied by the Turkes, and the water in many K places poisoned, whereof the Christians vnaduisedly drinking, sell into many grieuous diseafes, especially the flix, & therof died in great number. The Sultan in the mean time, although he had in readinesse a right puissant armie of his owne, and had procured great aid from the Persian Sultan his kinsman and chiefe supporter yet searing the doubtfull event of war, and loth to adventure his whole estate you the fortune of a battell, fought by his Embassadors fent for that purpose, to grow to some peace with the Emperour, and that you such honorable conditions, as by the wifer fort were thought not to be at any hand refused: which large offers, the Sultan as defirous of peace, made vnto him not once, but again and againe: which the Emperor neuertheleffe (reposing great confidence in his owne power, and prickt forward by the gallants of the court, better acquainted with the braue triumphs of peace, than the L hard wars of the Turks) proudly rejected, and so dismissing the Embassadors, scornfully willed them to tell their Master, That he would give him answer to his requests, under the wals of Iconium. Which caused the Sultan, now out of all hope of any reconciliation to be made betwixt the Emperour and him, with all his power to take the straits of Zibrica, whereby the armic of the Christians, departing from Myriocephalon, must of necessitie passe. The entrance into these straits was by a long valley, on either side inclosed with high mountains, which towards the North rifing and falling according as the hils gaue leave, opened into diners large vallies, which by little and little growing againe straiter and straiter, with high and craggie rockes hanging ouer on either fide, and almost touching one another, gaue vnto the painfull traveller a most hard and difficult passage.

Emperour.

Into this fo daungerous a valley the Emperor, not fearing the enemies force, desperatly entred with his armie, having neither provided for the clearing of the passages, or safetie of his carriages, in no other order than as if he had marched through the plain and champain countrey, although it were before told him (that which he shortly after, but too late saw) that the enemie had ftrongly possessed both the straits and mountaines to hinder his further passage. The vauward of his armie was conducted by John and Andronicus the fons of Angelus Conflantine, accompanied with Macroducas Constantine, and Lapardas Andronicus: in the right wing was Baldwin the Emperors brother in law; and in the left Maurozomes Theodorus: after them followed the drudges and scullions, with an infinite number of carters and other base people attending youn the carriages, with the baggage of the whole armie: next vnto thefe came the Emperor with the main battell, confishing for the most part of right valiant and worthy soldiers: the rereward was shur up by Andronicus Contostephanus, with a number of most resolute men. They were not far entred into these straits, but that the Turks from the mountaines and broken cliffes, shewed themselues on enery side, delinering their deadly shot from the ypper ground, upon the Christians below, as thicke as haile: neuerthelesse the sons of Angelus with Macroducas & Lapardas, and the vantgard, casting themselves into a three square battel in form of a wedge, with their targuers in manner of a penthouse cast close together ouer their heads, and their archers on every fide luftily bestowing their shot among the thickest of their enemies, by plain force droue them out of the straits they had before possessed, and caused them to retire farther off into the mountains, and so having made themselves way, with little or no loffe passed those dangerous straits; till that at length having recovered the top of a hillvery very commodious for their purpole as the case stood, they there staid, & presently incamped themselues. And happily with like good fortune might the rest of the army have passed also. had they in like order, & with like courage presently followed after: but failing so to do, and troubled with the multitude of their carriages, which could not possibly make anyway throgh those strait & rough passages, (but troubled themselves one another, as also the whole armie) they were from the vpper ground miserably ouerwhelmed with the multitude of the Turkish archers, whose arrowes fell as thick upon them from the mountains, as if it had bin a perpetual tempeft or shoure of haile, to the great disordering and dismaying of the whole armie:which the Turks quickly perceiuing, and therewith incouraged, in great numbers came downe from the mountains, where they had before houered ouer the heads of the Christians. and forcibly entring the plain ground, & comming to handy blows, first ouerthrew the right wing, where Baldwin himfelf feeking to restore his disordered companies, and to stay the surice Baldwin (1884) of the enemic (now raging in the bloud of the Christians) with a troupe of valiant horsemen breaking into the thickest of them, as became a worthie captaine, was there compassed in with the multitude of his enemies, and flaine, together with all his followers, and the greatest part of the whole wing by him commanded: with this victorie the Turks were fo incouraged, that comming down with all their power, they stopped all the waies whereby the Christians were to passe, who as men couped up in those dangerous straits, were not able either to defend themselves, or to help one another; but inclosed as deer in a toile, and one troubling another, were the cause both of the destruction of themselues and others: for by reason of the straitnes of the place, neither could they that were before, retire, neither they that were behinde in the rereward come forward to relieue the one the other, as need required the carriages also, which were many, and in the midst of the army, serving them to no other purpose, than to the hurt of themselves. There were the beasts that served for burden, together with the soldiers over- The missis of whelmed with the Turks shot, the vallies lay full of dead bodies, the riners ran mingled with the Christians, by the Turks the bloud of men and beafts, in fuch terrible manner as is not by pen to be expressed. For the intestain the Christians not able either to go forward or retire, were there in those straits slain like sheep: if straits any courage or sparke of valour were by any shewed against the enemy, fighting at so great advantage, it was but loft, feruing to little or no purpose. And to increase their miseries, the Turks in scorne shewed upon the point of a lance the head of Andronicus Bataza, the emperors nephew, who comming with an army out of Paphlagonia, and Heraclea Pontica, against the Turks of Amasia, was now by the way by them ouerthrowne and slaine. The report whereof, confirmed by the fight of his head, and the confideration of the desperat danger wherein the whole army preferrly Rood, forroubled the Emperour, that he was at his wits end; and with The Emperou diacteres (if it may be fo faid) diffembling his inward gricfe, as one out of comfort, flood doubtfulk which way to turne himselfe. For the Turks having suffered the vantgard to past, with all their power charged the Emperors main battell, as his chief strength, nothing doubting, but that having once ouerthrown it, they should easily & at pleasure ouerthrow the rest. E 2

The desperat ri'olstion of the Emperor. Oftentimes had the Emperour attempted to have driven the enemy out of those straits, and G to to have opened away for his army to have passed, but all in vaine, the power of the Turkes fillincreasing, and they at great advantage notably maintaining the passages before by them takenmeuerthelesse seeing no lesse danger in staying stil, than in going forward, he with a few of his best foldiers, armed with despaire, and resoluted to die, (to which kind of men nothing & is terrible) fet forward directly voon his enemies, willing the rest with like resolution every man to make for himselse the best shift he could. And so with many wounds & sturdy blows both given and received, he by plaine force and might of hand brake through the thickest of his enemies, and so cleaped out of those straits as out of a trap : but yet not without many wounds received in his person, and himselfe so wearied, as that hee was not able to lift up his helmet, being beaten close to his head, and in his target were found sticking 30 of the Turks H arrows, or therabouts, the manifest tokens of his danger. The other legions seeking to follow the Emperor, (for other way they had none) were on euery side hardly assailed by the Turks, and infinit numbers of them flain, befide many others that perished in those straits, ouerborn and trodden to death by their owne fellows. Yea fuch as had the fortune to escape out of one of these perillous straits, were forthwith slaine in the next: for this so daungerous a passage through the mountains, was divided (as is aforefaid into feuen vallies, which giving fair and broad entrances, the farther a man went, grew ftil straiter & straiter, al which straits the Turks had before strongly possessed. At which time also the more to increase the terrour of the day, the light fand raifed with the feet of the men and horses, was by the violence of a most tempestuous wind which then blew, carried so forcibly and thicke, that both the armies grapling together, as if it had bin in the darknes of the night, killed whom soeuer they met with, without respect of friend or foe; by which errour many were euen of their owne friends flaine. In eucry place lay great heaps of Turks flain together with the Christians, and with them great numbers of hories & other beafts for eariage; so that those vallies where this bloudy conflict was, seemed to be nothing else but a large burying place of the Turks & Christians with their horses:but the greatest number was of the Christians that perished, and they not altogether of the common fort, but even of the bravest captaines, and the Emperors neerest kinsmen: the violence of the wind ceasing, and the day cleering vp, there was of all others to be seen (a most wofull foestacle) men yet aliue, somewounded, some whole, couered some to the middle. fome to the neck, with dead carkaifes, in fuch fort, as that they were not able with any strug- K ling to get out: who with their hands cast up towards heaven, with ruthfull voices cried out for help to such as passed by; but all invaine, for every man possessed with the common seare, and by their danger measuring their owne, passed by them without compassion, as more carefull of their owne fafety, leaving them yet living, as men to be numbred among the dead.

Jedt.

The Emperour himselfe, as a man almost now spent, being got out of the danger, stood a while to breath himself under the shadow of a wild peare tree, without any page or man to attend him, whom a poore common foldier espying, and moued with compassion, came to him, and offering him the best service he could, helped him vp with his helmet, and buckled vp his descriteb bim- armor, which before hung dangling here & there about him: when in the mean while a Turke comming in voon him, had taken his horse by the bridle, in hope to have led him away prisoner:whom for all that, the Emperor as weary as he was, with the trunchlon of his broken lance which he had yet in his hand, ftruck down to the ground, and so cleered himselfe of him. Prefently after came also another fort of the stragling Turks, ready also to have seised upon him; and to have taken him prisoner; of whom he flow one with the aforesaid horsemans staffe, and with his fword struck off the head of another of them, and so kept them off, vnrill that by the comming in of ten of his owne fouldiers he was relieued. Departing thence with purposets have joyned himselfe vnto the legions that were gon before in the vauward, he had not gone farre, but that he was much troubled by other Turks that he met, and the heaves of the dead bodies that lay in his way : yet at last, having with much labour and more danger passed the straits, and a river running thereby, being glad in many places to ride ouer the dead bodies of M his own people, and some other of his owne soldiers now resorting vinto him, he there saw tohin Catacuzene, a noble and right valiant gentleman that maried his neece, fighting alone against a great number of the Turks, to be compassed in and slaine, whom he was no way able to relieue. Which Turks also seeing him passe by, followed after him, as after a most rich prey, in hope to have either presently taken or slaine him: whom neverthelesse he (encouraging the fmall company he had about him) notably repulled; and fo fomtime marching forward, and again as occasion required making a stand, came at length long looked for, but most welcomvnto the legions that were gon before, not so forry for their owne hard estate, as carefull of his danger.

But before he could come to those his legions, he ready to faint for thirst, commanded was ter to be brought him out of the river that ran fait by, which after he had tafted, & by the ynpleasant tast therof perceived the same to be insected, he setching a deep sigh, said, o how cin. fortunately have Italted Christian blond! whereunto an audacious and malapert fouldier there present, and more bitter than the cruell time it selfe, replyed, Emperour, thou didst not now, thou The matters didst not now I say first, but long since, and oftentimes drinke the bloud of the Christians, even until thou speech sauce wast drunke againe, at such time as thou didst with most grienous exactions vexe and devoure thy poore to the emperor subjects. Which reproachfull speech the Emperous put vp in silence, making as it he had not the great per heard it. With like patience he also forbare the same railing companion, at such time as hee Emptora feeing his treasures hardly beset, and in danger to be taken by the Turkes, to animate his sol, diers, willed them to do what they could to rescue the same, and to take it for their labor: This treasure (said this impudent fellow) should be fore have bin given unto thy soldiers, rather than now. when as it cannot be recoursed but with great danger and bloudshed: and therefore if thou be a man of valor, as thos woulds be accounted, and as the present case requireth, valiantly charge the Turks (now ready to carry it away) thy felfe, and fo recouer thine euill gotten goods. Whereunto the Emperor answered no more but, Good words fouldier, and so put it vp, as did David the railings of Shimei Shortly after the comming of the Emperor vnto those legions of his vauntgard the only remainder of his army that was left whole and unbroken) came also Andronicus Contoftephanus, who had the leading of the rereward, with divers other of great place, who had by good fortune escaped the fury of the Turks. The miseries of that day (not well to be expressed) being ended by the comming on of the night, the Christians sate in the camp, oppressed with a generall heavine see, leaning their heads upon their elbows, and considering the present danger wherein they were, scarcely accounted themselves among the living: the Turks in the meane time to increase their feare, all the night running about the camp, and crying aloud vnro such of their countreymen in the camp, as had abuned their religion, or for other respects had taken part with the Imperials, that they should that night get them out of the camp, whereas otherwise if they staid vnto the morning, they should be all but lost men. In this so great an extremity the Emperour knowing not what to do, calling together his chiefe commanders, declared vnto them the desperat danger they were in together with his resolution; which was, The fixed fail fecretly himselfe to flie, and to leave the reft, every man to make what shift he could for him-restable to felfe. Which his base determination, so souler could not be, they all wondring ar. as the Emptror. proceeding from a distraughted mind; and by chance overheard by one of the common foldiers that flood without the tent, the same souldier setching a deep sigh, in detestation thereof cryed out with a loud voice, What means the Emperor? And fo turning himself valo him, said. Art not thou hethat haft thrust we into this desolate and strait way, and cast we headlong into destru- bensen of Etion? and hast as it were in a morter inclosed vs in these rocks and mountains ready as it were to ouer-commonstation whelme vs. What had we to do with this vaile of mourning and mouth of hell? Wherefore came we into vato the Emthese mischienous and rough straits? What can we particularly complaine of the Barbartans, which in thefe inextricable windings and straits have thus intangled and befet vs? Was it not thou that broughtst vs bither? Anawilt thou now, as sheep appointed to the slaughter, thy selfe betray vs? With which fo sharp a reprehension the Emperor throughly pierced, changed his former determination for flight, refoluing now to stand by it, what societ happed. But what should be now do, befet with his enemies fill ready to deuoure him? Help he faw none, either in himfelf, or to be expeæed from others, nought remained but death and despaire. In this extremity, al mans help now failing, it pleased the most mighty (which chastiseth & healeth again, which striketh. & yet giueth life, and fuffereth not the fraffe of the finners always to rage into the portion of the iust) with mercifull eye to looke down upon these distressed men, and with an unwonted kind of elemency to touch the Sultans heart, in such fort, as that he which but the other day stood indread of the Emperour, and now having him as lit were in his power, was our reone with his mifery : or as in times past he by Husai Ouerthrew the counsell of Ashitophel, and changed themind of Abfalon to follow such aduice as should bring him to destruction: so then also he G turned the minde of the Turkish Sultan, that (persuaded by certaine of the chiefe men about him, who in time of peace had vsed to receive great gifts and Presents from the Emperor)he of his owne accord by his Embassadors offered peace vnto the Emperour, before that he in so or his own according to him for any; and that vpon the selfe same conditions they had made their leagues before. The Turks in the meane time ignorant of the Sultans resolution, early in the morning were ready to affault the emperors camp, in hope at once to have overthrown his whole power; and with a barbarous outery still riding about it, came so nigh, that with their arrows they slew divers of the Christians within their own trenches: against whom the Emperor sent out Iohn the son of Constantinus Angelus, and after him, Macroducas Constantinus, but to little or no purpose. In the mean time came one Gabras, a man of greatest reputation a- H mong the Turks, Embassador from the Sultan; by whose commandement the Turkes ceased further to affault the camp. This Gabras comming vnto the Emperor, and after the manner of the Barbarians, honoring him with reuerence done euen down to the ground; first presented him with a goodly horse, whose furniture was all of silver, as if it had bin for a triumph, and a rare two edged fword: afterwards falling into a large discourse concerning a peace to be made and with many kindwords as with an inchantment appearing the Emperors heavinesse conceiued of his late losse; he among other pleasant conceits then vttered, seeing the Emperor in a rich robe of yellow ouer his armor, told him, that the colour was not fit for war, as ominous, and portending euil luck; whereat the Emperor a little smiling, gaue it him, with the fortune thereof; and receiving the horse and sword sent him from the Sultan, signed the peace. Amongst other conditions of the peace (which the daungerousnes of the time suffered not the Emperor curioufly to examine) one was, That Dorileum and Subleum, before by him fortified, and the ground of this vnfortunat war, should be again rased. Peace thus beyond all hope being concluded, and the Emperor deliuered of a great feare, purposed another way to return home, to avoid the fight of the flaine: yet was he by his guides, even of purpose as it was thought, led backe the sameway, to behold with his eyes those miserable spectacles of the flain, which could not with any tears be fufficiently lamented: for the straits were made plain, the vallies were raised into hils, and the forrests lay couered with the carkasses of the slaine: no man passed by, but with heavines and griefe, calling by name vpon their friends and familiars there loft. Hauing againe passed those dolefull streits, the Turks were again in the taile of the army: for it was reported, That the Sultan repenting himselfe to have suffered his enemies so to scape out of his hands, had given leave to such as would, to pursue them, but sollowed not himself with his whole power, as before; for most of the better fort of his soldiers loaded with the spoile, were now returned home. Yet these that followed after the army, slew many, especially such as were weak or wounded, and so vnable to follow the rest: although the Emperor to help the matter, had for the repressing of them placed the best of his captains and foldiers in the rereward. Being come to Chonas, and now out of feare of his enemies, he gaue vnto cuery one of his hurt foldiers money to pay for the curing of their wounds, and to bring them into their countries; and comming to Philadelphia, there staid for the refreshing of himself after so great miseries. In his return he rased Subleum, according to his promise, but I not Dorileum: whereof the Sultan by his Embassadors complaining the answered, That what he had, inforced thereto by necessity, promised, he greatly forced not to performe: in reuenge whereof, the Sultan fent out one of his most valiant captains, called Atapac, with 24000 good foldiers chosen out of his whole army, with streit charge to wast and destroy all the emperors prouinces & towns euen vnto the sea side, without sparing man, woman, or child; and in token thereof, to bring with him some of the sea water, an oare, and some of the sea sand: who according to his charge spoiled Phrygia, with the cities along the river Maander, even to the fea fide; and so returning with a rich prey, by the way spoiled what before he had left vntouched. But in passing the river Mæander, when he feared least, he fell into the hands of Iohn Bataza the Emperors nephew, and of Ducas Constantine a most valiant captain; of purpose sent against M him by the Emperour with a great power: where he was by them flain, together with all his army, and the rich booty he had taken, all again recoursed. Many other hard conflicts passed after this, betwixt the Imperials & the Turks, the one continually feeking to annoy the other; all which, for that therein nothing fell out much worth the remembrance, I for breuitie will lingly passe ouer. In these endles troubles did Emanuel the Greek Emperor, whom he had by the space of eight and thirty yeares worthily gouerned that great empire, having in the time of his sicknesse but a little before his death taken vpon him the habit of a Monk, in token he had forfaken the world. All the time of his reigne he was no lesse jealous of the Christian Princes of the West, than of the Turks in the East; and therfore ever dealt with them vnkindly. In time of war he was fo laborious, as if he had neuer taken felicity but in pain; and againe in peace so given over to his pleasure, as if he had never thought of any thing els: after whose death the Turkish Sultan, without resistance invading the frontiers of the empire, tooke Sozopolis, with divers towns thereabout in Phrygia, and long befieged the famous city of Atalia, and fo daily encroched more and more vpon the provinces of the empire, ioining the same unto his owne, which was no great matter for him to do, the Greek empire being then no better gouerned then was the chariot of the Sun (as the poets feigne) by Phaeton, far vnfit for fo great a charge: for Alexius Commenus, otherwise called Porphyrogenitus, being then but a childe of about 12 yeares old, succeeding his grave father in the empire, after the maner of children altogether following his pleasure; his mother with his fathers kinsmen and friends, who aboue all things ought to have had an especiall care of his education, neglecting the old Emperors trust in them reposed, followed also their own delights, without the regard of the ruine of the common-weale. Some enamored with the beauty of the young Empresse, gaue themfelues al to brauery, and the courting of her, other some in great authority, with no lesse desire in the mean time, with the common treasures filled their empty coffers; and a third fort there was (of all the rest most dangerous) who neither respecting their sensual pleasure, nor the heaping vp of wealth, looked not so low, aiming at the very empire it selfe. As for the common good, that was of all other things of them all least regarded. Among these third fort of the ambitious, was old Andronicus, the cousin of the late Emperor Emanuel, a man of an haughtie and troublesome spirit, whom he the said Emperor Emanuel had for his aspiring, most part of the time of his reigne kept in prison, or else in exile, as he now was, being by him not long before, for fear of railing new troubles, confin'd to live far off from the court at Oenum: who now Andronicals hearing of the death of the Emperor Emanuel, of the factions in court, of the childishnesse of affireth. the young emperor Alexius, given wholly to his sports; and the great men put in trust to have feene to his bringing vp, and to the gouernment of the empire, some like Bees to fly abroad into the country, seeking after mony as the Bees do after hony; some others in the mean time like hogs, lying still and fatting themselues with great and gainfull offices, wallowing in all excesse and pleasure, to have no regard of the honor or profit of the common wealesthought it now a fit time (in such disorder of the state) for him to aspire vnto the empire after which he had all his life time longed. That he was generally beloued of the Constantinopolitans, yea and of some of the nobilitie also, he doubted not : for them he had long before by his popular behauior gained, together with the distrust of the late Emperor, jealous of his estate; which as it cost him his liberty, so missed it not much but that it had cost him his life also: but now that he was dead, wanted nothing more than some faire colour for the shadowing of his foule purpose. Among many and right divers things by him thought vpon, was a clause in the oath of obedience which he had given to the Emperor Emanuel and Alexius his fon, Ambiniones. (which oath he had deliuered vnto him in writing) That if he should see, heare, or understand geale of the of any thing dangerous or hurtfull to their honor, empire, or persons, he should forthwith be- commonwease. wray it, and to the vttermost of his power withstand it:which words (not so to have been wrested) as best feruing for his purpose he took first occasion for to work vpon. And as he was a fout and imperious man, therupon writ divers letters vnto the young emperor his coufin, to Theodofius the Patriarch, and other fuch as he knew well affected vnto the late emperor Emamuel: wherin among other things which he wished to be amended in the present government, he seemed most to complaine of the immoderate power and authoritie of Alexius, then prefident of the Councell, who in great fauor with the young emperour, and more inward with the empresse his mother than was supposed to stand with her honour, ruled all things at his pleasure, insomuch, as that nothing don by any the great officers of the empire, or by the emperor himselse, was accounted of any force, except his approbation were thereunto annexed: whereby he was growne to such an excessive pride, having all things in his power as that no man could without danger, as voon the venomous Basiliske, look voon him. Of which his so excessine excessive and insolent power Andronicus by his letters now greatly complained, moved there. G unto(as he would haue it beleeued) with the care he had of the yong Emperors fafety, which could not (as he faid) long stand with the others so great power, which he therfore (as in duty bound) wished to be abridged: aggrauating withall the infamous report of Alexius his too much familiarity with the empresse, which first muttered in court, afterwards flew (as he faid) throughout the whole world. The reformation of which things, as tending to the danger of the person of the Emperor, and dishonor of the state, he for footh as one in conscience bound, with great grauity and eloquence (beeing a very learned man) both in open speech and writing most carnestly defired and thereby sowrought, as that he was generally accounted for a man of great experience (as indeed he was) and a faithful counsellor to the state, a thing much to have bin wished. Wherefore leaving Oenum, the place whereto he was by the Emperour H Emanuel in a fort banished, trauelling towards Constantinople, hee gaue it out in every place where he came, what he had fworne, and what he would for his oaths fake do:vnto whom men desirous of the change of the state, and such as gaue credit vnto the report long before given out, Thathe thould at length become Emperor; flockt in great numbers, as birds about an owle, to see him, and with vain praises to chatter about him. In this sort he came as far as Pa. phlagonia; in euery place honorably received, as if he had bin a deliver of his countrey fent from God. And in the imperial city he was not longed for of the vulgar people only, as their light and load star, but divers of the nobility also by secret messengers and letters, persuaded him to hasten his comming, and to take vpon him the gouernment, assuring him, that there would be none to refift him, or to oppose themselues against his shadow, but all ready to receiue him:especially Mary the yong Emperors sister by the fathers side, with her husband Cafar; who being a woman of great spirit, and grieuing much to see her Fathers Empire madea prey vnto Alexius the president, & the Empresse her step mother, whom she naturally hated, had raifed a great and dangerous tumult in the city against them both, which was not without much bloudshed appealed: and now ceased not by often and most earnest letters (to her own destruction, and her husbands as afterwards it fel out to prick forward Andronicus and to hasten his comming:who by letters and messengers daily comming vnto him from the court fill more and more incouraged, leaving behind him the country of Paphlagonia, came to Heraclea in Pontus, and stil on towards the imperial city, with great curning and diffimulation winning the hearts of the people as hewent. For who was fo stony hearted; whom his sweet & words and abundant teares flowing from his gracious eyes, as from two plentifull fountaines down by his hoary cheeks, might not have moved? All that he did or defired, was (as he faid) for the common good and liberty of the Emperor. By which means he had drawne vnto him a wonderfull number of the rude countrey people by the way as he came. But comming into Bythinia, he was by Iohn Ducas gouernour of the great city of Nice, thut out as an enemy to the state, and so at Nicomedia also. Neuerthelesse, passing by those cities, he held still on his way, until at length he was neer to a castle called Charace, encountred by Andronicus Angelus, fent with a great power against him, by the great president Alexius, who otherwise as an effeminat man, given over to his pleasure, spending the greatest part of the night in royoting by candle light, and most part of the day in his bed, with curtains close drawn, as if it had been L night:yet doubtfull now of the comming of his enemy, left nothing vndon which he thought might help for the affuring of his state. Many of the nobility of whom he stood in doubt the gained vnto him by means of the Emperors mother; who by her rare beauty, fweet words, and gracious behauiour, as with a line drew all men to her. Other some hee ouercame with gifts and great fummes of money, whereof he now made no spare : And so wrought the matter, that no man of any acount or marke went ouer to Andronicus. Who neuerthelesse with fuch followers as hee had, ioyning battell with Angelus (sent against him, as is before said) ouerthrew him and put him to flight. Wherewith Alexius much troubled, in great displeafure and without reason, called Angelus (now fled to Constantinople) to an account for the money deliuered vnto him for the defraying of the charges of that vnfortunate warre who M feeing his misfortune to be so taken as if he had framed it himselfand of purpose betraid the army committed to his charge; by the counfell of his fix fons, being all men of great valur and wisedome, first tooke the resuge of his owne house; but finding himselfe there in no sasetie, with his wife and his said sonnes (two of which came afterwards to be Emperours) presently prefently fled ouer the strait to Andronicus: who seeing of him comming towards him, is reported to have vsed this text of Scripture, Behold I will fend mine Angell before thy face to prepare thy waves: alluding to his name of Angelus, as the presage of his good successe. Wherefore incouraged with the comming of these noblemen his kinsmen, he without longer flay marched directly vnto the fea fide, and there a little about Chalcedon encamped almost right ouer a- And onicks en gainst Constantinople:causing many great fires (moe than needed) to be made in his army, to fight out of make it feeme vnto them of the city greater than indeed it was and with the fight thereof to gainst constant keep the citizens in suspence, with the doubtfull expectation of some great matter to ensue, linoples Wherein he was no whit deceiued, for they having him now as it were in fight, leaving their worke, ran some to the sea side, some up to the hils and high towers to behold his army a far off, willing with their friendly looks, if it had bin possible, to have drawne him over the streit into the city. Alexius knowing himselfe not able by land to encounter with so strong an enemy, (for now some which on foot could not go over to Andronicus, were secretly in heart already with him; other some thought themselves sufficiently to show their sidelity to the Emperor, if fitting still at home, they should take part with neither: for so have subtill heads and aspiring mindes, for the furtherance of their desires, taught the common people both to sav and think) thought it best by sea to auert the present danger; and therfore commanded all the emperors gallies (being before rigged up and ready) to be strongly manned and put to sea. for the keeping of Propontis and the streit of Bosphorus, that Andronicus should not that way passe: now had he determined to have made especiall choice of some assured friend of his own to be General of this fleet, as he had done of the captains and masters, being all his own kinfmen or domesticall fernants: but as he was about to have so done, Contostephanus (firnamed the great captain)opposed himself against it, challinging that place as due vnto himselfe, before al others: so that ouercome by his authority (which it was no time for Alexius now to dispute) he was glad to commit the charge and trust of the whole fleet vnto him, as Generall. Thus having (as he thought) made the fea fure, he fent ouer vnto Andronicus, as from the Emperor, (for al was done in his name) one George Xiphilinus, with letters and other instructions, whereof the effect was, to command him forthwith in peace to returne to the place from whence hee Niphilirus feat came, & not farther to trouble the state: promising him in so doing, the Emperors sauor, with disnicus, demany great honours and preferments to be afterward bestowed vpon him; which otherwise letth valuithmight turn to his vtter destruction. Which letters xiphilinus having delinered, and done his fully in daing meffage, is reported to have fecretly aduited Andronicus to proceed in his purpole, and not in any case to yeeld to that which was of him required : wherwith Andronicus encouraged, proudly rejected the graces offred, and willed the messenger to tel them that sent him, that if The proud in they would have him to returne to the place from whence he came, they should first displace five of dade the proud prefident Alexius, and call him to an account for the villanies he had done then the Emperors mother they should deprive of her honors, & shut her vp as a Nun into some cloyster, there to learn to amend her life; and last of all, that the Emperor according to his fathers will should take you himselfe the gouernment, and not be ouertopt by others, by whose too much authority, his maiesty and honor was (as he said) too much impaired. But within a few days after, Contoftephanus, the great captain & General, caried ouer al the gallies to Andronicus Contoftephanus leaving nothing but their names for the prefident in his rols to look vpon: whose revolutions all other things incouraged Andronicus, & cast Alexius even into the bottome of dispaire. For Alexius in de now Andronicus his friends flocked together in the city, not fecretly as before, but openly in maire, all places: and fuch as witht a change in the state, impudently scotting at Alexius, passed ouer the streit to Chalcedon in great numbers to Andronicus, where having filled their eys with beholding of his goodly person, his cheerfull countenance, & reverent age; and their cares with his sweet words & great promises returned home merry & ioy full, as if they had bin in some terrestriall paradife, filling the city with his praises. After that, Andronicus his 2 sons, John & Manuel, with divers others, whom the president had cast in prison, were set at liberty, & other of his chief fauorits laid fast in their rooms. As for Alexius the president himself, with all his Alexine and friends & faction in the court, they were taken and committed to the keeping of the guard:a hufriends age right strange alteration: but about midnight, Alexins himself was secretly connected out of the preheaded. court to the Patriarchs house, & there kept with a stronger guard than before. A wonderfull Agrange also change & worth marking, a man so honorably born, but yesterday in greatest honor, attended ration.

voon with many thousands, all at his command, having the power to spill or faue : to day in G bonds, in difgrace, in mifery and dispaire, and not so much as a page to wait vpon him: which he taking very grieuoufly, yet complained of nothing more, than that they which had the keeping of him, would not suffer him to sleep or take any rest. Of whose misery, the Patriarch taking pity (although he had of him very euil descrued) yet cheered him vp with comfortable words, perfuading him with patience to endure his hard fortune, and not with fuch freeches as fitted not his present state, to prouoke his keepers to vse him euill: within a sew daies after, early in a morning, he was brought out of the Patriarchs house, and set vpon a very little bad lade, and to with a ragged clout vpon the top of a reed, in maner of an enfigne, caried be. fore him in derission, was broght to the sea side, and there cast into a little boat, was so brought to Andronicus, by whose command, with the generall consent of the nobility, he for his euill H gouernment shortly after had his cies put out. This was the miserable end of the immoderat power, or rather of the infolent fourraignty of Alexius: who, had he with more moderation and vigilanciegouerned, might both have kept Andronicus out of the city, and himselfe from fo great mifery, having at his command all the Emperors treasure, his gallies, with most part of the ftrength of the carpire. Now came the noblemen ouer apace to Andronicus: the last that came, was the reuerend Patriarch Theodofins, with the chiefe of the clergy: of whose approch. Andronicus hearing, went out of his tent to meet him, and falling downe (as great as he was) flat at his horses feet, and in a while after arising again, kissed the patriarchs foot, calling him. the Emperors Sauior, the louer of vertue, the defender of the truth; and comparing him with the famous father Iohn Chryfostome, omitted not any honorable title he could possibly deuise 1 to give him. But the devout patriarch, that had never feen Andronicus before, having now well viewed him, and marked his stern countenance, his subtile nature, his crafty and differabling manuers, his exceeding stature, being almost ten foot high, his stately gate, his proud looke. his continual fenerity, and inclancholy filence; as it were pittying them that to their owne defruction had called fuch a man in faid, Hitherto I hancheard, but now I baue also feen, and plainly knowne; and setching a deep sigh, adjoyning thereuntothat saying of the Prophet David: As we have heard so have we also seen in which words, he couertly quipped the dissembling meeting and submission of Andronicus; and withall called to remembrance the words of the Emperor Emanuel, wherewith he had many times so painted forth Andronicus vnto the Patriarch, as if he would most lively have represented him vnto his view.

All things in the city and in the palace fet in order according to Andronicus his mind, by his two fors, and leave given vnto the Emperors friends to come over vnto him, and to be acquainted with him at length Andronicus himselse departing from Damalum, in a gally crosfed the strait, often times by the way merily singing that faving of the heavenly Psalmist: Returne my foule into thy reft, because the Lord hath done well wnto thee, having delivered my life from death, mine eyes from teares, and my feet from falling. The Emperor with his mother Xene, then lay not in the palace at Constantinople, but at another princely house of his in the country neer vnto Philopatium as Andronicus had appointed : whither Andronicus first went and comming unto his presence, most humbly prostrat before him, with sobbing and teares, as his deceitfull manner was, kiffed his feet. As for the Empresse his mother, he lightly saluted her, and as it L were but for fathion fake, not diffembling in his countenance the old grudge hee bare against her. And so without longer stay went vnto his tent prouided for him not far off; round about which all the great noblemen had pitched their tents also, flocking vnto him as chickens seeking for refuge vnder the hens wings. Having there staid with the Emperor a good while, he was defirous to go vnto the imperial city, and to fee the late Emperour Emanuel his coufins graue. Where entring into the monasterie of our Lady, where he was buried, and comming to his tombe, he wept bitterly, and roared as it were mainely out. Sothat divers of the standers by, ignorant of his diffembling nature, by way of admiration said; O what a wonderfull thing is this ! O how hee loued the Emperour, his cousin, although his fierce and cruell persecutor! And when one of his kinfemen would have pulled him from the tombe, faying that hee had for. rowed for him enough, he would not be remoued, but requested them to suffer him yet a little to tarrie by the tombe, for that he had something in secret to say vnto the dead: and so with his hands cast vp, and close rogether, as if he had prayed, and his cies fast fixed vpon the tomb, he mooned his lips, and secretly faid something, but what, no man could tell. Some faid it was some charme or incantation. But others more pleasantly conceited, said, and (as it afterward appeared) more truly, that Andronicus did triumph ouer the dead Emperor Emanuel, and reuell with his ghoft, with thefe or like words : I have thee now fast, my cruell persecutor by whom I have bin driven to many great extremities: and having wandred almost all the world over, have thereunto bin made by thee a common by word. But now this tombe rifing up with seven tops & prison, out of which thou can't not fart holdeth thee oppressed with a dead seep out of which thou shalt not be awaked, but by the founding of the last trumpe. And now will I be reveneded of thy posteritie and fat is sie my felfe us a lyon with a fat prey; and take sharpe reuonge of all the wrongs thou hast done me, when I have once possessed my selfe of this royall citie.

After that, vifiting all the Emperors stately houses, but staying in no place long, he difoo- Andronics treled of all matters of state, according to his owne pleasure. To the young Emperor he allowed the gourgment hunting, and other his vain delights, with keepers joined to him, to watch not only his going in and out but also that no man should talk with him of any matter of importance: for all the government of the state he took vnto himself; not for that he wished so well thereunto above Others, but fo to drive from the court all them of the contrarie faction to himselfe, that were able to do any thing, and had before borne some sway. The soldiers, whose help he had vsed in aspiring to the gouernment, he rewarded with great bounty; all their offices & preserments he bestowed either upon his own children, or other his great fauorites diuers of the nobilitic of whom he liked not, were by him in thort time driven into exile : fome were by him Drasnigths deprined of their fight, and some others cast in prison, not knowing any cause why, more than that they were by him secretly condemned, for that they were of the nobilitie, or had done fome good feruice for the state, or exiled for their personage, or some other thing that grieued Androvieus or els for the spark of some old displeasure which yet lay hid as fire raked yo in the ashes: so that the state of that time began to grow most miserable: & the trechery even Amiprales of men neerest in bloud, seeking the destruction one of another, for to serve their owne turns, mon any case. or to gratifie Andronicus, most horrible: not only one brother betraid another, but even the father his fon and the fon his father, if Andronicus would have it fo. Some accused their neerest kinfmen, that they derided Andronicus his proceedings; or that without regard of him, they more favoured Alexius the yong emperor, then a great offence. Yet such was the mischief of the time, that many in accusing others, were themselves accused, and charging others of treafon against Andronicus, were themselves charged by them whom they accused, and so clant up both together in one prison neither were they of the nobility onely (enemies to Androniens) thus hardly dealt withall, but even some of his great favorits and followers also for some whom but yesterday he had vsed most kindly, and enrolled among his best friends, you them to day he frowned & tyrannized most cruelly: so that you might have seen the same man the same day (as it is reported of Xerxes his admirall) to be crowned and beheaded, to be graced and difgraced: infomuch that the wifet fort deemed Andronicus his praifings, the beginning of a mans difgrace; his bounty, his vindoing; & his kindnes, his death. The first that tasted of his tyranny, was Mary the daughter of Emanuel the emperor, who for the hate the bare to A- Mary the lexius the late prefident, & the empres her mother in law, had (as is aforefaid) about all other, daughter of n. wisht for his comming, but was now by one Pterigionites (somtime an Eunuch of her fathers, ber husband corrupted by Andronicus, having in his aspiring mind purposed the veter destruction of all E. casar porsoned manuels posterity) cunningly possoned as was her husband Cafar, who lived not long after her, by Andronicus poisoned also (as was supposed) with the same cup that his wife was. Now among others of the late emperors house, none had ever stood more in his light, than had the fair empres Xene, the yong emperors mother, whom now he ceased not most bitterly (though wrongfully) to accuse, as an otter enemie both to the emperor & the state, making as if he would leave all, & a. gain depart, if the were not removed from the emperor her fon: & by his cunning to intenced the giddie headed vulgar people against her, that they came flocking to Theodosius the good patriarch, ready to tear him out of his cloths, if he confented not to the remouing of the empres, as Andronicus had defired: fo a dounfel being called of fuch his fauorits & others, as were not like indifferently to heare her cause, but affuredly to condemne her; the guiltles empresse after many things fallly laid to her charge, was accused of tresonias that the shouldby her let Reactive Em ters have folicited Bela K. of Hungary, her brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of treatment of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of treatment of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of treatment of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of treatment of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of treatment of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of treatment of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of treatment of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of treatment of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of treatment of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of treatment of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of treatment of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of treatment of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of treatment of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of treatment of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of treatment of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of treatment of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of treatment of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & Belligrade, of the brother in law, to invade Brantizoba & B two ftrong places belonging to the empire; whereupon the was condemned, and thamefully condimined.

cast into a most filthy prison neere vr to the monastery of S. Diomede, Among st other nob & G men called vnto this wicked counsell, were Leo Monasteriotes, Demetrius, Tornieius and Constant sins Petrenus who not yet altogether deuoted to Andronicus, being asked their opinions concerning the Empresse, said, They would be glad first to know, Whether that counsell against his mother, were called by the Emperours consent or not? With which speech, andronicus pierced to the heart as with a fword, in greatrage flart vp and faid, Thefe are they which encouraged the wicked President to all his villanies, lay hands upon them. Wheteuponkhey of his guard in threatning manner shooke their weapons and swords at them, as: if they would cuen presently haue sain them: and the tumultuous common people, catching them by their cloaks as they came out, pulling them some one way, some another, were so fierce vpon them, as that they had much ado to escape out of their hands with life. Now lay the faire Empresse H (but the other day one of the greatest princes of the East; and honored of all her subiects) in great miserie & despaire, scorned euen of her base keepers, euery houre expecting the deadly blow of the hangman. Yetwas not the crueltie of Andronicus against her, so any thing assway ged, but gricuing that the yet breathed, thortly after affembled the former counsell, the mix nisters of his wrath, demanding of them, What punishment was by law appointed for such as betraied any towne or prouince of the Empire? whereunto answer being given in writing, That it was by the law, death, he could no longer hold, but that he must in great choler break forth against the poore Empresse, as if it had bin she that had done it: and thereupon the wicked counsellors crying out with one voice, That she was to be taken out of the way, as they had before agreed; by and by without longer stay, a damned writing was subscribed by the I young Emperour her son, as if it had bin with the bloud of his owne mother, wherby she was (I abhor to write it) most vnworthily condemned to die. The men appointed to see this most horrible and cruell execution done, were Manuel, Andronicus his eldest son, and Georgius Augufus his neer kinsman, who both dismaid at the very mentioning of the matter, not regarding the Emperours command, said plainely, that they never before consented to the death of the Empresse, but had clean hands of so hainous offence, and therefore would now much lesse see her innocent body dismembred in their sight. At which vnexpected answer Andronicus much troubled, with his fingers oftentimes pluckt himselse by the hoarie head, and with burning cies casting sometime up his head, and sometime downe, sighed at his owne most misesable tyrannical estate, fretting inwardly, that they which were neerest vnto him, whom he thought K he might euen with a beck haue commanded to haue don any mischief, abhorring his crueltie, should refuse to do the thing he so much desired to have don: yet repressing his anger for a while, within a few daies after, he againe commanded her to be strangled; which was accordingly done by Constantinus Tripsicus, and Pterigionites the vngracious eunuch, by whose help he had before poisoned Mary the Emperors daughter, with Casar her husband, as is before declared. Thus perished this great Empresse, cruelly strangled in prison, by these two wicked men, the mercilesse executioners of Andronicus his wrath. Her dead body lately adorned with all the graces of nature, even to the admiration to the beholders, was without more adoe felcretly raked up in the fand fast by the sea side: a poore sepulchre for so great a person.

The misterable

What might not Andronicus now do to others, that durst thus cruelly to deale with the L yong Emperors owne mother, and necrest friends? yet was all couered under the pretence of the common good & safety of the state and empire. And the more to shadow Andronicus his fecret purposes, as not proceeding of any private or hidden malice, or aspiring humor, from which he of all men would feem most free and the more to manifest his denotion & loyaltie to the yong Emperor his cousin, he was the only persuader to the rest of the nobility, to have him folemnly crowned (which as yet by reason of his tender age he was not;) and at the time of his coronation, with his own shoulders supported him vp, as he was (after the manner of that folemnitie) carried vnto the great Church, and so back again, the Crocodiles tears fill plenteously running down his aged face, as if it had bin for exceeding ioy: which many of the meaner fort beholding, & deeming thereof the best, highly commended his kindnes, accountting the young Emperor thrice happy, in fo graue a governour, and faithfull counsellor; who in love and kind affection towards him, seemed not inferior to his natural father: so cunningly had he under the vaile of pictic, shadowed his most execrable treacherie; as that in the very plotting thereof, he was accounted most louing and kinde. But hidden treason, be it never fo well diffembled, must at length show it selfe. So Andronicus having got into his power both the Emperor and the empire, and the chiefe friends of the late Emperor Emanuel being taken out of the way, or els driven into exile, thought it now high time for himfelfe to afpire vnto that high four raigntie, after which he had fo many yetes longed. Wherefore calling to- The Proposition gether a councell of his flatterers and fauorits, whom he had for fuch purpose promoted vnto ef interiors the highest places of state (al or most part of the grave counsellors & friends of the late empc- the Empire. ror Emanuel being now displaced, or otherwise taken out of the way) he as a man only carefull of the common good, declared vnto them the dangerous state of the Empire, by reason of a rebellion raised in Bythinia at Nice, by Isaac Angeliu, and Theodorus Catachzenus; and another at Prula, by Theodorus Angelus; requiring their grave advice for the suppressing thereof : who not ignorant of their lords purpole (as thereof before sufficiently instructed) answered with one confent, That of fuch great mischieses there would be no end, except hee were joyned in fellow thip of the Empire together with Alexius, by his granitie and deepe wisedome to supply what wanted for the good government of the State in the young Emperor his coulin. At which speech the by-standers (being in number many, and for the most part the followers of Andronicus his flatterers) gaue a great shout, as if it had beene already granted, with one applause crying out, Long line Alexius and Andronicm the Greeke Emperors; and that with such a vehemencie, as if they would therewith have rent the very heavens. The bruit thereof flying abroad into the city, forthwith you might have seene every street and corner of the city full of the vulgar people, with some also of better fort, swarming together like Bees, and sounding the praises of Andronicus (who now was come out his house into the court, with a world of people following him) and crying out, Long live the Empeorors Alexius and Andronicus. With which loud acclamation, mixt with the heavy fighings of many good men, (for all were not mad of that frenzie) the yong Emperor awaked, and feeing the court full of people, and An-Mronicus by them faluted his fellow in the Empire, knowing now no other remedy, thought it best to yeeld unto the time, and so with the rest flattering the old tyrant, welcommed him full fore against his will, by the name of his friend and companion in the empire: which he now in diffembling manner feeming vnwilling to take vpon him, and refufing the place offred, was by the rout of his flattering fauorits enforced to his own great contentment, to yeeld to their request: some of them with both their hands carrying him up, untill they had as it were against his will placed him in the imperiall feat, prepared for him fast by the yong Emperor: others in the meane time no leffe bufied in pulling off his privat attire, and putting upon him the imperiall robes.

The next day, when this participation of the empire should be published, & they both proclaimed emperors, the name of Andronicus was fet before the name of Alexius: whereof his faworits (though some others interpreted it otherwise) gaue this reason, that it fitted not with the majesty of the empire, that the name of a boy should be fet before the name of so reuerend grave, wife, and excellent a man as was Andronicus his companion in the empire. Shortly after, Andronicus being brought into the great temple to be crowned, then first began to shew to the people a cheerfull countenance, and fetting a fide his sterne look, after his long denotion done, filled the vain peoples heads with many large promiles of a more happy form of gouernment than before. All which proued nothing but meere diffimulation and deep deceit, that cheerefulnes of countenance & speech serving but for a while to couer his inward, secret, & most inhuman cruelty. And the more to deceive the world, the ceremonies of his coronation past, at fuch time as he should for consummation & confirmation of al, receive the facted & dreadful mysterie, the pledge of our redemption, not without due reuerence to be named, much lesse with impure hands touched: after he had received the bread, and taken the cup in his hand, he with a most deuout countenance framed of purpose to deceiue, & his cies cast up to heduen, as if his foule had there already bin (the fairest maske of hypocrific) swore by those dreadful my-Reries, & most deeply protested in the hearing of the people standing by, that he had taken vpon him the fellow thip of the empire for no other end or purpose but to affist Alexius his cofin in the godernment, and to strengthen his power wheras his secret meaning was nothing lesse, as shortly after appeared. For after a few daies spent in feigned denotions for the prosperous beginning of his Empiro, he forthwith turned his mind vnto other his more fecret, but most wicked and execrable defignes. And having above all things purposed the death of the yong Emperor,

Emperor, he called together them of the Councell, his owne creatures and corrupt ministers G of his wickednesse, who had now oftentimes in their mouthes that saying of the Poet, and that the old age of an Eagle was better than the youth of a Larke. So by the generall confent of that wicked affembly (vnworthy the name of a graue councel) a decree was made. That

Alexius should (as a man vnfit to gouern the State) be deprived of all imperial dignitie, and commanded to liue a privat life. Which difloyall decree of the conspirators was yet scarcely published, but that another more cruell came out of the same forge, That he should forthwith be put to death, as one vinworthy longer to line. For the execution of which so horrible a fentence Stephanus Hagiochristophorites (one of the chiefe ministers of Andronicus his villanies, and by him promoted even viito the highest degrees of the honours of the court) with Constantinus Trypficus, and one Theodorus Badibrenus, captain of the tormentors) were fent out; who entring his chamber by night, without compassion of his tender age, or regard of his honour or inno-Mexicustive en- cency, cruelly strangled him with a bow string: which detestable murther so performed, Andronicus shortly after comming in, spurned the dead body with his foot, railing at his father the late Emperor Emanuel, as a forsworne and injurious man; and at his mother, as a common I whore. The head was forthwith strooke off from this miserable carkasse (the mirror of honors unstabilitie) and left for the monstrous tyrant to feed his eies upon: the body wrapped up in lead, was in a boat carried to fea by Io. Camaterius, and Theodosius Chumenus, two of Andronicus his noble fauorits , who with great joy and glee returned with the fame boat to the Court, as if they had done some notable exployt. But long continueth not the joy of the mischieuous, vengeance still following them at the heeles; as it did these two, who not long after, with the test that conspired the innocent Emperors death, all or most part of them came to shamefull or miscrable ends. Thus perished Alexius the Emperor, not yet ful fifteene yeres old, in the third yeare of his raigne: which time he lived more like a servant than an Emperor, first under the command of his mother, and afterwards of the tyrant which brought him to his end. Who joyeth now but old Andronicm, made yong again, as should seem, by his new gained honors?for fhortly after the murder committed, he married Anne the French Kings daughter (as some report) before betrothed to yong Alexius; a tender & most beautiful lady, not yet full 11 yeres old, an unfit match for threefcore and ten. And in some fort as it were to purge himself & his partakers of the shameful murther by them committed, and to stop the mouths of the people, he by much flattery & large promifes procured of the bishops a general absolution for them all, from the oath of obedience which they had before given vnto the Emperor Emanuel, and Alexius his son. Which obtained he for a while had the same Bishops in great Andrewicusfie. honor, & shortly after in greater contempt, as men forgetfull of their duties and calling. After to the charling of his estate, neuer reckning himself there L of affured, fo long as he faw any of the nobility or famous captains aliue, that fauored Emanuel the late Emperor, or Alexims his fon: of whom fome he secretly poyfoned, as Mary the Emperor Emanuels daughter, with her husband Cafar; some for light occasions hee depriued of their fight, as he did Emanuel and Alexius the fons of that noble captaine Iohn Comnenus , Andronicus Laparaus, whose good service he had oftentimes vsed; Theodorus Angelus, Alexius Connenus the Emperor Emanuels base son: some he hanged, as Leo Synessus, Manuel Lachanas, with diuers others: some he burnt, as Mamalus one of the Emperor Alexius his chiefe Secretanies; all men of great honor and place. For colour whereof he pretended himselfe to be sorrie for them, deeply protesting that they died by the seueritie of the law, not by his will, and by the just doome of the Iudges, whereunto he was himselfe (as he said) to give place; and thas M with tears plentifully running down his aged checkes, as if he had been the most forrowfull man aline. O deepe diffimulation, and Crocodiles teares, by nature ordained to expresse the heavinesse of the heart, slowing from the eies as showers of raine out of the Clouds: in good men the most certaine signes of greatest griefe, and surest testimonies of inward torment:

but in Andronicas you are not fo, you are far of another nature, you proceed of joy, you promife not vnto the diffressed pittie or compassion, but death and destruction! how many menseies haue you put out how many haue you drowned ? how many haue you denoured? Most of the nobilitie that fauored the late Emperor Emanuel and Alexius his fon, thus taken out of the way by Andronicus, strooke such a feare into the rest, that for safegard of their lives they betooke themselves to slight, some one way, some another, never thinking themselves in safety so long as they were within the greedy Tyrants reach; whereof shortly after ensued no small troubles, to the flaking of the flate of the whole Empire. If iac Commenus the Emperor Emanuels nigh kiniman, took his refuge into Cyprus, and kept that Island to himself. Alexius Commenus, Emanuels brothers son fled into Sicilia, and there stir'd vp William king of that Island against Andronicus, who with a great army landed at Dyrrachium, tooke the city, and to from thence without refistance passing thorow the heart of Maccdonia, spoiling the country before him as he went, met his fleet at Theffalonica, which famous city he also took by force, & most miserably fooiled it, with all the country thereabout, fo that he brought a great feare youn the imperiall city it felfe. Vnto which fo great euils Andronicus (intangled with domestick troubles, and not knowing whom to truft) was not able to give reinedy, although for thew he had (to no purpose) sent our certain of his most trusty ministers with such forces as he could well spare. For the majefly of his authority growing fill leffe & leffe, and the number of his enemies both at home & abroad daily increasing, and the sauor of the vnconstant people (who now began to fpeake hardly of him) declining the vncertain which way to turn himfelfe, refled wholly vpon tyranny, proferibing in his feare, not only the friends of fuch as were fled, and whom he diffrus exceeding tries fted, but fortimes whole families together, yea and that for light occasions, foretime those elliewho were his best sauorits, whose service he had many times vied in the execution of his crueltie fo that now no day passed wherein he did not put to death, imprison, or torture one great man or other. Wherby it hapned that the imperiall city was filled with forrow and heavines, euery man hanging the head, & with filence couering his inward griefe, not without danger to have bin then vetered. Among many others appointed to this flaughter, was one Isaac Angelus a man of great nobility, whom Hagiochristopherites (the chiefe minister of Androniens his tirannie, and for the same by him highly promoted) suspending, as one that bare no good wil to the emperor (cause enough of death) came to his house to apprehend him, & finding him at home, after a few hot words commanded him to follow him: whereat the noble man making fome flay, and abhorring the very fight of the wretch, as vnto him ominous & fatal, Hagiochristophorites himselfe began to lay hands on him, reuiling his followers, that they had not forthwith drawn him out of his house by the haire of his head, vnto the prison by him appointed. For they touched with the honor of the man, & moued with pitty, forced him not but flood fill as beholders. Ifaac feeing himfelfe thus befet, and no way now left for him to cleape, refoluing rather there prefently to die, than shortly after to be murdred in prison, drew his sword as the reft were laying hands upon him and at the first blow cleft the wicked head of Hagiochristopho. rites down to his shoulders; and so leaving him wallowing in his own bloud, and like a desperate man laying about him amongst the rest, made himselfe way through the midst of them. And so embrued with bloud, with his bloudy sword yet in his hand, running thorow the midst of the city, told the people what he had done; and crying vnto them for help in defence of his innocencie, fled into the great temple, there to take the refuge of the fanctuarie; where he that Angelia had not long fit (in the place where the guilty flying thither for refuge vied to fit, & confession taketh sandatheir offence, craue pardon of such as go in & out) but that the remple was filled with the multitude of people flocking thither out of al parts of the city, fome to fee the nobleman fome to behold what should become of him: for all men thought that he would before Sun set (notwith standing the reuerence of the place) be drawn thence by Andronicus, & put to some shamefull death. Thither came also John Ducas, Isaacs vncle, and his son Isaac, to increase the tumult; not for that they were any thing guilty of the death of Hagiochriftophorites, but for that they had before become furcties vnto the fuspitious tyrant, for their kinsman Isaac, and he likewise for them, by whose trespas they well knew themselves now brought into no lesse danger than if they had bin abettors therunto. And befide them also, many other there were, which doubting of their owne estate, and fearing the like might happen to themselves, pricked forward with hard speeches, the common people flocking thither, instantly requested them to stay there, and to stand by them now at their need, being so injuriously wronged; whose pittifull G treeth in a complaints moved many to take part with them. At which time also, no man yet comming from the Emperor (being as then out of the city) to represse the sedition, nor any of the Nobilitie opposing themselves no friend of Andronicus appearing, none of his bloudy ministers or officers flewing themselves, nor any that did so much as speake a good word in his behalfe, or in diflike of the tamult, the boldnes of the feditious people increased, every man in so great liberty taying what he lift, and after their rude maner one incouraging another. So fpent 1/44c that long night, not thinking (God wor) of an Empire, but fill expecting the deadly stroke of Andronicus. Yet had he with great intreating to prevailed, that divers of the affembly shutting the church doores, and bringing lights into the church, staied there with him all night, and by their example caused some others to stay also. The next morning by breake of day were all H the citizens flockt againe to the temple, curfing the tyrant to the deuil, as the common enemy of mankind, withing vnto him a shameful death, & the honor of the empire vnto Isaac. At that time by fortune, or rather God fo appointing it, Andronicus was out of the city at his palace of Meludinum, on the East side of Propontis, where he was by nine a clocke at night certified of the death of Hagischriftuphorites, and of the tumult of the people: yet that night stirred he not, neither did any thing more, but by short letters aduised the people to pacifie themselues, and not by foolish rebellion to cast themselves into further danger. In the morning Andronia And orich in cas his fauorits began to shew themselves, and to doe what they might to have appealed the tumultuous multitude; yea, and presently after came Andronicus himfelfe, and landed with his imperiall galley at the great pallace in the city. But with the inraged people nought preuailed either the perfuafions of the one or report of the presence of the other: for they all, as vpon a fignall given, and as men inspired with one spirit, or stirred vp with the same fury, slocked rogether into the temple of S. Sophia, one incouraging another, and scoffing at such as stood by as idle lookers on, without weapons in their hands, reuiling them and calling them rotten lymnes that had no feeling of the common harme. After that, they broke open the prisons, and fet at liberty the prisoners, as sittest instruments to increase the tumult, who were not all notable offenders of the dregs of the people, but many of them borne of good houses, and for fome light fault, or inconfiderate word (whereof enery man was in those times bound to give an account) or for some friends offence against Andronicus, there laid fast. These of all others most animated the people, in such fort, as they which before for feare of the danger did but K fostly murmur to themselues against Andronicus, did now openly joyne with the rest of the base seditions. Then might you have seen somewith their swords & targets, some also in their armour, but the greatest part armed but with clubs and staues, and other such like rude weapons, armes of fury, hastily taken up in their shops as by chance they came first to hand, running forth in enery place. By this affembly of the most furious and promiscuous people was face hoyfed up, and with a generall applause saluted Emperor. At which time one of the Sexa transfer tons of the church, with a ladder tooke downe Constantine the great his crowne of gold, (which for a monument hung ouer the holy altar, and fet it on Isaacs head: which he at the first seemed vnwilling to weare, not for that he was not defirous enough of the Empire, but for that hee feared the extream danger of the matter, and thought those things that were then done to be L but as it were a ficke mans dreame, like enough straitway to vanish: besides that, he feared in to doing, the more to exasperate Andronicus. Which his vncle Iohn Ducas (as is said before flanding by him) perceiuing, plucking off his own cap, and shewing his old bald head, requestel the people, That if his nephew did refuse it they would fet it voon his: whereunto they with a great outery answered, That they would no more yeeld their obedience to an old bald man, as having received many harmes from the hoary haires of old Andronicus; and therefore for his fake hated enery old man, more fit for Charons boat, and his coffin, than for an Empire, and especially if he had a forken beard and bald head, as had Andronicus and this Ducas. Thus was that by the tumultuous multitude inuested in the Empire; and so royally mounted vpon one of the Emperors horfes, richly furnished with a saddle and trappings of gold, which they M had by chance gotten, was by them brought from the temple to the court; Basilius Camaterus the Patriarch waiting upon him, whom the headstrong people had inforced against his will to confirme with his authoritie what was by them done for the establishing of Isaac in the Em-calling woon his old friends and flattering fauorits, thought first by their help to haue repref- and conicus fed the fury of the rebellious: who as friends of his better fortune, and not of himselfe, were for faken of his now for the most part fortunk from him and those that were left so faintly as more fortune. now for the most part shrunk from him; and those that were left so faintly comming on, as if in rise, his quarrell they had had no mind to fpend their lines: with which heartleffe company Andronicus fearing to oppose himselfe against the fury of the multitude, with his bow and arrows in his hand got him up into the highest tower of the palace, called Centenaria, and from thence bestowed certaine that among the people. But seeing that to be to no purpose, and better perfuaded to do more with them by faire words, than fuch vain force, he from the top of the tower cryed aloud vnto them. That if they would be quiet and depart, he would by their confent refigne the Empire vnto his fon Manuel: wherat the people more inraged, spared not to poure forth most reprochfull words in contempt both of himself and his son; and so surjously brake into the court by one of the gates called Carea. Which Andronicas beholding, and now our of all hope, casting from him all his habiliments of honor, and disguising himself fled againg to his gally, accompanied only with Anna his wife, and Maraptica his minion, and fo returned to Meludium, his place from whence he came. Isaac but yesterday in the bottom of dispaire, Astrangethajo & shadowed as it were with the hand of death, by the strange change of fortune to day mounted vnto the highest type of worldly honour; entering the palace, was there againe with the greatest applause of the people that might be saluted Emperor. From whence he forthwith fent out certaine companies of his most affured friends and followers, to apprehend Andronicau: who now as a man at once for faken both of his friends and of his better fortune, fecretly fled with his wife and his paragon, before remembred, to Chele, attended upon only with a few of his trusty servants, which had a long time served him before he was Emperor. There taking ship, with purpose to have fled vnto the Tauroscythes (as not thinking himselfe safe in any Province of the Empire) he was twice or thrice by foule weather put backe againe, the wrought fee abhorring (as it feemed) to carry him that had fo polluted it with the dead bodies of the innocent by him flain, and stil threatning (as it were) to denoure him. Thus strangely staied by foule weather, or more truly to say, by the reuenging hand of the Highest, he was found by fuch as were fent to feek out after him, & being by them apprehended, was with two great yron chains fast locked about his proud necke, and heavy gyues vpon his legs, cast into the castle of Amena; and in that miserable habit shortly after presented to the Emperor Isaac, Andronicus the yet busied in appearing and reforming the disordred city: where by the way as hee went, he and brought in was by the people most shamefully reuiled, and injuriously vsed; some plucking him by the bonds to dage beard, some by the haire of the head, some other in the meane time playing with his nose, and 144. bobbing him in the face, with a thousand other despights done vitto him; especially by such women, as whose husbands he had before murdred or deprined of their sight. Afterward being committed to the hatefull fury of the people, he had his right hand cut off, and was again committed to the same castle, without meat, drinke, or other comfort : where after he had lien a few daies, having one of his cies put out, he was fet vpon a foule leane cammel, with his face toward the taile thereof, and so (as it were intriumph) led through the Market place, his bald head all bare, as if it had been a dead mans skull taken out of a charnell house; in a short old coat; so miserable a spe cacle, as might have expressed a sountaine of teares out of the eies of a right hard heatted man. But the bedlam and most insolent citisens, especially they of the baser fort as cookes, coblers, curriers, and such like, slocking about him like Bees (without regard that he had but the other day worne upon his head the imperiall crowne, then honored by them as a god, and extolled vnto the heavens; that they had not long before folemnly sworpe they had firiuen among themselves, who should doe him the greatest villanie. Having thus Andronicus the shamefully, as in a ridiculous triumph, brought him into the Theatre, they there betwier two Emptour has pillars hanged him vp by the heeles: where having fuffered all these despightfull indignities, helds, by the unto him obedience and loyaltie) ran now as men out of their wits, omitting no kinde of vil-lanie they could deuise to do vnto him: some thrust nailes into his head, some cast durt in his face, some the dung both of men and beafts, some prickt him in the sides with spirs, some cast stones at him as at a mad dog, and other-some opprobious and despightfull words, no lesse geleuons vnto him than the rest: amongst others, an impudent drab comming out of the kitchen, caft a pot full of scalding water in his face; and in briefe, their outrage so exceeded, as if pire. Andronicus at his comming to the palace, perceiuing first by the confused cry of the til-

with many moc, not without offence to be named, he with an inuincible courage yet fill held G. his patience, not giving one cuill word, but fometimes faying, Lord have mercy upon me; and otherwhiles, Why do you breake a bruifed reed? Yet the furious people nothing moued with the calamity of fogreat a man, (of al others now the most miserable) stript him of his bad clothes as he hung, and cut off his privities. One among the rest, to make an end of him, thrust his fivord in at his throat up to the twift as he hung; other two with their long fwords proued their frength, who could firike furthest into his buttocks. Thus miserably perished this famous Emperor, after he had reigned two yeares. That which was left of his body (for many had carried away (ome pieces thereof) being taken downe from the place where he hung, was cast in. to a base vault in the Theatre, where it for a space lay, as the loathsome carkasse of some wilde beaft, and the miferable spactacle of mans fragilitie, for Isaac the Emperor would not fuffer H it to be buried. Howbeit afterwards (the fury of the people ouerpassed) it was by some more charitable men remooued thence, and layd in a low vault neere vnto the monasterie of the Nicetas Cho- Ephort which as Nicetas Choniates (author of this history, speaking of the time wherein he linistes, Annil. ued) faith, is yet there vndiffolued to be seene. Hee was a man most honorably discended, of stature tall, and well proportioned; in his countenance fate a certaine reverend majestie, adorned with fuch notable vertues, as might have made him worthily to have bin compared vnto the greatest Emperors of his stockeand familie, had he not obscured the same with too much ambition and cruelty; whereof the one caused him to lead the greatest part of his life in prifon or exile; the other brought vnto him a most shamefull end.

Isaac Angelus his successor, by the fauor of the people thus exalted vnto the Empire, at the Is first gouerned the same with great lenitie and moderation, as if he had altogether abhorred from the effusion of his subjects bloud; but afterwards not a little troubled both with forcein enemies, and domesticall rebellion, besieged in the Imperiall City by such of the Nobilitie as thought themselves no lesse worthy of the Empire than himselfe: for repressing of which 1fact Angels infolencies and the affuring of his State, he became so sewere in chastising the offendors, and the Employer such others as he had in distrust, that he was counted of most men not inferiour in crueltie to Andronicus his predeceffor; few daies paffing without the condemnation or execution of one great man or other, besides them of the meaner fort, of whom hee seemed to make no great reckoning:whereby he in few yeares lost the loue and fauour of his Subjects, who before had Marchi Empe him in great honour; and became vnto them no leffe odious than was before Andronicus. Vp. K ver thrult from on which generall dislike of the people, his ingratefull younger brother Alexim (by him bedeprined of his fore for a great fum of mony redeemed from the Turks) tooke occasion to rise vp against him. the buby his bro and by the fauour of the fouldiers deprined him together both of the Empire and his fight: and having put out his eies, thrust him into a Monastery, there to line as it were out of the world, as a man condemned to perpetuall darkenesse, after he had raigned nine yeres and eight moneths, being not yet full forty yeares old. Whether it were the reuenging hand of God, for the hard measure vsed to Andronicm, or not, I leave it to the wifer to consider; who in his deepe prouidence, wherewith he best gouerneth all things, would have a moderation vsed in punishment of our most capitall enemies, as having alwaies before our eies the slippery state of power and authoritie: and that as all worldly things are subject to change, so by the just L judgement of God it oftentimes falleth out, that what hurt we doe unto others, the same wee may receive against from others. In these so great and strange mutations of the Constantinopolitan Empire (which I have fomewhat more at large profecuted, not fo much for the nouelty of the matter, although it were right strange, as for that out of the losses and ruine thereclizaliblin the Of the greatnes of the Turks for the most part grew) Clizasthlan Sultan of Iconium after the Tacks Sultan death of the Emperor Emanuel, found meanes to take from the Empirediuers strong Townes on the Greece and castles in the lesser Asia, together with a great part of the country of Phrygia: Alexim, Empre in the Andronicus, and Iface the succeeding Emperours, troubled with dangers neerer home, having nothing to oppose against him, but faire intreatie and rich presents; so redeeming for a while an vnsure peace, with no lesse charge in short time to be renewed againe. This victorious Sul- M. tan (for so he may of right be called) holding in his subjection a great part of the leffer Asia, cussission di now a man of great yeares, dying, left behind him foure fonnes, Mafus, Coppatine, Reucraand chiraling time, and Carchefrees, all men growne. Amongst whom he divided his Kingdome: Vnto Mufor fest control of the bequeathed Amaga, Aucyra, Doryleum, with divers other pleasant Cities of Pontus:

vnto Coppatine he affigned Melytene, Cæfarea, and the colonie now called Taxara: vnto Reucratine he allotted Aminfum, Docea, with fome other Cities voon the sea coast: but vnto Caichofrees, he left Iconium his regall feat, and with it Lycaonia, Pamphilia, and all the countries thereabouts as farre as Cottianyum. Of these foure, Coppatine long lived not after his fa- The fannes of tries thereabouts as farre as Cottianyum. Of these toure, Copparine long flued not after this two curatine Prince of Docea, and Master Prince of Ancyra (his two variance meng) brethren) fell at variance, and so at last into open warre. But Masut finding himselse too ibemselves. weake for his wariike brother Rencratine, yeelded vnto him the territories which hee faw he must needs forgoe; and glad now to keepe his owne, so made peace with him. Reucratine being a man of an ambitious and haughtic spirit, with his forces thus doubled, denounced war vnto his brother Caichofroes; who doubting his owne ftrength, fled vnto the Emperour Alexius Angelus for aid, as had his father done before him the vnto Emperour & Manuel, although not with like good fortune. For the Emperour but of late having obtained the Empire, by the depoling of his brother, and altogether given to pleasure, reputing also those domesticall warres of the Turks, some part of his owne safety, sent him home without comfort, as one strong enough of himselfe to defend his owne quarrell against his brother.

Howbeit; he was scarcely come to Iconium, but he was by Reucratine expulsed thence, and driven to fly into Armenia, where he was by Zebune King of that countrey, a Turke also, honourably received and courteoully vied, but yet denied of the aid he requested: the King pretending that hee was already in league with Reveratine, and therefore could not; or as some thought, fearing the dangerousnesse of the matter, would not intermeddle therein. Wherewith the poore Sultan vtterly discouraged, returned againe to Constantinople, and there in poore estate, as a man forlorne, passed out the rest of his daies. Now having thus passed through the Turkith assaires in the lesser Asia, together with the troubled estate of the Constantinopolitan Empire, no small cause of the Turks greatnes; the course of time calleth'us backe againe before we passe any surther, to remember their proceedings also at the same time, and shortly after, in Syria, Iudaa, Ægypt, and those more Southerly countries, where these restlesse people ceased not by all meanes to enlarge their Empire, votill they had brought all those great kingdomes under their obeysance.

After the death of Baldwin King of Ierufalem, of whom we have before spoken, Almerica fixt em his younger brother, Earle of Toppa and Afcalon, beeing then about feuen and twentie King of tenajayeares old, was by the better good liking of the elergic and people, than of the nobilitie, ele-Ged King:not for that there wanted in him any good parts worthy of a kingdom, but for that some of them enuied vnto him so great an honour. Neuerthelesse he was (as we said) by the generall confent of the people, elected, proclaimed, and by Almericus the Patriarch with all solemnitie crowned, the 17 day of February, in the yeare of Grace, 1163. To begin whose troubled reigne, the Agyptians first of all denied to pay unto him their wonted tribute. In re-Usuge whereof, he in person himselfe with a puissant army entred into Ægypt; and meeting with Dargan the Sultan, ouerthrew him in plaine battell, and put him to flight: who to flay the further pursuit and passage of the Christians, cut the bankes of the river Nilus, and so drowned the country, that the King was glad to content himselfe with the victory he had already gotten, and so to returne to Ierusalem.

The next yeare Almericus was againe drawne downe with his power into Ægypt, by Dargan the Sultan, to aid him against Saracon, whom Noradin the Turke, King of Damasco, had fent as Generall with an army, to restore Sanar the Sultan before expulsed, and to depose Dargan. In which expedition Dargan being flaine, and Saracon having won certaine Townes, kept them to himselfe: Sanar doubtfull of his good meaning, joyned his forces with Almericus, and by his helpe expulled Saracon out of Ægypt. But whilft Almericus was thus busied in Ægypt, Noradin the Turk making an inrod into the frontiers of the Christians neere unto Tripolis, was by Gilbert Lacy, master of the Templars in those quarters, and the other Christians, Noradin the when he least feared, fo fundenly fer vpon, that he had much adoe by flight to faue himfelie, Turke affectiff halfenaked for hatte, most of his followers being at the same time slain. In reuenge of which that difgrace, he not long afterwith a great power came and belieged Arcthusa: for reliefe wherof, Bohemund Prince of Antioch, Raymond the younger, Earle of Tripolis, Calamon governour of Cilicia, and Toros Prince of Armenia, came with their power. Of whose comming the Turk hearing, raised his siege and departed. After whom these Christian Princes ca-

gerly following, were by the Turkes shut vp in certaine deepe and rotten fennes (whereinto C they had vnaduitedly to far entred) and there with a great flaughter overthrowne. In which conflict all the chiefe commanders of the army were taken, except the Prince of Armenia. who forecasting the danger, had retired, after he had in vaine diffuaded the rest from the further purfait of the flying enemy. The Prince of Antioch there taken, was about a yeare after for a great furn of mony redeemed; but the Countie of Tripolis was after eight yeres straight caprinitie hardly delivered. Noradin after this victory returning againe to the fiege of Arethusa, in few daies won the towne; and encouraged with such good successe, and the absence of the King, laid fiege to the city of Pancade, which was also deliuered vnto him, vpon condition that the citifens might at their pleasure in safetie depart.

At the same time Saracon Generall of Noradin his forces, tooke from the Christians two H castles; the one in the country of Sidon, the other beyond Iordan upon the borders of Arabia, both in the custody of the Templars: twelve of whom the King at his returne hanged vo for treason.

Shortly after Saracon, King Noradin his great man of war, with all the power of the Turks. came downe againe into Ægypt, with purpose to haue fully subdued all that notable king. dome vnto his Lord and Master. Of whose power, Savar the Sultan standing in dread, praied aid of Almericus, promifing vnto him beside his yerely tribute, the summe of forty thousand ducats for his paines. The matter fully agreed vpon, and all things now in readinesse. Almeria can fet forward with his army, and encountring with Saracon and his Turks at the river Nilus. ouerthrew him in a great battell : yet nor without some losse, for the Turkes in their flight lighting voon the Kings cariages with the whole baggage of the army, & ouer-running them that had the charge thereof carried away with them a most rich prey, wherby it came to passe that as the Christians had the victory, so the Turks injoyed the spoile.

Saracon after this ouerthrow having againe gathered together his dispersed soldiers, tooke his way to Alexandria, where he was by the citifens received after whom the King follows ing, gaue no attempt vnto the city, for that he knew to be but vaine, but incamped close by the fide of the ruer Nilus, from whence the city was chiefly to be victualled. Whose purpose Saracon perceiuing, and betime foreseeing the distresse of his whole army for want of victuals, if he should there long stay: leaving there his son Saladin (or as some call him his nephew) with a thousand horimen for the keeping of the city, secretly by night departed thence hime felie with the rest of his army; and passing through the desarts, did great harme in the vpper parts of Ægypt. Of whose departure Almericus understanding, was about to have followed him, but that he was otherwaies persuaded by the Ægyptian captains to continue his former purpose for the gaining of the city : wherefore now aftenthe departure of Saracon he began to approch the wals, and with diversengines of war to disturbe the desendants: wherewith the citifens (better acquainted with the trade of merchandife, than the feans of war) difcouraged; began now to confult amongst themselves for the turning out of those troublesome guests sanden left in whom they had fo lately received which Saladin perceiving, certified Saracon his ynclethereall ascora by of, requesting his speedy reliefe in that his so dangerous estate, & with much intreaty persuaded the citifens for a while to hold it out, until he might from him receive answer of al which L the Christians and Ægyptians without, having intelligence, laid so much the harder vnto the city. Gladly would Saracon have done what he was by his nepliew requested : but perceiting it to be a matter of no lessed danger than difficultie, he by the means of Hugh, County of Care farca, and one Arnolphus another noble Christian, both then prisoners with him, concluded a peace with the Kingswhereupon the city was forthwith yeelded vp, and Saladin with his Turks fuffred in safety to depart. At which time also all prisoners were on both sides freely and without ransome set at liberty. Thus Saracon for this time disappointed of this his purpose for the conquest of Ægypt, returned backe againe to Damasco: and Almericas with great glory to Ascalon, where he arrived with his army the 2 t of September in the yerere 1167.

In this late expedition, Almericus on the one fide enflamed with the wealth of Ægypt, and M on the other encouraged with the weaknes of that effeminat people, refting for the most part vpon forraine strength; had purposed simselse to inuade the kingdome, and so if possible he might, to joine it to his own. For color wherof, it was pretended that the Sultan contrary to his faith before giuen, had fecretly fought to joine in league and amity with Noradin the Turke!

King of Damasco. The chiefe stirrer vp of the King vnto this war, was one Gerbert, master of the Templars; who in respect of the aid by them of his order to be given, had obtained of the King, after the victory gained, to have the city of Pelusium with all the rich countrey about the same, given vnto him and his brethren the Knights of the order for ever upon which hope, he contrary to the mind of many of the Knights, for the furtherance of that war, gaged his whole wealth and credit, with all the treasure of his house. So all things now in readinesse for To great an enterprise, Almericus with his army set forward in October, and having in ten daies passed the sandy desart, came to Pelusium, which City he (after three daies siege) tooke by Pelusiam taken force, and put to sword all them that were therein, without respect of age, fex, or condition: which city, he according to his promise before made, gaue vnto the Templars. After that, he began also to besiege Caire, at which time his fleet sacked the city of lapium. In the meane time, Sanar the Ægiptian Sultan, confidering the danger he was in, to fatisfie Almericus his greedy defire, officed to pay him twentie hundred thousand ducats to withdraw his forces; and forthwith sent him one hundred thousand, for the ransome of his son and his nephew taken prisoners at Pelusium: and for the rest to be paid within fine daies after, hee gane two of his nephewes hostages. Neuerthelesse the payment he deferred from day to day, of purpose in the meane time to raise the whole power of Ægypt, as also to receive aid from the Turks by Sarason, which he daily expected : of whose speedy comming, Almerican understanding, left part of his army at Pelulium, and with the rest went to have met him; but missing him by the way, Saracon with his Turks came in safety to Caire vnto the Sultan, as he had defired. Wherfore Almericus dismaid with the multitude of two so great armies now joyned together, retired backe againe to Pelusium, and there taking with him the garrison before left, returned home to Ierusalem : having in that expedition (begun with the breach of faith) laid the foundation of the ruine of his kingdome, as in few yeres after, it by proofe appeared, by the cuill neighbourhood of the Turks, by that meanes brought downe into Ægypt.

Saracon the Turke after the departure of Almericus, eafily perceiting a most fit time and opportunitie to be offered for him now to obtain that, which he had in vaine before both fought and fought for, encamped with his army neere vnto Caire, and notably counterfeited himselfe of all others the most denoted friend of the Sultans : so that betwixt them two passed all the kind tokens of loue and friendship, that could possibly be deuised; the Sultan oftentimes feafting the Turke, and in kindnesse likewise being seasted of him: but at length going as his manner was, vnto the campe to visit him, he was by the Turks slaine. So Saracon having The Sultan of brought to passe what he desired, and entring the city with his army, was by the great Caliph the colour of (from whom the Ægyptian Sultans, as from their superiors, the true successors of their great frendship stand Prophet Mahomet, tooke their authoritie) appointed Sultan, the first of the Turks that euer by Saraton. enjoyed the same: which royall dignitie he had not possessed fully a yeare, but that he was taken away by death. In whose stead Saladin his brothers son, by and by steet up: who altogether a martiall man, not regarding the renerend Majesty of the Caliph (as had his vncle Saracon, and all the Ægyptian Sultans before him) with his horsemans mase struck out his brains; and not focontented, vtterly rooted out all his posteritie, the better to assure himselfe and his fucceffors the Turks in the possession of his new begotten kingdome; and after that divided the great treasures of the Ægyptians among his Turks, to encourage them the more to follow him in his warres against the Christians.

This glorious kingdome so much spoken of in holy Scripture, and renowned of the learned How the King. historiographers of all ages, after the ruine of the Roman Empire, was sometime part of the dome of the fifth into no Constantinopolitan Empire, and a notable member of the Christian commonweale; untill bands of the that about the yeare of our Lord 704, the Ægyptians weary of the pride and conctuousnes of Sarafin, with the Grecians, revolted from them to the Sarafins, whose superflition they also received : and intrasions founder the gouernment of the Sarafin Caliphs, the fucceffors of the false prophet Mahomes, thereof. lived about 464 yeres, vntill that now being invaded by Almericus, they praied aid of Noradin the Turke, Sultan of Damasco: who to their reliefe sending Saracon with an army, repulsed indeed the Christians, but oppressing their libertie, took to himselfe the kingdom, which he left vnto his nephew Saladin, in whose posterity it remained untill it was from them again taken by the Circassian slaues the Mamalukes : under whose seruile government it was holden of long time, till that by the great Emperor of the Turks, Selymus the first, it was again conquered, and the Mamaluke sytterly destroied: In the gouernement of whose prosperitie, the mighty Em. G perours of the Turks, it hath euer fince remained as part of their Empire, vntill this day, as in the processe of this History God willing shall appeare.

Saladin thus possessed of the great kingdome of Ægypt, and all things set in such order as he thought best for the newnesse of his estate, with a great army entred into the land of Palefline, in the yere 1170, and there be fieged Daron; which towne he woon, and ouerthrew fuch as were fent by King Almericus to have relieved the same : with which small victory contenting himfelfe, as with the good beginning of his rifing fortune, he returned backe againe into his kingdome: yet was his army fo great and populous, as that the like army of the Turks had never before bin feen in the Holy-Land. Wherfore Almerica confidering in what great danger he flood, his kingdome now being on both fides befet by the Turks, fent out his Em- H bassadors vnto the Christian Princes of the West, to craue their aid for the defence of that kingdom which their fathers had woon; and for the same purpose went himselfe in person vnto the Emperor of Constantinople, of whom he was royally entertained, and afterward sene backe loded with the promifes of great matters, as were also his Embassadors from the Princes of the West. All which for all that forted vnto nothing, but vanished into smoake.

The vere following, viz. 1171, Saladin befreged Petrea, the Metropoliticall City of Arabia : but hearing that Almericus with a great power was comming to the reliefe thereof, hee raised his nege and retired : as he did also the next yere after, having in vaine attempted the strong castle of Mont-Royall, on the further side of Iordan. In like manner also the third vere he came againe into the Holy-Land, and spoiled the countrey beyond Iordan: but hearing of the Kings comming against him, he forthwith returned againe into Ægypt. All these light expeditions, this politique Prince made not so much for hope of victory, or to proue his enemies strength, as to traine his souldiers, especially the esseminate Ægyptians, and to make them fitter to ferue him in his greater defignes.

Shortly after died Noradin Sultan of Damasco, and in his time a most notable champion of the Turks, after he had raigned nine and twenty yeres. Vpon whose death Almericus forthwith befieged the city of Paneade, in hope to have againe recovered the same: but he was by the widow of the late dead Sultan for a great fum of money and the deliuerie of certaine noble pritoners, intreated to raife his fiege and depart. So having fent away his army, and trauelling with his ordinary retinue to Tiberias, where he had the Summer before been ficke of A the flix, feeling himfelfe not well, he returned on horse backe by Nazareth and Neapolis to Icrufalem, where his old disease increasing upon him, he was also taken with a feuer: wherewith after he had beene some few daies grieuously tormented, hee requested his Physitians, with some gentle potion to loose his belly, which was now somewhat staied: which they refusing to doe, he commanded the potion to be given him vpon his owne perill, hap thereon what hap should : which being given him, and his belly againe loosed, he seemed therewith to have beene at the first well eased; but his wonted seaver with great vehemencie returning, before his weake and fpent body could be with convenient meats refreshed, he sudden! ly died, the tenth of Iuly, in the yeare 1173, when he had raigned about ten yeares. His dead body was with the great lamentation of all his subjects, solemnly buried by his brothers. He I was a most wife Prince, and withall right valiant, among st many most fit for the gouernement and defence of that troublesome kingdom, so hardly befet with the Infidels, if it had pleased God to have given him longer life.

Foure daies after the death of Almericus, was Baldwin his sonne, then a youth about thirfaith of that teene yeares old, by the generall confent of the Nobilitie chosen King, and by Almericas the housef temps. Patriarch, in the Temple with great folemnitie crowned in the yeare 1 173:vnto whom as not yet by reason of his tender age, fit himselse to manage the weightie affaires of the kingdom, Raymond Countie of Tripolis, was by the whole consent of the Nobilitie appointed Tutor to tupply what was wanting in the young King.

Noradin Sultan of Damasco (dead as is aforcsaid) lest behind him Melechsala his sonne, M yet but a youth, to succeed him in his kingdome. Whose government the Nobilitie disdain ning sent secretly for Saladin Sultan of Ægypt, voto whomat his comming they betraied the city of Damasco, the regall seat of the Turks in Syria. Whereof Saladin possessed, and entring into Celesiria without resistance, tooke Heliopolis, Emissa, with the great Citie of Cefarea ; and in fine, all the whole kingdome of Damasco, the city of Arethusa onely excepted. But thus to fuffer Melechfala the young Prince to be wronged, and the kingdome of Damasco to be joyned to the kingdome of Ægypt, was of the wifer fort thought not to stand with the fafety of the kingdom of Ierusalem, lying in the middle betwixt them both. Wherfore the County of Tripolis, governor of that kingdom, made out certain forces to have hindred his proceedings. At which time alfo, Corobed Prince of Parthia, and Melechfalas vncle, Ment certaine Troups of Parthian horsemen to have aided his distressed Nephew, who were by Saladin ouerthrowne and almost all slaine, neere vnto Aleppo where Melechsala lay. As for the County of Tripolis and the other Christian Princes, with whom Saladin in the newbesse of his kingdome had nodesire to fall out; hee appealed them with faire intreaty, and rewards:vnto the County he fent freely the hostages, which yet lay for his ransome at Emissa: unto the other Princes he fent rich presents, and therewith so contented them all, that they returned without any thing doing against him. After which time, three or foure veres passed in great quietnesse, to the great strengthning of him in those new gotten kingdomes. At length vpon the comming ouer of Philip Earle of Flanders, the Christian Princes of Syria encouraged, consulted of an expedition to be made into Ægypt, whereof Saladin having intelligence, drew downe into that country the greatest part of his strength. But Philip distiking of that expedition, and the rather for that hee saw no great cheerfulnesse in the County of Tripolis and the rest thereunto; they with one consent changed their purpose for Ægypt, and turning their forces a quite contrary way, miferably and without refisfance wasted the country about Emissa and Cesarea.

Cæfarca;

Whilest the Christians was thus busied in Cælisiria, Saladin on the other side tooke occa- saladin outra fion out of Ægypt to inuade the kingdome of Ierusalem : of whose comming, King Baldwin thrown by king having intelligence, with such small forces as he had left, hastened himselfe to Ascalon. In the meane time Saladin with a great army was entred into the Holy-Land, where burning the countrey before him, and raging in the bloud of the poore Christians, he came and encamped mot far from Ascalon: and strucke such a feare vpon the whole country, that they which dwelt In Ierusalem, were about to have forsaken the City: as for the King himselfe, hee lay close within the City of Ascalon, not daring to adventure upon so strong an enemy. Wherewith Saladin encouraged, and out of feare of his enemies, dispersed his army, some one way, some another, to forrage the country. Which the King perceining, secretly with all his power issued out of the City, if happily so he might ouertake the Sultan unawares, neither was he deceiued in his expectation: for comming fuddenly upon him, and fecretly charging him, he had with him for a good space an hard and doubtfull battell, untill that the victory by the power of God, at length inclining to the Christians, Saladin with his Turks fled, ouerthrowne with a great flaughter, most part of his great army being either there slain, or lost afterward with hunger and cold. This victory fell vnto the Christians the 25 day of Nonember, in the yere 1177, 1 1 7 7 potwithout the Almighty hand of God, the Turke having in his army about twenty fix shouland horsemen, and the King not past sourc hundred horse with some sew sootmen. Asser which victory, Baldwin in great triumph returned to Ierusalem, and there shortly after with great care and diligence repaired the decayed wals of the City. Saladin in revenge of this overthrow, made divers incursians into the frontiers of the Chri. The Christians Rians, and did great harme, aspecially in the country about Sidon. For the repressing whereof, the line of the country about sidon. For the repressing whereof, the line of the country about sidon. For the repressing whereof, the line of the country about sidon. For the repressing whereof, the line of the country about sidon.

the king put himselfe in arms, and going against him ouerthrew part of his army, as they were through be parrying away a great booty. - Of which ouerthrow Saladin understanding, came in such haste the Turkes. with the rest of his army as if it had bin a sudden tempest, vpon the Christians, then in great securitie dividing the spoile, of whom they slew a great number, and put the rest to slight: In which so sudden a confusion, otto, grand master of the Templars, and Hugh the Earle of Tripolis his fon in law, were both taken prisoners. The Earle himselfe with a few fled to Tirenthe King alfoat the same time was glad to shift for himselfe, and by slight to saue himselfe as he might:after which victory, Saladin besieged a strong castle which the king but the yere before had built vpon the banke of the river Iordan, and given it to the Templars, with the country round about, which castle Saladin took by force, and put to sword, all that were therein, except some few whom be carried away prisoners. By this victory Saladin became dreadfull vnto the Christians in Syria, which caused them, especially such as had any charge, with more vigilan-sie to looke about them. Yet shortly after, a peace was for a time concluded betwirt the Sul 2 G tan and the King: whereby their troubled estates breathed themselues almost the space of two veates.

But this fo welcome a calme was by domesticall troubles againe by the Kings friends sudw denly troubled for the Countie of Tripolis, to whom the gouernment of the kingdome was committed, comming towards Ierufalem, being by the fuggestion of his enemies brought in. to laspition with the King, as if he had affected the Kingdome, was to his great disgrace by the way commanded to ftay. The chiefe authors of which discontentment, were the Kings mother, a woman of a turbulent nature, and her brother the Kings Steward, who in the absence of the Earle, had wrought the Kings ficke mind according to their owne appetites. But the rest of the nobilitie wisely foreseeing vnto what great danger that discord might tend; in dia H fright of them, with much labor, caused him to be fent for againe, and so reconciled vnto the King: by which meanes that dangerous fire of diffention was for that time appealed, which afterwards brake our againe to the vtter ruine of that kingdome.

Saladin now weary of the league he had before made with King Baldwin, as no longer stan. ding with his haughty defignes, renounced the same, and raising a great power in Ægypt, set torward toward Damasco. Of whose comming King Baldwin having knowledge, with the whole power of his kingdome went to have met him, not farre from the dead Sea, and there encamped at an old towne called Petra, But Saladin turning out of the way, into the Kings territorie, came and encamped before Mount-Roiall, a castle which Baldwin had given vnto the Templars, about three daies march from the place where the King lay.

There Saladin with the spoile of the country refreshing his army, now weary of long travel, salibecollect for forward againe, and so without resistance arrived with his army at Damasco. At the same time, the Turks Captaines about Damasco, Bostrum, and Emissa, perceiving the frontiers of the Christians thereabout to be kept with small strength, passed ouer Iordan, and spoiling a great part of Galiley, befieged the castle of Burie, at the foot of Mount Tabor, not farre from the citie of Naim; which castle they in few dajes tooke, and having there made a great slaught ter, carried away with them about fine hundred prisoners. Saladis being come to Damasco; called together all the garrisons of that Kingdome, and joyning them vnto the forces hee brought out of Ægypt, entred into the Holy-Land: at which time the Countie of Tripolis, Gouernour of the Kingdome, lay ficke of burning feauer. Neuerthelesse the Kingen- K couraged by the Knights of the order, went out with his army against him; and encourring with him neere vnto a village called Frobolet, ouerthrew him in a great battell; wherein and afterward in the flight, most part of the Sultans armie perished : Saladin himselfe being glad by speedie flight to escape the danger, and so by long marches to get frim againe to Damasco.

In reuenge of this ouerthrow, Saladin having repaired his Army, and fent for his fleet out de the of Ægypt, came and besieged Beritus both by sea and land: at which time also his brother, whom he had left gouernour in Ægypt, besieged Darum, a strong Towne in the vettermost bounds of the Kingdome of Ierufalem towards Ægypt: both whole forces Baldwin being not able at once to represse, by the counsell of the nobilitie, thought it best first to relieve Beri- L tus, as the place of greatest importance. And for that purpose set forward with his armie by land, having alfo rigged up three and thirtie gallies at Tyre, for the feliefe thereof by fear Of which preparation Saladin understanding, as also of the Kings comming (by letters intercept ted by his fcouts, directed to the besieged, for the holding out of the slege; with promise of speedy reliefe) he presently rose with his army, and departed : whereof the King being adderfed, retired to Sephor.

Saladin inca- Not long after, Saladin according to his ambitious nature, defirous about measure to extend ang Mif post-mal, it in still the bounds of his Kingdome, and feeing the fuccesse of his attempts against the King of letmandally the rufalem not answerable to his defire, converted his forces vnto the Countries more East King of temfa- ward; and paffing the river Euphrates, and entring into Mesopotamila, partly by force, part ly by corruption, got into his hands the Cities of Edeffa, Carras, and divers others Lin which time the King of Ierusalem tooke occasion first to spoile the Countrey about Da masco, and after that divers other places of the Sultans Kingdome, making handebe of what focuer came in his way, and fo laded with the spoile of the Purks, retired to learning.

Saladin with victorie returning out of Mespotamia, in reuenge of the injuries done vnto him in his absence, marched directly to Aleppo, the strongest city of the Christians in that Aleppobetrayd part of Syria, which aboue all other he longed after: where hee had not long lien, but that it was by the treason of the Gouernour deliucred into his hands, with all the Countrie thereabouts: wherewith the Christian Princes were so discouraged, that they even then began to fear greater matters to enfue. The Prince of Antioch fold Tarfus the metropolitical city of Cilicia, to Rupinus Prince of Armenia, for that he faw it was not without great charge & daner to be by him defended, being so far from him, and Saladin as it were now stept in betwixt

At the same time King Baldwin at Nazareth fell sicke of a seuer, the leprosie also his old isease growing daily more and more upon him: insomuch as dispairing of his life, he called nto him Guy Lusignan County of Ioppa and Ascalon, vnto whom he had before espoused Syed his eldest sister, and in the presence of his mother, the Patriark, and all the chief commaners of the foldiers of the facred war, appointed him Gouernor of the kingdom, referuing vno himselse onely the title of a King, with the City of Ierusalem, and a yearely pension of ten thousand ducats: all which was done to the great disgrace and discontentment of the Couny of Tripolis the old gouernor.

It was not long, but that Saladin having breathed himselfe a little, after so great labours. ame again into the Holy land, where he took many castles, and did infinit harm; infomuch hat the country people were glad for fear, to forfake their houses, & fly into cities: the Chritian army in the mean time lying fast by at Sephor, not once moning, although many a faire ecasion were offered. For the chiese commanders affectionated unto the County of Tripos, and enuying at the preferment of Guy the new gouernour, were vnwilling to fight, but fining one excuse or other, suffered the enemy at his pleasure to spoil the country, and so in safeto depart; which he had neuer before done in those quarters.

Within leffe than a month after, Saladin with a great army well appointed with all the ha- Perra in value liments of war needful for the befieging of a city or ftrong castle, came again into the land befieged by the Palestine, and passing thorow the country beyond Iordan, sate down at last before Petra, in ope by the taking thereof to have made his passage betwixt Egypt and Damasco more safe. of which his purpose king Baldwin hauing knowledge, and taught by the cuil successe of late, o what small purpose it was to commit the managing of his wars vnto a Generall so eail beoued, and leffe regarded, as was Guy his brother in law; fent against him with his army Rayfund the County of Tripolis the old gouernor, whom he had again restored vnto the gouernnent, and displaced Guy. Of whose comming Saladin hearing, raised his siege after he had lien here a moneth, and fo departed.

A little before this expedition, the King still growing sicker and sicker, his foul disease still pcreafing, by the common confent of the nobilitie, he appointed Baldwin his nephew by his fter sybel, a child but of fine years old, to fucceed him in the kingdome; and the County of ripolis to have the government of the State during the time of his minoritie. This Sybella he Kings fisterwas first maried to William the yonger, Marquis of Mount Ferrat, who dying ithin three moneths after, left her with child of this his posthumus son Baldwin, now by his ncle deputed unto the hope of the Kingdome. After whose death she was maried unto Guy fignan County of Ioppa and Ascalon the late Gouernor: who taking in cuill part this the diffention in ngs definement, especially for the gouernment of the Kingdome by the County of Tripo-the Count of departed from the Court as a man discontented, vnto his City of Ascalon. Whereof the triark and the Princes of the sacred war fearing (and not without cause) great danger to intie, came to the king, then holding a Parliament in the city of Acon, most humbly requesting im, for avoiding of further danger, and the fafety of his kingdom, to receive againe into his mour the County Guy his brother in law, and to make an attonement between him and the County of Tripolis. But this their request forted to no purpose: so that the Parliament at hat time was dissolved without any thing for the good of the Commonweale in that point oncluded.

After that time the kingdom of Ierusalem began still more and more to decline. In the old ing Baldwin (fick both in body and minde) was almost no hope: in the young King (yet vnt for so great a burthen) much lesse: and the dissention betwixt the two Counties Guy and Icrafalem.

Raymund with their fauorites, was like enough to bring great harme vnto the State. Besides 6 that, the County of Tripolis fearing the power of Guy his enemy, was thought to have fecree intelligence with Saladin the Turk : infomuch as the King was almost in purpose to have proclaimed him traitor. Wherfore the King now rested only vpon the counsel of William Arch. bishop of Tyre, and the Masters of the Knights of the sacred war: by whose adurce hee sent Balloin Heraelius Patriark of Ierusalem, Roger Molins Master of the Knights of S. Johns, and Arnold ma. fter of the Knights Templers vnto Lucius the third then Pope, vnto Fredericke the Emperour. der vate the charles the French King, and Henry the fecond, King of England, to declare vnto them the dangerous effate of that Christian kingdome, and to craue their aid against the Infidels. These Embaffadors comming vnto the Councell then holden at Verona, with great grauitie and diligence, in the presence of the Pope and of the Emperor, declared the hard estate of the Chri. H stians of the East, with their humble petition vnto them for aid, in such fort that they moved them with all the Princes there present, to compassion. From thence they were by the Pope directed ynto Philip the French King, with whom having dispatched their affaires, they from him passed ouer into England, and afterward into Germany; and had at length brought their negotiation to fo good paffe, that in every place great preparation was made for a great expedition to be made against the Turkes, for reliefe of the Christians in the East. With which good newes the Embassadors returning to Ierusalem, filled the sicke King with hope of great matters. But greater quarrels shortly after arising betwixt the Pope and the Emperour, and tharp war likewife betwixt the French King and the King of England, and the other Christi. an Princes also being at no better quiet; the notable expedition that had with the expedition on thereof fo filled the whole world, was again laid afide and quite dashed. Wherof K. Bald. nin vinderstanding, both by messengers and letters from his friends, oppressed with griefe and beautine fle more than with the force of his disease (a man for his prowesse and painfulnes not 1185 inferior to any his predeceffors) died without issue the 16 day of May, Anno 1185, being but 25 yeares old, wherof he had reigned twelue. His body was afterward with the general mourning of his subjects, solemnly buried in the Temple neer vnto mount Calvary, together with his predecessors the Kings of Ierusalem.

King Baldwin thus buried, Baldwin the fift of that name, yet but a boy, was crowned King. But then began the sparks which had of long lien raked vp and hidden in the ashes, to breake out into a great fire for Raymund County of Tripolis pretended the whole government of the kingdom and the tuition of the king to be due vnto him, by appointment of the late king, and confent of the nobilitie: and did so much, that he had almost obtained it to have bin confirmed vnto him in open parliament. But Sybella a woman of a most haughty spirit (sister to the late King, and mother vnto the yong King yet living) prickt forward her husband Guy, in no case to give place vnto his competitor Raymund; and so animated him, that by the help of his own fauorits, and the countenance of Boniface Marquis of Mount-Ferrat (who even then was come with a great power into Syria) he extorted from the Nobilitie what soeuer hee desired, But seuen moneths were scarse well passed, but that this yong King Baldwin was dead and buried, poisoned (as was reported) by his mother, for the defire the had of the kingdom, ber selfer Whose death she with all secrecie concealed, untill she had obtained of the Patriark &other la princes of the kingdom, that Guy her husband might be proclaimed King. So by her means it was fowrought, that vpon one and the felfe same day, the yong King Baldwin was buried by his yncle, and Guy the County crowned. This yong King Baldwin, by reason of his tender yeres and short reign, is of some not reckoned amongst the Kings of Ierusalem: howbeit, seeinghe was by his vncle and the princes of that time thought worthy of the kingdome, let him also haue his place amongst the rest, as the eighth King of Ierusalem.

When Guywas thus possessed of the kingdom, the County of Tripolis seeing himselfe out of all hope of the government, and highly therewith discontented, did what hee might by all means to croffe the doings of the King: whose sicke and aspiring minde Saladin pricktdayly more and more forward, promifing him his helping hand when focuer he should need; which curtefie the County defiroufly embraced. For now the fatall period of the Kingdome of Ierufalem, grew fast on, and all things tended to destruction, discord reigning in enery place: which Saladin well perceiuing (after he had compacted with the County) by messengers sent of purpose, inuited the Turkes, Sarasins, and Egyptians, as men agreeing in the same Religion, generally to take up arms in to fit an opportunitie of the discord of the Christians, assu- adadia upon ring them of great prey and spoil, besides the honor of the conquest. The city of Ptolemais the different of was the place by him appointed, where all this power should meet: whither such a multitude taketh eccasion of the barbarous Mahometans (partly for the hatred of the Christian Religion, partly for the to inuade tha hope of the rich spoile which Saladin had promised them) came flocking out of all places, that in short time there was met together about fifty thousand horsemen, besides an infinite number of foot: and vnto fuch as could not fafely passe by the borders of Jerusalem, to them the falle County gaue fale conduct by the countries of Tyberias, Nazareth and Galile.

All the power of the Infidels thus affembled, Saladin laid fiege vnto the city of Ptolemais: Ptolemais Ptolemais which the Templers and Knights Hospitalers had notably fortified and firongly manned (as geally saladis. before vnto them given by the King of Ierusalem to desend against the Insidels) and therein now were both the Masters of both those honorable Orders, with the whole floure of Knights of their profession. Unto this City Saladin game a most terrible assault upon May day in the morning, Anno 1187, which was by the Christians notably defended, & the enemy with great flaughter still beaten down. In the heat of this affault, the two great Masters fallying with certain troups of their most ready horimen, affailed the enemies camp, & bearing down al before them, raifed there a great tumult; and by and by turning vpon the backs of them that were affaulting the city, made there an exceeding great flaughter. Infomuch that Saladin difmaid, first with the confusion in his camp, and now with the sudden danger behinde him, was glad to giue ouer the affault, and to turn his whole forces vpon them, where was fought a most bloudy and terrible battell. Amongst others that there fought, the County of Tripolis, now an enemy vnto God and his country, difguifed in the habit of a Turk, notably helped the Infidels, and meeting with the Master of the Knights Hospitalers, unhorsed him; who, surcharged with the weight of his armor, and oppressed with the multitude of his enemies, there lied. Neuertheles such was the valor of these worthy men, and new succor still comming out of the city, that Saladin having in that battell and at the affault loft 15000 of his Turkes, was glad with the rest to betake himselfe to slight. Neither was this so notable a victory gained by the Christians without bloud, most part of the worthy Knights Hospitalers being together with their grand Master there slain.

Saladin by this cuerthrow perceiuing, that by open force he thould not be able to do much against the Christians, thought it good vnto his forces to join also policie. Wherein the false County of Tripolis was the man he thought best to make choice of, as his fittest instrument towork by. Him he compacted withall, to feek for grace at the King of Ierufalems hand, as of his dread Soueraign, and after to long discord, to sue to be reconciled vnto him, as now weary of the Turks amity, with whom he should make shew to be etterly fallen out. At which time alfo, to give the matter the better grace, Saladin of purpose with a great army came and besseged Tiberias, a city of the Counties jurifdiction: for the reliefe wherof the traiterous County craued aid of the King and the other Princes of the facred war. Who with an army, though not great, yet very well appointed, came according to his defire, and incamped neer vnto the ountain of Sophor: where they had not long staid, but that they met with the huge army of the Turkes, beeing in number fix score thousand horse and eight score thousand soot, with whom they joined a most sharp and terrible battell, which by reason of the extremitic of the eate of the weather (it then beeing the twelfth of July) and the approch of the night, was a gain given over, both armies as if it had bin by content retyring. The next day the battell was again begun, wherein the Turks, by the treaton and tham efull flight of the falle County of Tripolis, gained the victory. In this battell, Guy the King himselfe, with Gerard master of Guyking of The the Templers, Boniface Marquis of Mont-Ferrat, and divers others, men of great rank, were ta- infilem taken ken prisoners. And to say the truth, In this battel was broken the whole strength of the Chri-prisoners. Mians in the East.

The Christian commonweal by the treason of the salse County thus betrayed to the Infidels, Saladin without any great refiftance, had the cities of Ptolemais, Biblis, and Berithus delivered vnto him: in all which places hee vsed his victorie with great moderation, not inforeing any Christian (more than the Latines) to depart thence, but suffring them there still to remain as before, yeelding vnto him their obedience, with fuch tribute as he had imposed upon them. With like good fortune he within the space of one moneth tooke all the port Townes betwixt Sidon and Alcalon alongst the sea coast, excepting only the antient city of Tyrewn. G to the city of Afcalon also hee laid fiege by the space of nine daies : but loth to stay the course of his victory, by the valor of the defendants resolued there to spend their lives, he departed thence, and marched directly vnto lerufalem the chiefe city of that kingdom : and anproching the lame, gaue fummons therunto, perfuading the citifens yet whilst they had time. to yeeld themselves together with the city vnto his mercy. Which they refusing to do he inclosed the same with his army, and by the space of 14 days layd hard siege vnto it, leaving no. thing vndone or vnattempted, that might ferue for the gaining thereof. At which time the citisens considering the danger they were in, and that the strength of the kingdome, with the flour of their Chivalry were in the late battell loft, and that they were not now to expect any forcin aid; agreed upon certain conditions to yeeld up the city; which were, That fuch Chrie H flians as would, might remain still with their libertie and goods; and that such as would not might in fafety depart with fo much of their goods as they could carry vpon their backes. These conditions being by Saladin granted, the holy city was vnto him delivered the second of October, Anno 1187; after it had been by the Christians holden from the time that it was by Godfrey of Buillon and other Christians won, about 89 years. Saladin entring into the city, prophaned first the Temple of the Lord, converting it vnto the vse of his Mahometan superstition: the other churches he yied as stables for his horses, only the temple of the Sepulchre was by the Christians for a great sum of mony redeemed, and so kept undefiled. The Latine Chriitians he thrust out of the city, yet with leave to cary with them such things as they were able themselves to bear: who travelling with heavy burthens, but much more heavy hearts, some to Tripolis, some to Tyre, and some to Antioch (for only these three cities were now lest vnto the Christians) were by the false County of Tripolis by the way lightned of their burthens, to the increasing of the heavinesse of their hearts, most of them being by him and his followers spoiled of that little they had by the mercy of their enemies faued in the ruine of their Vnto the other Christians that were naturall Syrians, Greeks, Armenians, Georgians, and fuch like, saladin appointed certain places of the city for them to dwell in, where some of their posteritie were long time after to be found. All the monuments of the Christians were by the barbarous Mahometans and Turks defaced; onely the sepulchre of our blessed Saujour Christ, with the monuments of Godfrey of Buillon and his brother Baldwin, for the reverence of the men, were by them spared. In these so great troubles aboue 2000 of the Christians The death of periffied. Among the rest, the County of Tripolis was shortly after found dead in his bed, and as fome fay, circumcifed; a manifest token of his revolt, not from the King only, but from the trof Impela. Christian laith alto.

Icrusalem thus won, Saladin returned again to the siege of Ascalon, which after hee had by the space of ten daies most streitly belieged was to him by composition deliucred: wheringmongst other things agreed vpon for the safe departure of the Citisens, was comprised also, That he flould freely fet at liberty Guy the King, and Gerard master of the Templers, both before taken prisoners, as is before declared; which he afterward performed.

Thus the victorious Turk stil viging his good fortune, departing thence, attempted to have L taken Tripolis: but having made some proofe of his owne forces, and the valour of the defendants, he was glad to give over the siege, and to depart as he came. Marching thence with his army, because he would leave no place vnattempted, he laid siege vnto the city of Tyre, where Conrade Marquis of Mont-Ferrat was a little before arrived with Isaac Angelus the Greek Emperors fleet, and a supply of certain companies of good soldiers. Vntowhich place were come great numbers of the poor distressed Christians, fled from Ierusalem and other places, so that

This city Saladin most furiously assaulted, but was by the Christians notably repulsed, not without the great losse of his best soldiers. At which time also the Admirall of Sicilia discomfitted his fleet at sea, and landing his forces came vnlooked for vpon the back of him. So M that having his hands ful before by them of the town, and charged behind by these new come enemies, he was glad to retyre in such hast, as that hee left his Tents, with all that therein was, about Antioch, with fire and fword destroying what soener was subject to his fury cuen to the gates of the city. But knowing that so strong a city was not without great charge and a long liege to be won, he thought good to make proofe if it might by policie or corruption be gaihed. Wherein he so cunningly dealt with the Patriark, that he had by his meanes the Castle Trefamous city totherwise almost impregnable) for gold betraied to him. By means wherof he in short time of Ansoch bibecame lord & mafter of that famous city (about 90 years before hardly gained by the whole Tarks. sower of the Christians, after eleven months siege) and with it twenty five cities moe, that epended of the fortune thereof, with all the provinces belonging thereunto, alwaies deemed b haue bin the third part of the kingdom of Terufalem.

The loffe of fo great a city, together with the ruine of the whole kingdome, had in a fhorr pace filled every corner of Christendom with the heavy report therof. Wherwith the Chrihian Princes of the West (namely Frederick the German Emperour, with Frederick his sonne luke of Suevia, Philip the French King, Henry the second, King of England, Otto duke of Burgondie, Leopold Duke of Austria, with many other great Princes and Prelats of Germany, Itay, and other places) not a little moued, as also with the pittifull complaints of the Embassadors at the same time sent from the distressed Christians, and the effectuall persuasions of Clement the third, then Pope; promised, and all or most part indeed made great preparations: which they afterward, though not all at once (as letted by other occasions) but at divers times imployed, for the most part with the danger of their own persons, against the Turkes, for the reliefe of the poor oppressed Christians, and recourry of the Holy land : but with what succes shall hereafter (God willing) be declared.

Of which so great preparations made against him, Saladin not ignorant, set at liberty Gan King of Ierusalem, who contrary to his promise made at Ascalon, he had now detained a year prison, yet before his inlargement exacting of him an oath, Neuer by force of arms afterwards to feek to recouer his kingdom, or to revenge the wrongs he had fustained thoping therby to flay the comming of the other Princes in his quarell. Which oath for all that, the Pope dispensed withall, as extorted by constraint from him, at such time as Saladin had longer demined him in prison than of right he should.

Guy now at liberty, and yet in mind a King, came to Tyre, but could not be there received, the Citisens having before sworne their obedience to Conrade Marquis of Mont Ferrat, who had notably defended them against the fury of Saladin. Wherfore departing thence with such power as he had, and the dispersed Christians daily repairing vnto him out of all parts of Syria, he came and befreged Ptolemais: where he had not long lien, but first came vnto him the Venetian fleet, with them also of Pisa, and after them the Flemings with a fleet of fifty saile, who all joined their forces together for the winning of the city. But whilest the Christians thus lay at the siege of Ptolemais, came Saladin with a great army for the reliefe of the besieged; where betwirt him and the Christians was fought a great battell, wherein the Christians at the first had the better, but afterward fainting, and ready to fly, had there vidoubtedly received a great overthrow, had not Iefferey Lusignan the Kings brother (left for the garding of the campe) in good time come in with new supplies, and not only stayd their flight, but al-To repressed the further pursuit of the fierce enemy, now almost in possession of the desired victorie. Neuerthelesse there were 2000 Christians there slain, and amongst them Gerard Ma-Her of the Templers. Saladin by that which was now done, perceiving how hard a matter it would be for him by land to relieue the city, fent for the fleet which hee had firongly rigged vp at Alexandria, and so by force put new supplies both of men and victuals into the besieged city. Wherewith the Turks encouraged, made often fallies upon the Christians, and in despight of the Christian religion, whipped the image of Christ crucified, which they had for that purpose in the fight of the Christians set up upon the top of the wall. With the said fleet also he so scoured the seas, that no victuals or new supplies of men could that way without great danger be brought vinto the campe: whereby such scarcitie and want of all things began shortly after to arise among the Christians, that some of them not able longer to endure the famin, fled vnto the Turks camp, then lying not far off, crying out for bread. Of which distresse in the campe of the Christians Saladin knowing right well, both by such sugitiues as dayly came ouer vnto him, and by his own espials; yet made shew as if he vnder stood nothing thereof, but suddenly rising with his army, as doubtfull of his own strength, departed, leaving his camp full of all maner of victuals: whereof the Christians understanding, and supposing of him for fear to have bin gon indeed, in great numbers hasted vnto the torsaken camp as vnto a most defired prey : where whilest they were gorging themselves, Saladin suddenly returning, and getting betwixt them and home, made of them a great flaughter. Neuertheles the Chriflians having now lien before the city fix months, continued the fiege all the Winter, ouercomming with patience the hardest difficulties, in hope of aid from the other Christian princes, whole comming they expected with the first of the next Spring: during which time many an hot skirmith passed betwixt them and the Turks both by sea and land.

Whilest the Christians thus lay at the siege of Ptolemais, Frederick the Emperor, with diuers of the great German princes and others, before refolued vpon an expedition for the reco-Fredericke the Experiour fets usery of the Holy land, and the reliefe of the distressed Christians in Syria: having now raised H forward in a great army, furnished with all things necessary for so long a journey, set forward from Ratif. bone, and to comming to Vienna, and passing thorow Hungary, Bulgaria, and Thracia, ariued at length at Constantinople; where he was by Isaac Angelus the Emperor that then reigned. honorably entertained, but indeed more for feare and fathion fake, than for any loue or good wil: for that he, after the suspitious manner of the Greeks, having in distrust so great a power of the Latine Emperors, withed rather for his absence than his presence; and therfore ceased not in what he might, to haften his paffage ouer into Asia, pretending for the colour thereof. the necessitie the Christians had of his present aid. So the Emperour with his army passing ouer the streit, and without refistance marching thorow the greatest part of the lesser Asia, entred into Lycaonia, where meeting with a great power of the Turks, who were come from the Sultan of Iconium to stay his further passage, he ouerthrew him in a great battell: and so marching directly on to Iconium, took it by force, and gaue the spoile thereof vnto his fouldiers, in reuenge of the injuries before done vnto his vncle the Emperor Conrade, by the Souldan of that city. Departing thence, and marching thorow Cilicia, hee in another battell ouerthrew the Turks, that having taken the streits of the mountains, had thought to have stayd his further paffage into Syria. After that he took the city Philomela (which the Sultan had strongly fortified) and rased it to the ground, putting to the sword all the people therein, for that they contrary to the law of Nations, had flaine such messengers as hee had sent vnto them for the fummoning of the city. In like manner he entred into the leffer Armenia, where he tooke the city Melitene, and subdued all the country thereabouts: vnto the relief wherof the Turks & comming with a most huge army, wereby him with an exceeding great slaughter ouerthrown and put to flight. After that, entring into Comagena, and meeting with Saphadin, Saladin his fon, with a great Army of the Turks, he ouerthrew him in the plain field, and discomfitted his whole army. But whilest he too eagerly pursueth his enemy hee had then in chase, his horse foundring vnder him as he passed the river Saleph, hee was so ouerthrown, and his foot hanging fast in his stirrop, drawne thorow the deepe river, and almost drowned; and at the farther fide of the riner was fo plunged by his horse at his landing, that he was taken up for dead: yet breathing a little, and casting vp his eies to heaven, with much adoe heevttered these sew words, Lordreseine my Soule; and fo in the hands of them that tooke him vp, gaue vp the gholt, vnto the great griefe and hinderance of the Christian commonweal. For Saladin hearing of L his approch, was so afraid of him, as that he began to doubt, not how to keepe that he had before got in Syria, but how to defend himselse in Egypt. Thus miserably perished this worthy Emperor the tenth of lune, in the yeare of Grace 1190, being then of the age of feuentie yeares, whereof he had with much trouble reigned eight and thirty. His dead body was carried along with the army, and afterward with all funeral pomp buried in the cathedral church

Frederick the Emperor thus dead, Frederick his fon Duke of Suevia, was by the general con-Emperous for fent of the Princes in the army chosen Generall in his stead : vpon whom, with the rest of the the charges army, yet mourning for the death of the Emperor, the Turks gaue a sudden and fierce charges in hope fo to have overthrown them; but finding greater refistance than they had before sup- M posed, and having lost some of their men, they with like speed that they came, retyred agains. Now began famine (one of the ordinarie attendants of great Armies) to encrease in the Campe : for why, the Turks for that purpose had before destroyed or carried away all that was in the country, leaving nothing for the Christians more than the bare ground. Wherfore

Frederick

Frederick turning a little out of the way, came to Antioch, which was eafily deliucted to him, and his hungry foldiers well refreshed by the citifens, being as yet for the most part Christians. But he had not there stayd past fifteen dayes for the refreshing of his army, but that the plague (the hand-maid of Famin, and another scourge of the greatest multitudes) began to rage among his foldiers in fuch fort, that he was glad with his army to forfake the city, & to get him abroad again into the open field : where forthwith newes was brought vnto him, that Dodganin Generall of such forces as Saladin had sent for out of Egypt (which were not small) was by great journies comming towards him. Against whom he in good order set forward, with his fathers Corse still caried in the midst of his army. These two armies meeting together, and both willing to fight, joined a great and doubtfull battell, fortune now inclining to Agree benefit the one fide, and by and by to the other; the Christians exceeding their enemies in valor, and Tracks and the they them again in number. At length the Christians in the vantgard began to retyre, & they christians. that seconded them were also hardly charged : when Frederick mindfull of his fathers valour, with a troup of valiant horfmen brake into the enemies battel with fuch force, that the Turks were glad to give ground: after whom Leopold Duke of Austria comming presently on with his footmen, brought fuch a feare upon the whole army of the Turks, that they betook themfelues to speedy flight. In this battell were 4000 of the enemies flain, with small losse of the Christians, and about 1000 more taken prisoners, with 15 of their ensignes. After which victorie, Frederick marching further into Coelo-Syria, pacified Laodicea then in mutinie, and like to haue bin deliuered to the Turks. He alfo with a little labor took Berythus, with diuers other cities of Syria, which before belonging vnto the Kings of Ierufalem, were now revolted vnto the Turks. So afterward comming to Tyre, he there folemnly buried his father, (dead as is before faid) and from thence certified Gny the King (still lying with the other Christian Princes at the fiege of Ptolemais) of his comming who forthwith fent the Marquis of Mont-Ferrat with part of the fleet, to transport him with his people that were left, by sea, for that by land he could not so safely have come, being now but weake, for meeting with Saladan, who with a great army lay still houering about his besieged city, intentiue to all opportunitie. So was Duke Frederick with his foldiers yet left, safely by sea conducted from Tyre to the camp at Ptolemais, and there joyfully received by the King and the other Princes, with the general applause of the whole camp.

In the mean time the Turks fallying out of Ptolemais, had done great harme amongst the Christians, by whom they were not without some losse againe repulsed. But after the comming of duke Frederick, it was thought good by the general confent of all the great commanders in the army, that the city should be assaulted round, and to that purpose was enery mans regiment appointed what place to affail. The King himselse with the Templers and the Ita-Piolemia delians from Pifa, undertook that part of the city which was toward the fea: unto duke Frederick (autied by the and his Germans was allotted all betwixt the bridge over the river Bele, and the Bishops pa- Christians. lace: the Venetians, Genoa's, and Knights Hospitalers were appointed unto the rest of the wall as far as the court of Raymund: the Frifelanders, Flemings and Hollanders tooke vp all the rest of the wall vnto the sea side. Thus was the City at once on eucry side assailed by the Christians, with such fury, as if they had thereon purposed to ingage their whole forces, seeking by a thoufand wounds, and a thoufand kinds of death, to have by their fealing ladders gained the top of the walls; the Turks with no lesse courage still beating them down again. But in the heate of this fodreadfull and desperat assault, Saladin stil houering aloof, came now vpon the sudden and assailed the camp of the Christians, filling the same with sear and tumult: whose charge they that were left for the desence of the same, at the first notably received; but finding themselues too weak, began to give ground: by which means the Turks took certain tents with some ensignes, and fired some other of the paullions of the Christians, having slain aboue an hundred of the defendants.

The Christians in the mean time little prevailing in the assault, and troubled with the danger of their camp, retyred to the reliefe thereof. But the Turk perceiving himfelfe too weake for the whole power of the Christians, retyred also; yet not with such hast but that hee had there almost lost himselse. This notable assault was given the sourteenth of October: after which many light skirmishes passed betwixt the Christians and the Turks, but more for booty than for any other great purpose.

In the meane time divers great Princes of the West that had vowed themselves to this fa- G cred war, came thither, whose number rather increased the want of victuals, than furthered the feruice. At which time also, the discord betwixt Guy the King (whose wife and children were now dead) and Conrade Marquis of Mont-Ferrat (who had maried Isabel the late queens fifter. by whom he pretended a claim puto the title of the imaginary kingdom) did much harm ynto the proceedings of the Christians: so pleasing a thing these hauty stiles be vnto the loste minds of the ambitious. Shortly after, the Christians yet lying at the fiege, the contagion and famin full increasing, it fortuned that duke Frederick fell sick of the plague, whereof he died and with the great mourning of the whole army was afterward folemnly buried fast by his father, in the Cathedral Church at Tyre; after whose death the Christians attempted no great matter against the city, although they were by the Turks often prouoked, but lay still strong. H

ly intrenched expecting some greater aid from the Princes of the West. Now all the hope of the Christians affairs in Syria and in the land of Palestine, rested your the comming of the two mighty Princes, Philip the fecond of that name, King of France, and Richard the first, King of England: who having agreed betwixt themselves, with their combined forces to relieue the diffressed Christians of the East, and again (if it were possible) to repair the broken state of the kingdom of Ierusalem, were now met together at Marseilles in Prouence. From whence the French King first departing with his fleet for Sicilia, and with a profeerous gale for certain daies holding on his course, and now come nigh vnto the Island. was by force of a furious tempest suddenly arising, so tossed and tumbled in the deep, that many of his ships there perished eaten up of the sea; others by force of weather driven upon the fands and rocks, were broken all to pieces; and the rest, some with their masts broken, some with their tackling and fails rent, & all in generall fore weather-beaten, with much ado ariued at Messena the desired Port. At which place King Richard also (but with better fortune)ardued with his fleet also. Both the Kings now met together, resolued there to winter the French King inforced by necessitie so to do, for the repairing of the late losses he had received, as wel in his people and prouision, as in his shipping; all which was to be relieued by new supplies out of France: and the King of England staying to take order for the dowry of his fifter 1048 (widow of William the late King of Sicilia) with Tancred the base son of Roger, who had now aspired vnto the kingdom of that Island. About which matter great stirs arose betwixt King Richard the Queens brother, and Tancred the new king; infomuch that it was like to have broken out into open war, had it not to the good contentment of King Richard bin otherwise taken up, and fo the controuerfic ended. But whilft thefe two great Kings thus wintred in this fruitfull Island, and oftentimes as good friends met together, somtime for their disport, and fomtime to confer of their fo weighty affaires, (the way as was thought to have appealed all former displeasure, and to have encreased love) it fell out clean contrary, jealousie and distrust not only remaining the old, but also still raising new quarrels betwirt them, to the great hinderance of the Common good by them intended. Which may serue for awarning to all great Princes, willing to continue in amitie, and to hold a good opinion one of another, neuer to fee one the other; or comming fo to an interview, not to converse or stay long together; which as it is not often done without the danger of their persons, so can it not possibly be long continued, but that it will ingender in themselues, as well as in their followers, jealousie, enuy, hatred and distrust, as we have before faid, and hereafter in the course of this historie may

There was an old quarrell betwixt these two great Kings, Richard and Philip, about Adela the Learnest 18.19 French Kings fifter; whom Richard having before (his father yet living) affianced, had now rethe Fechine French Kings inter; whom kienara nating before (his father yet fluing) affianced, had now re-and Juliand jected, as her whom his aged father Henry the second had too familiarly vied: and in stead of K. of Luguard her, to the great difgrace of the French, espoused the Lady Berengaria, daughter to the King of Navar. Which indignitie with divers others then arising betwixt the French and English, as then with great heart-burning smouldred vp in respect of the common cause then in hand, afterwards brake out again to the shamefull ouerthrow of this most honorable expedition, and M lamentable disturbance of both realms.

Winter past, and the Spring now come, the French King not altogether the best pleased, first loosed from Messena, and with his fleet in safety arrived at Ptolemais, where hee was by the Christians, now the third yeare lying at the siege, so joyfully received, as if he had been

o them fent with fuccors from heauen. After whom thortly after followed also king Richard. f whose fleet (by force of weather sore beaten and dispersed) two ships by the rage of the empeft driven aground upon the coast of Cyprus, were by the Island people spoiled, and the hen that in them had hardly escaped the danger of the sca, with most barbarous inhumanity, some flain, and fome taken prisoners; the rest of the fleet arriving there also, were with like incivilitie forbidden to land; the Cypriots ready at hand in all places to keep them off. With which fogreat an indignitie the King justly moved, and by force landing his people, with in- K Richard ie. redible celeritie and successe over-ran the whole Island, never ceasing untill hee had made a jury don to his ill conquest thereof, and taken Isaac Commenus (commonly called the king of that Island, and people by the fome, for what reason I know not, Emperor of the Griffons) prisoner: yet was hee indeed cypriats. either King nor Emperor, but being a man of great nobilitic and power, and of the honourale flock of the Comneni, had in the trouble for reign of Andronicus Comnenus the Emperor his busin, laid hold upon that fruitfull Island, and there tyrannifed as a reputed King, untill that ow he was by King Richard taken prifoner, and for his unfaithfull dealing fent falt bound in haines of filuer into Syria. The King thus possessed of the whole Island, there at Limozin haried the Lady Berengaria the King of Navars daughter, brought thither by Ioan late queen of Sicilia, the Kings fifter. And so disposing of all things as he thought best, for the safe keeping of the Island, set forward again with his fleet towards Syria: where by the way hee light pon a great (hip of the Sultans, laded with victuals and warlike prouisions for the reliefe of the befieged; all which became a prey unto him. So holding on his course, he at length arried at Ptolemais, where he was by the French King and the rest of the Christians there lying, K.Richard asia most honorably received.

Now had the city of Ptolemais bin three yeares besieged by the Christians, and notably efended by the Turks:during which time, many an hot affault and bloudy skirmish had pasd betwixt them. And now the cies of all men were fixed upon the two Kings of England and France, vnto whom all the rest offered their obedience and service. The Christian campe as great, composed especially of Englishmen, Frenchmen, Italians, and Almanes; nor them that were left of the Emperor Fredericks army, (for they were for the most part dead, or els refurned home again into their countries) but of fuch as monued with the zeal they bare to this religious war, came daily in great numbers thither, as did also many others of diucrs nations,

These religious and worthy Christians thus lying at the siege, had with much painfull labor undermined one of the greatest Towers of the city, called the accurred Tower, with some part of the wall also, by means wherof they were in hope to find a way into the city. Wherefore all things being now in readinesse for the firing of the mine, it was thought good by geperall confent, that an affault should also at the same time be given vnto the city: and thereapon euery regiment was by lot appointed which part of the wal to affail, which they all wirls great courage undertook. In the heat of which affault, the aforefaid undermined tower, with tome part of the wall (the timber whereon it stayd, now burnt) fell downwith a great fall, lay... ing open a fair breach for the Christians to enter : wherwith the Turkes dismayed, for thwith traued to come to parley, which granted, they for fafegard of their liues yeelded forthwith to tive up the city, and to restore to the Christians the holy Crosse, with two thousand captines ind 200 horsemen, such as they should require of all them that were in the power of Saladin; pefides 200000 Constantinopolitan ducats to be by him given to the two Kings, for the cost by them bestowed in the siege. For paiment whereof the Turks in the city were to remaine as hostages under the safe keeping of the Christians: so that if all the conenants aforesaid were not within forty days performed by Saladin, they should all for their lives be at the kings mercie. So was this strong city, after it had bin almost three years besieged, deliuered up unto the Christians the 12 of July, Anno 1191. The first that entred were the Germanes of Austria, who as if they had bin the only men by whose valor the city was won, at their first entry presumptuoufly aduanced their enfignes vpon the top of the wals, to the great offence of all the refl of the Christian Princes, but especially of King Richard, who (not vnworthily for his princely courage, commonly called Richard Cueur de Lyon) not brooking fo proud an indignitie, caused the enfignes of Leopold their Duke to be puld down and foiled under foot; which shortly after gave him occasion of repentance, as shall hereafter be seen.

The two Kings possessed of the city, divided the same, with all the people and spoil therofy betwixt them, without regard of the rest of the other noble Christians that had sustained the whole travel of that long siege: for which cause most of them, seeing themselves so deluded, withdrew themselves from them, swith one consent sent them word, that they would for sake them, except they were made partakers of the gains, as they had bin of the pains. Which the two Kings to content them promised they should; howbeit they so long delayed their promises, that many worthy men, constrained by poverty, departed discontented from them, into their own countries.

But long it was not that this one city so lately gained could contain these two kings, whom two large kingdoms could not retain in peace: for abeit they were in body together present, and in one, and that a most honourable action, combined, yet were they in hearts far asunder, it and their secret designes much different; envy and distrust still reuting which makes past, and ministring new matter of greater discontentments. King Richard according to his noble nature, was of nothing more desirous, than to have had the war continued wrill they had made a full conquest of Syria and the land of Palestine; and for that cause requested the French king to bind himselfe together with him by solemne oath, there to stay yet three years, for regaining those countries. But he in mind long before estranged from King Richard, and in his deep conceit plotting matters never home better fitting his purpose, would by no means be persuaded so to do, but still sound one occasion or other for to colour his departure. And shortly after (as the French Chronicles report) falling extremely sicke, he requested King Richard and the other Christian princes to come unto him: vnto whom being come, hee in sew words I declared his purpose of return, as followeth:

I cannot (my Lords) longer endure the inclemencie and intemperature of the aire in this extreme hot season. If my death might prosit the Christian Religion, or any one of you, or the Christian Common season, there should be no distemperature what sould separate me from you, or could draw mee from hence. But more may the life of one absent, serve and prosit you, than the death of him present small of necessitie depart syst at my departure I will leave you sive hundred men at armes, and ten though sometiment, the source and choice of all the Forces of France, under the conduct of my Cousin Ododuke of Europandie, unto whom I will give pay and entertainment, with a continual supply of all things for the mice of all things for

This excuse of the French Kings, King Richard could not take in good part: but said, That it was apparant to all men, that he abandoned the wars in Syria, to return into France, for no other end or purpose but the more easily to inuade the provinces of Guyen and Normandy, now disfurnified of their garrifens, and so subject to his malice. Which point hee so vrged, that the French King could have no leave with his honor to depart, vntill such time as he had by folemn oath bound himselfevnto King Richard, not to attempt any thing either by force of traud against him or any thing of his, vntill fifty daies were expired after King Richard his return home: which how well it was by the French King observed, I leave to the report of the histories of that time. And so the French King, not to be intreated any langer to stay, leaving L behind him the aforefuld number of men he had promifed, imbarking the rest of his army, and accompanied with three tall thips of the Genoa's his friends, and Ruffin Volta their Admiral, departed from Ptolemais to Tyre, the first of August, and two daies after loofing thence, sailed along st the sea coast of Asia, and cutting through the Mediterranian, arrived at length in the mouth of the river of Tyber, and from thence went to Rome; where after hee had visited Pope Celeffine, and the famous places of that most renowned city, hee returned again vnto his fleet, and fo by fea arrived fafely in France; having in that great expedition, so honorably by h m vndertaken, performed nothing answerable to that the world looked for.

After the French King, followed Leopold Duke of Austria, with his Germans: and not long standing, & that the Christian forces were thereby much impaired, refused either to pay the moreouer to chop off the heads of all such Christian captines as he had in his power, if the King should shew extremity to the pledges of the city. Neuertheles shortly, after he fent his nbassadors with great presents vnto the King, requesting a longer time for the sparing of spledges: which his request, together with his gifts, the King resused to grant or accept. Thereupon Saladin forthwith caused such Christian captives as were in his power, to be beaded: which albeit King Richard understood, yet would he not prevent the time before acced upon for the execution of his prisoners, being the twentieth day of August; upon which y he caused the Turks prisoners (to the number of 2500 (or as the Germanes and French tee, to the number of 7000) in the sight of Saladins army to be executed.

The losse of the strong town of Ptolemais much impaired the reputation of Saladin, even ong his own people: as it commonly salls out, that the evill successe of a great Commanion his affaires, altereth the good will, affection, and opinion, especially of the vulgar fort, ich judge of all things by the event. And albeit that his losses were great, and such unted him; yet he thought it best, as the case then stood, to make them greater, and with own hands (as it were) to ruinat and overthrow such towns and cities as as he saw he could tkeep, rather than to suffer them whole and vndesaced to fal into the enemies hand. So cared headlong with dispaire, he caused all the towns he had along the sea coast in Syria and lestine, to be sacked and ruinated, and their walls overthrown; especially such as were of ost importance, and like to stand the Christians in stead, namely Porphiria, Casarea, Ioppa, Calon, Gaza, and Elam, with divers other castles and citadels in the countries thereabours; oft part whereos were again by King Richard and the Templers fortisted and repeopled, alongh Saladin in the mean time did what he might to have letted the same.

Nothing more hindered the good proceeding of the Christian Princes in this and other eir most honorable expeditions against the Infidels, than the discord among st themselues, estill enuying at at anothers honour, and every one jealous of his owne. Great strife and et burning there had been betweene the two Kings of France and England, during the e they were together in this facred expedition, to the great hinderance of the same. No contention had there been betwixt Guy the late King of Ierusalem, and Conrade Marquis Sont-Perrat, about the title of that loft kingdom; whereby the whole power of the Chrihis in Syria was divided into two factions. Richard King of England, Baldwin Earle of nders, Henry Earle of Champaign, the Knights Hospitallers of S. Iohn, the Venetians, and fans, taking part with Guy and Philip the French King, Odo Duke of Burgondie, Rodolph rle of Claremont, the Templers, the Genoa's, the Landtgraue of Thurin, Leopold Duke of offria, and Robert County of Nassau, taking part with Conrade the Marquis. But Conrade ortly after the taking of Ptolemais being flain by two of the desperat Asassines, or (as some hers fay) by two desperat russians, (suborned therunto by the Prince of Tyrone, in reuenge the despight done unto him by the said Marquis, by taking from him Isabel his espoused fe) as he was walking in his city of Tyre, and doubting no fuch treason. King Richard seeing waste occasion offered for the veter extinguishing of that claime, and how to intitle himfe vnto that kingdome; perfuaded the aforefaid Ifabel (the widow of the late Marquis, and whose right he had laid claim vnto the Kingdom) to relinquish that so troublesome a title, to take to her husband Henry Earle of Champain his nephew, vnto whom he gaue the ciof Tyre: Guy the King exclaiming to the contrary, as of a wrong done vnto himfelf. Shortafter he began also to temper with Guy, persuading him to resigne vnto him that little right interest he had in the kingdome of Ierusalem, and in lieu thereof to receive at his hands kingdom of Cyprus: which his offer the poore King was glad to accept. By which exchange, Guy became King of Cyprus, and Richard King of Ierusalem: which honorable tithe afterwards (as some report) vsed in his stile, as did some others his successors, the Kings England after him. So Guy with all his wealth passing ouer into Cyprus, took possession of kingdom, where he liued not long. Neuerthelesse that pleasant kingdome continued in family of the Lufignans by the space of about 283 years after : untill at length that famifailing in the posthumus sonne of lames the hastard, last King of that Island, it fell into the ands of the Venetians; by whom it was holden as a part of their feignioric almost an hunred yeares, untill it was in our fresh remembrance again from them taken by Selymus the seand, great Emperor of the Turks, in the yeare 1571, as in the proces of this historic shall in King Richard pc place (God willing) be declared.

Now was King Riebard, for the increase of his honor, more destrous than before of the city but dray to

of lerufalem, as the most pretious and honorable prise of all that religious war. And thereup. on with all the power of the Christians then at his command, set forward from Ptolemais, and was come on his way as far as Arfua, a towne scituated betwixt Cæsarea and loppa. In the Acceptable bet - value and was King Richard himselfe with the Englishmen: after whom followed Odo Duke of " family be- Burgondie, with his French: and in the rereward laques de Auenes, with the Flemings, Braban. and say ders, and Wallons, who after the death of their County Philip at the fiege of Ptolomais, had out themselves under his regiment. Saladin with a great army still at hand, and as it were tending upon them, first with certain ambuscado's charged the rereward, and so afterwards came on with his whole power: vpon whom Iaques turning himselfe, with his Flemings received the charge with great afforance, and fo long themselues endured the same, vntill the French came in to their fuccours, and after them the English also. There was fought a notable bat. H tell, and great valour shewed both on the one side and on the other, but especially by them of the Turks part, who knew well the purpose of the Christians for the besieging of Ierusalem. and that thereon depended their onely hope, and that hee that could hold the fame might almost assure himselfe to carry away the glory of that war. The French and English in that bat. tell honorably strone who might show the greatest valour : neither would the Low-Countree men under Jaques their Generall feem to be any thing behind them. This sharpe conflict began about noone, and continued vntill the going down of the Sunne. King Richard (as some write) was there wounded with an arrow : and Inques valiantly there fighting, was flaine, hauing fold his life deare, to the great admiration of the Infidels, and dying left the victory unto the Christians. It is reported, That in this battell was slaine more Turkes and Sarasins, than in any one battell within the memory of man before. Of the Christians were not lost any great number, either any man of name, more than the aforefaid laques the valiant General of the Flemings.

The next day the Christians removed to Bethlem, a town about the mid way betwixt loppa and Ierusalem. But Winter now comming fast on, and want of victuals like enough to increase, the King changing his mind for the siege, returned with the greatest part of the army to Ascalon, which hee that Winter newly fortified, the walls thereof beeing before by Saladin in his dispaire demolished. The Duke of Burgondy with his French men all that while quietly wintring at Tyre. In the mean time the power of the Christians was greatly diminithed, someoneway departing from the camp, and some another. The Italians for the most part, with them of Pifa (who in these three yeares wars had striuen with the Venetians for the honor of their seruice) were now returned home, as were the Venetians themselues also. Neuerthelesse, Winter now past, and the Spring time come, King Richard tooke the field again, and came to Bethlem; where by the way he met with an exceeding great number of Camels, charged with great store of victuals and munition, sent by Saladin out of Egypt to Ierusalem, all which he took: but purposing to have gon on to the siege of Ierusalem, he was by the backpurpose to be wardnesse of the French glad to change his purpose, and to returne to Ptolomais. For the by the backe. French men, persuaded by the Duke their Generall (who well knew the French Kings mind) in the same that if any thing worth remembrance were done, it was to be done by them, and that the glo ry thereof should wholly redound vnto the King of England, as there in person present, and to his English men; shewed themselves so vnwilling to the siege, as therein was nothing does to the great griefe of that worthy Prince. At which time also newes was brought vnto King Richard, how that Philip the French King (forgetfull of his folemne promife made beforehis departure out of Syria) had now inuaded the Countrey of Normandie, and excited Earle 106n the Kings brother (a man of an haughty and afpiring nature) to take vpon him the kingdom of England in his absence; as had before in like case William the yonger brother served Duke Robert his eldest brother, then absent at his father the Conquerors death, in the first se ered expedition under Godfrey of Buillon. Wherefore King Richard besides the present difference culties, fearing lest while he was so far off in wars for desence of the Christian commonweal, he might lose his kingdom at home; thought it best to grow to some good end with Saladis, N and so to make his return. But the politique and wary Sultan, not ignorant of the discordor the Christians, and that their forces daily decaied in Syria: either of the troubled estate of contribution to the Kings affairs at home in his own kingdom, or of his defire to returne, would not hearken to any other conditions of peace, but fuch as might both for the prefent weaken the forces of Christians in Syria, and discourage others that had a mind to come thither afterward. en they should see that for nought they should trauell to conquer that, which in the end w mult of necessity restore againe. The conditions he offered, were, That the Christians buld forthwith restore what socuer they had woon in those three yeres wars, Ptolemais only eepted; and from thenceforth for the space of fine yeres, the Turks should not in any thing molest the Christians, but to suffer them in peace to live by them; which hard conditions (for no better could be had) the King was glad to accept, and so concluded a peace. Wherby tabor and trauell of the two great Kings, and fo many nations with them, were all become trate and vain having now to no purpose lost their men, their mony, their time, their hope. rbloud, their long trauell, to gaine that they must now in one houre forgo; nothing more wnto the poore Christians in Syria, than the cities of Antioch, Tyre, and Ptolemais. This done, King Richard leaving the affaires of Asia unto the charge of Henry County of King Richard sampagne his nephew, thipping the greatest part of his people, with his wife Berengaria, first of the Holy-Sicilia, and from thence for England, (where they in safety at length arrived) followed land taken proprely after with some few himselfe; where by the way, by extremitie of weather he was in dure of dulited Adriatique driuen to land ypon the coast of Histria: where trauelling with a small retinue mewards in the babit of a Templar, he was discourred and taken prisoner by Leopold duke of of Prolemais, as is before difgraced at the winning of Prolemais, as is before declared : o now glad to haue him in his power, made prife of him, and fold him to Henry the Empefor forty thousand pounds, by whom he was kept prisoner by the space of a yere and three neths, and then ranfomed for the fumme of an hundred and fifty thousand pounds.

About this time died the great Sultan Saladin, the greatest terrour of the Christians: who ndfull of mans fragility, and the vanity of worldly honours, commanded at the time of his hen no folemnity to be vsed at his buriall, but only his shirt in manner of an ensigne, made wnto the point of a lance, to be carried before his dead body as an enfigne, a plaine Priest ing before, and crying aloud vnto the people in this fort : Saladin Conqueror of the East, of all reatnesse and riches he had in his life, carrieth not with him after his death any thing more than his. A fight worthy so great a King, which wanted nothing to his eternall commendation, tre than the true knowledge of his faluation in Iesus Christ. He raigned about sixteene tres with great honour, and dying left nine fonnes, which were all murthered by Saphradin Eirvnele, excepting one called also Saphradin Sultan of Aleppo; who by the fauor and supet of his fathers good friends, faued himselse from the treacherous practises of his vncle. Of is Saphradin the vncle, descended Meledin Sultan of Ægypt, and Coradin Sultan of Damaico d Ierusalem: Saladin his great Kingdome being by them now againe rent in pieces.

The death of Saladin in short time bruited abroad, with the discord among st the Turks and rasins about his dominions, put Celestinus (then Pope) in good hope, that the city of Ierusain might in that change and hurly be easily againe recoursed, and that kingdome establied. But when he had in vaine dealt to that purpose with the Kings of France and England hen altogether busied in their wars the one against the other) he persuaded Henry the sixt, en Emperour, to take the matter in hand: who (for that he well could not, or else would not inselse in person undertake that long expedition) sent Henry Duke of Saxonic his Lieuteat, with a great army into Asia: vntowhom were joyned two Legats, Conradus Archbishop Mogunfia another of the Electors, and Couradus the Bishop of Herbipolis. Atwhich time o many other great Princes tooke upon them that holy war; namely, Herman Lantgrauc of hurin, Henry Palarine of Rhine, Henry Duke of Brabant, Conrade Marquesse of Morauia, Frericke Duke of Austria, and Albertus Hapspurgensis, with some others: vntowhom also joyned emselues the Bishops of Rheme, Halberstat, and Ratisbone, with divers other great Prelats. Who having passed thorow Hungary and Thracia, and by the Greeke Emperor Alexius Angerelieued with all things necessary, were by the Græcian ships transported vnto Antioch, nd so by land came to Tyre, and from thence to Ptolemais, with purpose to have gone to releue the Germans besieged in Ioppe; who before their comming were all by treason slaine, ged the city rased: wherefore being come to the ruines thereof, they departed thence to Sion, which they found also abandoned by the Turks. After that, they tooke Berithus, which ity they fortified, and so went to be siege Torone; which city when they had brought to the atremity, as that it must needs (as it was thought) either yeeld or be taken, the Turkes came on so fast to the reliefe thereof, that the Christians were glad to raise their siege and tobe gone: which they in garrifon at Berithus perceiuing, and feeing the enemy to approch them. they abandoned the city, and joyning themselues unto the rest of the army, marched all tope ther to loops, a little before ruinated, which they now againe fortified. But the enemy com. ming to Berithus, and finding it forfaken, rafed it downe to the ground, and fo in few monethe space was Berithus both repaired and rased, in the yeare 1197.

But whill the Christians were repairing the city of loppe, the Turkes proud of that they had done at Berithus, came now to disturbe also the fortifying of that place. Of whose com ming the Christians understanding, removed by night about five miles from the city, of pur. pose to draw the Turks vnto a convenient place for battell. The Turks thinking them to have been fled for feare, fent part of their army to affaile the city, and with the other followed after them diforderly, as if it had bin after men they had had in chafe. Vpon whom the Christians turning, had with them at the first a sharpe encounter, but afterwards put them to flight sin which conflict certain thousands of the Turks fell; of whom the Christians taking the spoile toppe repaired and having put the rest to slight, returned agains vnto the fortifying of the city. But the for bibechighai. of this victory was by the fudden death of two of the greatest Princes in the army greatlydi minished: for the Duke of Saxonie having in the battell taken great paines in performing the parts both of a worthy Generall and valiant fouldier, had ouer-heated himfelfe, and thereupon without regard of his health taken cold, died of a feuer the fourthday after. The Duke of Austria mortally wounded in the battell, died also the night following.

About this time or not long after, died Celestinas the Pope, author of this expedition, and Henry also the German Emperour: after whose death great troubles began to arise in German ny about the chufing of a new Emperour. Whereof the Bishop of Mogunsia (then chiefe Commander of the Army of the Christians in Syria) one of the Electors, and the other German Princes with him, having intelligence, could not by any intreaty of the poore Chri-The Germane stians (in whose quarrell they were come) be persuaded longer to stay, but that needs home they would, and indeed home they went the same way that they came, After whose departure the Turkes tooke loppe, having one of the ports betraied vnto them by one of the City at fuch time as the Germans there in garrison, after the manner of their country, youn S. Marian day were carelesly making merry together in their pots : vpon whom so surcharged with wine, the Turks entring by the port given vnto them, put them all with the rest of the Christis ans to the fword, and so afterward rased the city downe to the ground. Of which victory they became so proud, that they had thought without stop to have driven the Christians quite out of Syria: but by the comming of Simon County of Mont-Fort (a most valiant and expen captain, fent thither by Philip the French King, with a regiment of tall foldiers, at the inflance of Innocentian 3, that succeeded Colestinus in the Papacie) and by civill discord then raigning among it the Turks themselves for soueraigntie, their sury was repressed, and a peace betwin them and the Christians concluded for the space of ten yeares; during which time the Turks promised not to molest the Christians in Tyre or Ptolemais: which happed in the yere 2199, or as some others say, 1198. After which peace so concluded, the worthy County returned againe with his fouldiers into France : with whom we also will repaire with the leffer Aft

(whither the course both of the time and of the History now calleth vs) to see the other great affaires of the Turks in those Easterne countries; leaving for a season these poore remainders of so many Christians in Tyre and Ptolemais now for a while in peace, but to be ere long denoured of the Infidels their enemies, as in the proces of this History shall in due time and place the style

The ruine of the Turks first Empire in PERSIA: with the successe of their second Kingdome in the leffer Asia, under the Aladin Kings.

S no Kingdome or Empire vpon earth (were it neuer fo flourishing Kingdomes afor great) was ever yet fo affured, but that in the revolution of time, of after things, after the manner of other worldly things, it hath as a ficke body have but this after the manner of other worldly things, it hath as a new body time to flourilly beene subject vnto many strange innovations and changes, and at im, and o again. length come to nothing : fo fared it now with the Turkish Empire, desp. which first planted by Tangrolipix in Persia, and the other farte Ea. sterne Countries, increased by Axan his sonne, and so by the Turkish Sultans their Successours (although their names and doings, as too farre off, be not vnto vs all knowne) for the space of one hundred d seuentie yeares continued, must now (I say) give place vnto a greater power, and settle it te elsewhere, the ineuitable destiny thereof so requiring. It fortuned, that about this time hen in the space of a few yeares such mutations as had not before of long beene seene, chanin divers great Monarchies and States) that the Tartars, or rather Tattars, inhabiting large, cold, and bare Countries in the North fide of Affa (of all others a most bararous, ce, and needy Nation) stirred up by their ownewants, and the persuasion of one Zing is (or ome call him, Cane is) holden amongst them for a great Prophet, and now by them made ir Leader, and honoured by the name of Vlan-Chan, that is to fay, The mighty King, (comnly called the great Cham) flocking together in number like the fand of the fea, and conbring first their poore neighbours, of condition and qualitie like themselves, and easie ough to be entreated with them to seeke their better fortune, like swarmes of Grashoppers at out to deuoure the world, passed the high Mountaine Caucasus, part of the Mountaine turns, of all the Mountaines in the world the greatest; which beginning neere vnto the Arlipelago, and ending voon the Orientall Ocean, and running thorow many great and famous ngdomes, divideth Asia into two parts: ouer which great Mountaine, one of the most assubounders of nature, that had fo many worlds of yeares thut up this rough and fauage peothey now passing without number, and comming downe as it were into another 'World, lof fuch Natures pleasant delights as neuer were to them before seene, bare downeall bee them as they went, nothing being now able to stand in their way. Old Zingis their forhate Leader dead in this fo great an expedition, Hoccata his fonne, eldest of his twelve brearen, a man of great wisdome and courage, tooke voon him his sathers place: who fending us of his great Army for the subduing of the Countries Westward, turned himselfs with porld of people toward the East swhere having subdued the Bactrians and Sogdians, with pers others, he entred into India and fubduing that rich country on both fides the river Inseuen to the Bast Ocean, there in the country of Cathai built the samous city of Cambain circuit eight and twenty miles about; for pleasure and plenty of all things necessary the life of man, of all the cities of Afia the chiefe : where the great Cham of Tartarie still iant, as in his Imperiall City, commandeth ouer one of the greatest and strongest Empires the World. In whose Kingdome also, in the Province of Mangy more towards the East, thath another most famous City called Quinsay, of all the Cities in the world the greatest, h circuit an hundred miles about as M. Paulu Ventous writeth, who himselse dwelt thetein bout the yere 1260. It is scituate in a lake of fresh water, and have in it twelste thousand brides; of which some are of such an height, that tall Ships with their sailes may easily passe ader them. In this populous city the great Cham hath for the keeping thereof alwaies thirty bouland men in garrison. The Tartar Kingdome thus planted in Cambain, Hocesta contenting himselfe with the rich pleasures of India, afterward managed his wars by his lieutenante. being for the most part his brethren, or other his nigh kinsmen; of whom he sent out with his armies some Northward, some Westward, and some toward the South : by whom he subdued the Arachosians, Margians, and divers other great nations; and entring into Persia, subdued The Tarket drie the country, with all Parthia, Affiria, Mesopotamia, and Media. At this time in the city Balei men out of Per- or Belch in the country of Chorasan in the farthest part of Persia, reigned ouer the Turkson Cursumes, of the Greekes called Corsantes, who finding himselfe farre too weake to stand before the Tattarians, fled with all his people, leaving vnto them both the city and the country. which hee and the Turkes his predecessors had ever since the time of Tangrolipix possessed which city the Tartars rased, and tooke the Country vnto themselues. In this generall flight of the Turks, when as every man was glad to make what shift he might for himselfe, Curle, mes their Sultan died, the last of the Kings of the Selzuccian family that reigned ouer the Turks in Persia; whose some Vgnan-Chantaking vpon him the leading of such multitudes of Turks as followed his father, feifed vpon the great city of Babylon, now called Bagadat, need vnto the ruines of the old Babylon: where having put to the fword all the inhabitants there. of he there and in the country thereabout feated himfelfe with the Turks his followers: here long he had not there rested, but that the Tartars hearing thereof, pursued him, tooke him pris foner, and expulsed thence all his people. There was at the same time also another kingdom of the Turks at Nachana city in Persia, giving name vnto the country wherein it stood, not farre from Chorasan : wherein then raigned one Solyman, of the Ogulian family, as had diner other of his progenitors before him; who terrified with this dreadfull ftorme fo fuddenly is fen out of the North, and warned by the sudden fall of the Sel Zuccian Sultan and his kingdom of far greater fame and power than himfelfe or his, fled also with such his subjects as would follow him, into the leffer Asia. But of him and his proceedings more shall be said hereafter in the rifing of the victorious Othoman family, as descended from him. After this, the Tartes together with their good fortune still extending the bounds of their Empire, conquered Ar menia the greater, with the Countries of Colchis and Iberia: fo that now their Empirewas become of all others the greatest and most flourishing. This great Conquerour the Tarrar had in his proud conceit purposed to have subdued all Asia, and to have made the sea the only bounder of his Empire : but ouercome with the delicacies of India, having divided amongst his people those great provinces and fruitfull countries, with the rich cities & pleasant fields, he so rested, embracing the manners and superstition of the people he had ouercome. Long it were, and far from our purpose, to recount all the famous victories and conquests of this bare Northerne people : sufficeth it to the History we have in hand, that the Turkes were by them then driven out of Persia, with the countries thereabouts, and their Togram kingdome (at they call it) first founded by Tangrolipix, there extinguished, about the yere of our Lord 120% The Turks thus driven out of Persia, and their kingdome overthrowne, retired themselves in to the leffer Asia, possessed by the Turks their country-men, long before brought thitherby Cutin-Musts and his sons, (as is before declared) and by them ever since in some part, though with divers fortune holden. Where these Turks now arrived out of Persia under the leading The beginning of Aladin the sonne of Kei Hufren, descended also of the Selauccian family in Persia, and taking of the Madinian the opportunitie offered them by the mortall discord of the Latines with the Greekes, and the Greeks among themselves, seifed upon Cilicia with the countries thereabouts, and there as Sebaftia and first at Sebaftia, and afterward at Iconium, erected their new Kingdome, which of this Alexandre din is by the Turks called the Kingdome of the Aladin Kings, although their names were not

Now about this time, and within the course of some few yeres after, such great and strange mutations happened in the Constantinopolitane Empire, as had not therein any time before bin seene: whereby the whole estate of that great Empire, which sometime commanded out a great part of the world, was almost veterly subuerted, and a fit opportunity given vnto the Turks and infidels for the fure fetling of themselues, and establishing of their kingdoms bett in Syria and the leffer Afia: which briefly to run thorow shall not be from our purpose; the affaires prospering by these troubles, and their proud and stately Empire that now brauedrall the rest of the world, being raised out of the ruines of that Christian Empire, and at this prefent triumphing euen in the same Imperiall city wherein these so great innovations happed exim the viurper, but now Emperor, not gontented (as is before declared) traiteroully to metratus the e deprined (fee his elder beother of his Empire and fight together, fought also after the Joung Prince of the youg Prince Alexine his brothers for and heire apparent of the empire, who feeing Philip the Emof the year Prince were in the person of his father, found him less the flight from the fury of his Prince and the Latine Princes, s, and fo accompanied with certains great Lords of the Greeks his fathers friends, fled to againg bit Vie said of the Christian Princes of the West, whom the Grecians commonly call the La- sie the Vinter. And first he took his way to Philip the German emperor, who had married Irene his fister, Emperor Isaacs daughter, by whom he was most honourably received & entertained. This it lady not a little moued with the milery of her father, and the flight of her brother, ceanot most instantly to solicite the Emperor her husband, not to leave vnreuenged so great a any, by the example thereof dangerous vnto himfelfe, and others of like majefty and state. declared to him what an execrable indignity it was, to fee her father the Emperor vnwory imprisoned, deprived of his empire and fight, and of the societie of men, by his brother had by him received and recovered his life, his light, and his liberty : and to fee the heire arant of the Empire banished by the wickednes of his vncle, to wander up and down here there like a beggeria great part of which difgrace, as the faid, redounded unto her felfe the ghter of Isas, and fifter to the young wandring Prince, and to himselfe also, the son in law othe vnfortunat Emperour her father. Moteouer she said, that the murdred Alexius durst er haue bin fo hardy as to commit fo great and detestible a villany, if he had not lightly reded and contemned the majesty of the said Philip, whom if he had had in any reverence or or, or at all feared, he durst not have attempted so villanous an act. This Greeke lady, mowith just griefe, with these & such like complaints so prevailed with her husband, that he ised her to be in some part therof revenged, which he could not for the present perform, by the wars he then had with Othe his competitor of the Empire. At the same time it ned, that great preparations were making in France and Italy, and divers other places of Great prepara. thendome, for an expedition to be made against the Turks into the Holy land. The chiefe tions made by wherin were Theobald County of Champaigne, (a man of great fame, and General of the for an expediristian army) Boniface Marquesse of Mont-Ferrat, Baldwin Earle of Flanders and Henaule, sien into the Henry his brother Earle of S. Paul, Henry Duke of Louain, Gualter Earle of Breame, with diother noble gentlemen, which to name were tedious : vnto whom reforted also many vat and deuout Christians out of divers parts of Christendome, ready to have spent their is in that foreligious a warifo that now the number of them was great, and the army right pulous. But being thus affembled together, they thought it not best to take their way to instantinople, thorow Hungary and Thrace, and so to passe ouer into Bythinia, for that the peks had still in all former times showed great uncourtesse unto the Latines, in passing with rarmies that way : and therefore they thought it much better now by the way of Italy to their journey by sea into the Holy-land, and for their transportation, especially to vie the be of the Venetians, whom they found much the easier to be intreated, for that by the ans of to great an army, they were in hope to fcoure the Adriaticke (then much infested by Dalmatians) as alfo to recouer ladera, with some other cities vpon the coast of Sclauonia, pre tenolted from their state to the Hungarians, as indeed they afterwards did. But by the es this army was marching out of France, and come into Piemont, the noble County of ampaigne Generall therof, there fell ficke & died, to the exceeding griefe & forrow of the le army: in whose stead, the Marques of Mont-Ferrat, a man of great nobility, and wel acinted with the wars of the East, was chosen Generall. This great army, transported by the hetians into Sclauonia, tooke Iadera, with divers other port townes along the sea coast, and hing there done what the Venetians most desired, was about again to have bin imbarkt for ria, & so into the Holy-land. But the yong Prince Alexius in the mean time had by himselse the noble Grecians (fled with him for feare of the tyrant) fowrought the matter with the kin Princes of the West, especially with Innocentins tertius the Pope, with Philip the emperor s brother in law, & Philip the French king, that they pittying his effate, & induced also with me other confiderations more proper to themselves, tooke him as it were into their proteion, commending by letters & messengers for that purpose sent vnto the suny, (which they might command) the defence both of himselse and his cause: who with the commendation Muxim com of three fo great Princes, comming to the army yet lying at ladera (expeding but a faite with to have passed into Syria) was there of them all most honorably received, as the soil of an Em. peror, and as became one to them to highly commended. And he himfelf alfo, as one know he his good, was not wanting voto himselfe, but recommended his person to their protection a poore exiled Prince in diffresse; yet was he of a lively spirit; gratious in speech, beautiful to behold, and very young, and withall fully influcted by the noble Grecians that were white him, in all things that might ferue to further his purpole. And foralmuch as this great Anie confilted of divers nations, specially of the French, Italians, & Venetians, not all to be by on mean moued; he fitted every one with such motives as he thought might best prevaile with them: Vnto the French he promifed to pay the great fums of money they had borrowed it the Venetians for the furnishing of themselves in this war: Vnto the Venetians he promise recompence for all the injuries they had fulfained by the late Constantinopolican Emperor especially by the Emperor Emanuel (who for that they refused to aid him in his wars against William king of Sicily, did in one day confiscatal the goods of the Venetian merchants within his empire of a great value; and afterwards contrary to the law of nations, shamefully intreted their embassadors sent vnto him, among a whom was Henry Dandulus, now by fortune and nerall for the Venetians in the army who moved as well with the wrong in particular done with to himselfe, as with the common, defired to be reuenged both of the one and the other which although he could not have of Emanuel himselfe, being long before dead, yet was he fill delirous to have it of some one of the Greeke Emperors, who soever he weren) Vinto the Pope and the Italians, both he and the noble men with him, had before promifed, that the Greek church should ever acknowledge the supremacy of the Church of Rome, and from thenceforth submit it selfe therunto, as voto the soueraign judge of all the Christian Churches which cansed the Pope Innecentine, by letters, by legats; by embassadors, and by all other means possible to further the cause of the yong Prince Alexius, so combined with his own alledging the dimer fity of opinions in matters of religion, betwint the Greeks and the Larines, to have been the chiefe cause that the Mahomerans had not been long agoe by their united forces subdued of veterly rooted out. In briefo, the young Prince figured not to promife most bountifull rewards in generall, to all that should take his part against his vicle the vsurping Emperor.

By this means, the deuout war taken in hand for the reliefe of the proofe Christians in Syring was laid afide, and the fame forces that thould have bin therin imploid, now converted against the Greeke empire, to the great weakning of that fide of the Christian commonweale, and aduantage of the common enemy, who might then eafily have beene oppressed, had he with the united forces of the Christians bin on this side charged home, as he was one the farther by the Tartais. The Grecian war thus refolued upon, it feemed best unto the great Commander of the army, to march directly to Constantinople, as to the head of the Grecian state, and place where the tyrant whom they fought after was refiant. In the meane time it was by them given out thorowall the Greeke cities which the Emperor had strongly manned and fortified for the staying of their passage, that their purpose was not to make war against the Grecians their friends, but only to reflore their lawfull Emperor vato his former state and ironor: And that foralmuch as every city and rown in antient Greece had appointed rewards, and almost divide honours vnto such as had delivered them from tyrants, they should now more fauourably ceine and intreat them that came to reflore vinto enery city, and to enery man in generall, that former liberty and honor. And fo vpon the refolution for Constantinople, imbathing dies : my, and passing thorow the Ionian sea into the Ageum, and so without let thorow the firest of Helespontus into Propontis, and entring the streits of Bosphorus Thracius, which disting signature for Furope from Afia, they came to an anker even in the face of the city. In this fleet were well hundred and forty faile of tall ships, fixty gallies, feuentie ships for burthen, and one hundred and twenty faile of Victualers; which all together made a most brane show, covering the frait in such fort, as that it seemed rather a wood than a part of the fea. Thus for a space the lay facing the City, attending if happily upon the comming and fight of fo great affect, sta the report of so puillant an army as the young. Prince Alexias had brought with him, any mult or fedition might stife in the City. But the wary Tyrant had fowell provided therefore before hand, that the Citisens, although they in heart sauoured the young Prince, and wished well, yet durst they not once moue or stirre in his quarrell. Whilst the fleet thus lav. saffadors came from the Isle of Creet, in two great gallies, with three banks of oars, yeeltyprothe young Prince that goodly Island with all the towns and cities theriniwhich he with gaue ento the Marquelle of Mont-Forrat, Generall of the army, thereby to encouthe other great commanders of the army to do the yttermost of their denoire, in hope of ipence and rewards answerable to their deferts and valour.

fore the arrivall of this fleet, Alexius the Emperour had with a great chaine made fast The Latines by htrance of the hauen betwirt Constantinople and Pera, and appointed twenty great galrell manned for the keeping therofibut a great gale of wind arifing the General fent out faminofic. rearest and stronges ship in the fleet (of her greatnes and swiftnes called the Eagle) which all her failes vp, carried with a full gale of wind, by maine force brake the chane, and e a way for the rest of the fleet to enter which the Greeks in their gallies seeing for feare leaving the gallies for a spoile vnto the Venetians, by whom they were all taken, but not in found in them. The haven thus gained, Theodorus Lafraris the Emperors fon in law, was ently ready upon the shore with a select company of the brauest gallants of the city and the court, to have hindred the Latines from landing, who running their thips a ground, Greet and the led with fuch cheerfulnes and courage, and with fuch half, that in one moment you might Latines at their scene them leave out of their ships, take land, enter into the battell, and lay about them mad men. This hot skirmish endured a great while, for that they were only footmen that ined this brunt, for the horfes could not fo foone be landed, and the Greeks were brauely inted. All this great fight the Constantinopolitans beheld, with doubtfull hearts, expewhat should be the event thereof. There were in the city fix thousand of the flower of ce, which brauely fallying out, made the battell much more doubtfull, yet fuch was the and resolution of the Latines, that in fine the Greeks discomfited, were glad to retire folues againg into the city, but with what loffe was not certainely knowne : easie it were effe, that it was right great, for that the old tyrant Alexino discouraged therewith, and tfull of his owne estate, with Theodorus Lafraris his fon in law, and some few others of his friends (hard to be found in fodangerous a ca e) the next night following fecretly fled of the city, carrying away with him a wonderfull maffe of treafure (which he against all cuents had caused to be secretly hidden by his daughter Irene, in a monastery of Nuns hin the City, whereof the was the abbelle) and to faued himfelfe. the flight of the tyrant once bruted, the next morning the Constantinopolitans taking the state size old Emperor Isaac out of prison, saluted him againe for their Emperor, rejoycing greatly for Emperor taken deliucrance and the safegard of his life; and after that opened the gates of the city to the grain salusted ines, calling and faluting them by the names of the revengers and faulors of the liberty of Emperor, 1827-Greekes, as alfoof the life and majestic of their Emperor: they requested them that they Alexim buson. ht fee and falute Alexim their young Prince, whom they had so long defired : and so was city of Constantinople, by the submission of the Citisens, for that time saved from sace and spoile. The old Emperor thus deliuered and together with his fon Alexim again plain the imperial feat gaue the most hearty thankes that possibly he could vito the Latine nces, for that by their bounty, charity, and valor, the Greeke Empire had bin deliucred out long and miferable feruitude; and for his own particular, that he had received of them fo t good, that albeit his fight could not be reftored to him againe, neuertheleffe he acknowed his life, his liberty, his empire, his country, his fon, to have bin vnto him by them red, and he likewife to them; for which their fo great deferts he could not (as he faid) render condigne thanks; or denife rewards or honors answerable to their demerits and valour: that therefore he did ratifie and confirme what societ his son had before promised unto is for his deliverance: and not only that, but further promifed, That if they were not thereh contented, hee would of his owne bounty give them better contentment, not meaning y should go discontented, that had saued his life, and otherwaies so highly pleasured him. reupon this good old Emperor began to confult with his friends about the meanes wherehe might satisfic & content the Latines in such things as the yong Prince his son had vnto em promised. And to the intent that the Citisens of Constantinople might the more wiligly doe that he was to command them, and the more cheerefully pay fuch impositions as was to lay upon them, he intreated all the Latines to retire themselues out of the city into their campe or about their ships, which they accordingly did. But the imposition being downe, and what every man was to pay, feemed vnto the Greeks (as men of long accused to receive tribute of others, and not to pay tribute to others) a matter thoft heavily and inch. lerable. In this very instant that this exaction was required, died the old Emperor for having of long beene kept in a darke and ftinking prison in continual feare of death and delivered and restored to his Empire, could not indure so sudden and vnexpected a dis both of the aire and of his manner of living, but fo fuddenly died.

At this exaction imposed for the contentment of the Latines, the light Constanting tans grieuously murmured and exclaimed, saying, That it was a villanous thing to freely Greeke Empire ingaged and bound (by a yong boy) vnto a couctous and proud nation; and to be sociled and bare of covne: That the great and rich Island of Creet lying in the middle the sca, was by him given as agist vnto the Latines: That the city of Confiantinople and the Greeke Church, had by him beene enforced and confirmined to yeeld vnto the Sec at River to receiue the opinions of the Latine Church, to fubmit it selfe vnto the obeysence of the Rome, from whence it had once happily departed ever fince the time that the Empirewater Constantine the Great translated thence to them. Thus every one faid for himselfe in parties larithus all men faid in generall. And therof the noble men in their affemblies, and the wifes people in their meetings, grieuously complained; whereupon a great fedition and tumulaus railed in the city. Some presently tooke vp armes, and the common people all enraged range. riously disordered vnto the palace, with a purpose ro have committed some great outration. on the person of the yong emperor Alexim: who in that so sudden an insurrection, as might well have troubled a right conftant man, without longer flay resoluted upon a most wholese and necessarie point for the appearing of the peoples fury a vnto whom (affembled in a wos. derfull multitude) he (hewed himfelfe from aboue in his palace, promifing them to remain their power, and not from thenceforth to doe any thing without their aduice and liking be wholly to depend upon them : with which good words the people held themselves well out tent, and so was the tumult for that time appealed. But forthwith the yong Emperor confidence of the c ring the injury done vnto him, began to burn with the defire of revenge, and to change his put pose. He could not together satisfie the citisens and the Latins : for if he would keepels promise with the Latines, he must of necessitie offend his owne people, neither was there are Auximpates means to be found to fatisfie both the one and the other. But thinking himselfe more bound to keep his promise with the Latines, whose forces he knew not how to with stand, he sentiscretly to request the Marques of Mont-Ferrat, Generall of the army, to send him about midnight certaine companies of foldiers vnto the city, affuring him to receive them in by a gate neere vnto the palace, which should be opened vnto them by certaine of his trustie fermits there left for that purpose. Of this plot Alexius Dueas (of his bittle browes surnamed Marzuste, whom of a base fellow the Emperor Isaac had promoted vnto the greatest honors of the court) was not ignorant, who being a man of an afpiring mind, and in those troublesome time having long thirsted after the Empire, tooke now this occasion toworke wpon.

The night following, he by his agents, men instructed for the purpose, raised a tumulting nopolitans as city, not inferiour vnto that which had hapned the day before : and at the fame inftant, as if le had had nothing to do in the matter, came suddenly to the yong Emperor in the dead timed the night (which he might at all times do, by reason of the great confidence the Emperor be in him) and with a fad countenance told him, That the people were vp againe in an vprore and especially they of his guard, & that they were comming toward him to do him some violence for the loue he bare vnto the Latines. With which vnexpected news the yong Emperor and fied, demanded of him as of his his most faithfull counsellor, What were best in that case to him to do ? Who presently embracing him in his night gowne, led him out by a secret door into a tent he had of his owne in the court, as if he would there have kept him fafe but far was that from his traiterous thoughts; who departing from him, as if he had gone to appeale the tumult, had before taken order, that he shauld presently after his departure, be cast into bonds, & fobe clapt vp into a close stinking prison: which done, the falle traitor openly shewing him felfe, made an oration to the people, wherin he shewed himself to have great compassion of the Greek empire, & of the Greeks his countrymen themselves, specially in that they were gotte ned by a youth vnfit for the gouernment, who fuffered himfelfe to be mif-led according to

are of the Latines. And that it was high time for the city of Constantinople the seat of recke Empire, to looke about it, and to haue an eie vnto it felfe, fith it was betraied and by them which ought to preferue and keepe the fame; that they had now need of a man oued his country and countrymen, before that which yet remained of the Gracian name recely extinguished by the Latines.

is his speech, sitted of purpose vato the humour of the seditious, was received with the outery and applause of the windy headed people. Some cried out, that he, and none be, was to be made chiefe of the common weale that was by them to be established: some cried as loud to have him made generall of the armies and forces of the state; but reatest cry was to have him chosen and created Emperour; whereunto the rest giving he was by the generall confent of the tumultuous people, without longer stay, chosen roclaimed Emperour.

lexing the traitour, by no lawfull election or rightfull fuccession, but onely by the fury of Murzuste as umultuous people, thus created Emperour; was of nothing more carefull than how to burnethe view ke the forces of the Latines, of whom only he now flood in dread. And therefore to begin netian flees. all, he first attempted by certaine gallies filled with pitch flax, brimstone, and such like er apt to take fire, to have burnt the Venetian fleet: which gallies fo fet on fire and carried a faire gale of wind among the fleet, had bin like enough to have done great harm, had it y the warinesse of the Venetians bin preuented: who being good sea-men, and not vnac-nted with such deuices, easily and without danger avoided the same, by keeping themsaleofe one from another in the fea. This finenes forting to ho purpose, he to color the er sent certaine messengers to the Generall, and other commanders in the army, to give to understand that that which was done for the firing of the fleet, had bin done without inity, by the malice of the tumultuous people, and that for his part he would be glad of auor & friendship, assuring them likewise of his, and promising them to aid them both pen and mony, and what focuer els they should have need of in their wars against the in-Whereunto an answer was given by Dandulus the Venetian generall, that he would beit, when Alexis the fon of the Emperor Isaac, whom the Liatines had placed in the empire, d affure them thereof, and intreat for the people, vponwhom the fault of that outrage aid:which answer the more moued the traiterous tyrant, to rid himself cleane of the feare e yong Prince, by taking him out of the way; to the intent to hinder the people of the and great defire they had to grow to some peace with the Latines, by taking him out of on, and receiving him again for their Emperor: For the people (by nature mutable, and nor tous of the good of themselues, but according to the occurrents present, without any great id of that they had already done, or ought to have done) began now to repent them folues at they had done against the young emperor leakeris in the fauor of the tyrant, and commonid, That they must finde some meanes, what souer it were, to remedy their fault together their troubles. Wherefore Mur Zufle fearing the fudden mutation of the people, with his hands most villanously strangled the young Prince Alexis in prison, having as yet not sed much aboue fix moneths, and immediatly after caused it to be bruited abroad, That kid young Prince despairing of his estate, had as a man desperat hanged himselfe.

be tyrant in vain having thus attempted the burning of the fleet, & still fearing the refien- Murzuste enfword of the Latines, resolued now by plain force to meet them in the field, and there to source the field and there to source them in the field, and there to source the field and them battell. So having made ready and armed the whole strength of the imperiall city; h checrefull speech encouraged his soldiers, requesting them valiantly to maintain and d their country of Greece, the monuments of their fathers, the glory of their ancestors, present honor, and the future hope of their posterity: that having before their cies the of their city, within which they were borne, nourished, and brought up in hope of great ters, they would have pity and compassion of their temples, their wives, their children, and picale to luffer them to fall againe into so miserable and wretched a setultude, but rather ie a thousand deaths. And the more to grace this his enterprise taken in hand for the depe of his country (as he would have the world to beleeve it) with the colour of a superstis deuotion also, he caused the Priests in their ecclesiastick attite and ornaments, to march h in the army, with an enfigne, having in it displayed the picture of the virgin Mary. So ragiously marching forward, hee first charged that quarter of the campe where Baldwine

the County of Flanders lay, where at the first was fought a right fierce and doubtfull benefit But afterward the alarum running throughout all the campe of the Latines, and new funding comming in on every fide, the Greeks were put to the worfe, and inforced agains to retire in to the city, having loft a great number of men, together with their superfictious ensigned in a wonderfull thing to fee, with what rare agreement the Latines, being of divers nations, con tinued this expedition undertaken against the Greekes. Seuenty two daies was this Clive Conflavinople Conflavinople freightly besieged by the Latines both by sea and land, without giving in bardly besieged, time of rest or repose day or night to the besieged, fresh men comming still onto the start as the other fell off, and in such fort troubled the Greekes in the city, that they knew north what to do or which way to turne themselves. The Venetians vnto whom was committed the charge to affault that fide of the City which was toward the hauen, vpon two great gallen made fast together, built a strong tower of wood, higher than the wals and rampiars of the towne, out of which they both with shot and fireworks much troubled the defendants, where with they in the time of the affault approching the wall, by their fine deuices fired that fide of the city: by the rage whereof, a great number of houses were burnt, with many other flands buildings and ancient monuments of that famous city and had at that prefent gained a give tower neere vnto the port, destitute of defenders, had not the tyrant himselfe in good time come with new supplies to the rescue thereof. In like manner, the French, with the rest, aller led the other fide of the city by land, where they were to fight not against the defendants on ly, but against deepe ditches, high and strong wals, and bulwarkes also neuerthelesse, such was the valour and fury of the Latines, with the defire of victory, as that they were not with an difficulties to be difmaied; but prefling still on, by a thousand dangers, at length after a most tharpe affault, they gained one of the greatest bastilions on that side of the city, called the Atgels tower, and so by plaine force opened a way both for themselves and the rest into the cire. Whereof Alexins understanding, and strucks with present despaire both of his state and like the night now comming on, fled with Euphrofina the Emperous Alexius his wife, and Esilott her daughter, whom he had married when he had raigned about a moneth and fixteenedair,

The tyrant, author of all this mischiese, and of the calamities ensuing, thus fled, and the la tins furioufly entring; the Priefts and religious men in their furplices, and other ecclefialities ornaments with their crosses & hanners (as in solemne procession) met the Latines; and falling downe at the foldiers feet, with flouds of teares abundantly running downe their heavy cour tenances, belought them, but specially the captains and commanders, to remember the could tion of worldly things, and contenting themselves with the victory, the glory, the honour, the empire, the immortality of their name, to abstain from slaughter, from burning, from spolling & ranfacking of fo beautifull a city; and that feeing they were themselues men, they would fo haue pity of men: and being themselves captains and soldiers, they should also have compassion vpon captaines and soldiers; who although they were not so valiant and fortunates they were, yet neuerthelesse were both captains and soldiers : and that they would keepe and preserue their city, whereof (if they ruinated it not) they might have much more pleasure commodity, than if they should destroy the same: which as it had bin the principal seat of the Greek empire, so might it now be of the Latines: That seeing they had thereof a carefull to gard, as then belonging to another man, they ought now upon better reason to have more care therof being their own: That the authors of all those troubles and mischieses, Alexim thee der, and Murzufle, had already received a reward answerable to their follies, in that they were driven into exile: That they would have pity and compassion of an innocent and enforced multitude of poore people, oppressed and grieuously tormented with the often tyrannies their murderous lords and gouernors: That in fo doing, God the Lord of hofts, the givet all guider of battels, the God of mercy, would therefore reward them: To conclude, they bearby befought them to pardon their citilens, to put on the hearts of grations & merciful lords fathers, not of enemies and rough masters; of forgiuers, not of reuengers; and rounderstand their tears, their miserable estate and woes passed. With this so humble a submission & const plaint of the religious, some of the better sort were happily moued: but with the common of diers, breathing nothing but victory, with their weapons in their hands, & the spoile of an enpire in their power, what anaileth praiers or tears? Euery man fell to the spoile, and in so great choile & liberty of al things, fitted his own difordred appetite, without respect of the wrong

njury done to others: onely from the effusion of innocent bloud they abstained; they he lives they fought after, being already fled, together with the tyrant. Other injuries outrages (fo great, as that greater none could be) were in every place fo rife, that every c, every lane, every corner of the City was filled with mourning and heavinesse. There ic a man have seene noble men earst of great honor, and reverend for their hoary haires. beher citizens of great wealth, thrust out of all they had, walking up and downe the city ing and wringing their hands, as men forlorne, knowing not were to shroud their heads, her staied the greedy rage of the insolent souldiers within the wals of mens private houbut brake out into the stately palaces, temples, and churches of the Greekes also, where all good prize, and nothing dedicated to the service of God, lest unpolluted and defaced, no vnfought, no corner vnrifted: right lamentable and almost incredible it were to report he miseries of that time. Some of the Greeke Historiographers, men of great marke and Nicetis Cho. e.and themselues eie-witnesses and partakers of those euils, have by their writings comned to all posterity, of the insolencie of the Latines at the winning of the City, to their mall dishoner: but that disordered souldiers in all ages in the libertie of their insolent viiv haue done fuch outrages, as honest minds abhorre to think vpon. Thus Constantinople most famous City of the East, the seat and glory of the Greeke Empire, by the miserable bition and diffention of the Greekes for four-nightie, fell into the hands of the Latines. twelfth of Aprill, in the yeare 1204, or after the account of others, 1200. onstantinople thus taken, and the tyrants put to flight, the Princes and great commanders to Army held a counsell, to consider what were best to be done concerning the City and new gained Empire: for after so great a victory, they thought it not good to rase so anand important a City, seated as it were awatch tower upon the theatre of the World, looking both Asia and Europe from the one to the other, as an eye of the vniuerfall, and mmodiously planted, aswas no other city of the world, for the keeping under of the eneof the Christian Religion: but that it were much better to place there a Latin gouernor, ablish there the Latine lawes and customes, and to vnite the Greeke church as a member the Church of Rome. In which consultation, some were of opinion, not to have any Emperours in Christendome but one, and therefore to make choice of Philip the Gere Emperour, author of this warre, whose wife Irene was the onely daughter and heire of ate Emperour Isaac Angelus, vnto whom by all right the inheritance of her fathers Embelonged. But the greater part, considering that the troubled affaires of Greece, in so at a change and newnesse of the Empire, had need of the personall presence of a Prince ught it better to make choice of one among themselves, who there still resiant in that e, might at all times give aid unto the Latines in their facred wars, taken in hand against Infidels: which opinion as the better, was approved of them all. The chiefe men in this tion of the new Emperour, were Baldwin County of Flanders and Hainault, Henry his bro-Lewis County of Bloys, Symon de Montfort, Iohn de Dammartin, Gualter de Brienne, Hugh inty of S. Paul, Iohn County of Brenne, Boniface Marquesse of Mont-Ferrat, Stephen anty of Perch, and fine gentlemen of Venice: vnto whom also were joyned two Bishops gria, the one of Bethlem, the other of Ptolemais, who had oftentimes come to the campe he Latines, to stirre them up for the taking in hand the facred warre in Syria; with two pps of France also, namely, of Soisson and Troy in Champagne, and the Abbot of Lemehele great Lords and Prelates affembled into the Church of the holy Apostles, after had there with great deuotion craued of God to inspire them with his spirit for the be of a good and just Prince fit for so great a charge; with one consent made choice of County of Flanders and Haynault, for Emperour of Greece: abrauc and valiant ke, about two and thirty yeares old, who was afterward the fixteenth day of May in the e 1204 (or after the computation of others, in the yeare 1205) in the great Temple of and provinces on Europe fide, belonging to the Greeke Empire in the time of Ifaac Aneelm the late Emperour: the fortune of the whole Empire, as it were following the fortune of the imperial city. Which large countries fo gained from the Greeks, the Latins divided among themselues, as good prize taken from their enemies. Vnto Baldwin the emperor and his success fors in the Empire, was affigned the Imperial city of Constantinople, and the countries of Thracia, with a limited foueraigntie ouer all the rest of the provinces by the Latines already or afterwards to be gained. Vnto the Venetians in this division of the Empire, was allotted for their share all the rich Islands of the Ageum and Ionian, with the famous Island of Car. die also , which although it were before by the young Emperor Alexim in the beginning of these warres, given vnto the Marquesse of Mont-Ferrat, yet in this division of the Empireir was taken from him (not without his good liking) and given to the Venetians, as for then more fit : in flead and lieu whereof, the Marquesse had the city of Thessalonica with all the kingdome of Thessalie, and a great part of Peloponesus assigned vnto him, with the Royall title of a King. Of the aforesaid Islands in (number many and exceeding rich) the Venetians in the name of the state, fortified some few of the greatest with convenient garrisons, the ref they left to be possessed and desended by the better fort of the citizens at their private con and charges, who according to their ability, tooke into their possession, some one Island some another, and some two or three, one, as they were able to set out their gallies, one, two, or moe for the keeping of the same : ouer all which, the seigniorie neuerthelesse had a generall care still keeping a fleet with one of their Admirals at Sea: by whom they not onely represent the Genoa pirats then busie in those seas, but also tooke in certaine strong townes in the maine voon the coast of Peloponesus, namely, Modon and Corone; all which they of log time after held as a part of their seignorie. Some other particular places, vet parts also of the empire, were given vnto particular men: as the dukedom of Athens vnto one Geffrey of Troy in Champaigne, a French man, a Valiant Captaine, whom they also made Prince of Achaia; Another Dukedome was also given unto the County of Bloys; as were divers other countries and townes also vnto other more private men: who neverthelesse were bound to hold the same of the Emperor, as of their Lord, and to pay him yerely a fourth part of the reuenucarifing thereof, towards the maintenance of his state. Yea the Greekes themselues in this ship. wracke of their state and empire, although they disdained nothing more than the strangegouernement of the Latines, yet could they not be persuaded to joyne together in so common [a calamitie, but after their wonted manner fought euery man how to share out fomthing for himselfe, without regard of the common good: one seized vpon one strong Towne or Citie, and so likewise another; which for all that, they held not long, driven thence for the most part by a greater power, either of the Latines, or of their owne countrymen.

The man whom the discontented Greekes most looked after, was Theodorne Lascarie, the Emperour Alexim Angelus his fonne in law; who at the taking of the city, fled to Adriano. ple, and afterward into Bythinia, where he was of the people, not of that country onely, but of others also farther off, joyfully received and honoured as their Emperor. So taking into his hands the countries of Bythinia, Phrygia, Missia, Ionia, and Lydia, euen from the will dings of the famous river Maander Southward, vnto the Euxine Sea Northward; he with the generall good liking of the people, tooke vpon him the estate of an Emperour, and som the renowned city of Nice made the feat of his Empire. At the same time also David; and Alexius Comueni, the nephewes of the tyrant Andronicus (fometime Emperour of Confiant nople) by his sonne Manuel, possessing the more Easterne countries of Pontus, Galatia, and Capadocia, erected vnto themselues another Empire in Trapezond, where their posterities the honourable house of the Comneni raigned in great glory many yeares after, vntill their Empire, together with the Empire of Constantinople, was by the great Emperour of the Turkes, Mahomet the fecond, subuerted and brought to nought, as shall hereafter in due time and place be declared. Thus the Greeke Empire exposed (as it were) to the general! spoils was no longer one, but many Empires: Baldwin raigning in Constantinople, the Marquette of Mont Ferrat in Theffalic, Theodorus Lafcaris at Nice, Alexius Comnenus in Trapezona and the Venetians in the Islands, all in royall dignitie. Besides whom were many com leffer Princes, which had heere and there according to their abilitie feifed ypon force one or other part of the Empire, and there erected their Toparchies, raigning thereis

addwin as is aforesaid, created Emperour of Constantinople, by the help of the Venetian Adviantable mirall Dandular, and other great commanders of the army in thort time brought under his fixed by the Lance all the cities of Thrucia, except the city of Adrianople, wherunto the better fort of bit. ifcontented Greeks, together with Theodorus Lafearu (difdaining the government of the nes) were fled as vnto a most safe san Quarie. Which Baldwin knowing, and withall desiwhileft yet he had his friends about him to let his new Empire in some good stay, witharther delay laid hard fiege to the fame. Now the Greekes generally cuill entreated by fatines, and gricued to be governed by them, fomewere fled into their neighbour prinsountries, but especially into Bulgaria, otherwise called Mysia, a large kingdom lying bet the great mountain Æmus and Danubius: by whose persuasion, John king of that counsided by the Scythians (a fierce Northern people but lately come into those quarters) and the fugitive Greeks themselves, tooke upon him to relieve the City: and so with a great ly approching the same, sent before certain troups of Scythian archers on horsebacke, to h in such booty of horses or cattell as they should find neer unto the Emperors campand hall commanded them, that being charged by the Imperials, they should forthwith retire, odraw them out of their trenches, into the place where the King with the greatest part of Army lay couertly to intrap them. Which the Scythians (well acquainted with fuch fere) fowell performed under the leading of one Column their Generall, that having once or ce drawn their enemies vnto some light skirmishes, and so retiring, and ere long again with Eater number returning, they at length cunningly drew the Emperor with all his army (in s to do fome great matter upon them even as they wished) into the place wheras the king his army lay in wait among the woods and mountains for them; where they, wearled and of breath with the former pursuit, and now on every side beset with fresh enemies, were throwne with a great flaughter. In which conflict, to encrease the losse, Baldwin the Emhimselse was taken, and sent prisoner in bonds to Ternoua; where afterwards by the mandement of the barbarous King he was most cruelly put to death, having his hands feet cut off, and fo difmembred was cast out into a deep valley, where hee yet lay miserabreathing three dayes after, and so died leaving his body as fortunes scorne, for a prey the wild beafts and birds of the aire, no man vouchfafing to bury it. Thus perished this thy Prince, for his vertues commended even of the Greekes themselves, (beeing about age of three and thirty yeares, and not having reigned yet a full yeare) in the yeare of our rd 1206.

The victory thus gained, and the city relieued, the barbarous King with his fauage fouldihaving tafted the wealth of the Latines overthrown in the late battell, and the pleafures of racia now subject to their sust greedily pursued their good fortune without respect of all manity: the open countrey they ouer ran spoiling what souer came to hand the rich and hous cities they rifled, and afterward rafed them downe to the ground: namely Serræ, Phipopolis, Apri, Khedestum, Perinthus, Daonium, Arcadiopolis, Mesena, Zurulus, & Athyra. e citifens and country people fled into the cities for refuge, they put all to the fword withtrefpect of age, fex or condition, except fome few, whom they caried away with them prifosofothat of all the prouinces of that rent and ruinated empire, the countrey of Thrace was A miserable, as first spoiled by the Latines, and now laid desolate by the Bulgarians and thians. Only fome few of the strongest cities, as Didymoticum and Adrianople (valiantly kinded by the Greeks and Latines) escaped this fury of the Barbarians, all the rest that sell otheir hands being laid wast and desolate.

In this fo troubled a state of the new crested empire of the Latines in Constantinople, the Hinry second tines made choice of Henry the late emperor Baldwins brother, as of all others the fittest to Empirer of the acceed him in the empire: who aided by the Marquis, now King of Theffaly, and the other flatingle. atine princes, notably repulsed the Barbarians, and left them not vntill that at length he had scouered from them all fuch towns and cities as they had before taken, & driven them quite at of the country, and so well established himselfe in his new empire.

But to leave this dismembred empire now in the hands of many, and to come neerer to our urpose: Alexim Angelm the Vsurper, driven out of the Imperial city by the Latins, to save

himfelfe. Led into Theffaly, and from thence vnto Lee Scurus (then a man of great fame among the Greeks) who tyrannifing at Nauplus, as had his father before him, was in these trouble fome times grown greater, by surprising of the two famous Cities of Argos and Corinth the whose means he cunningly intrapped Alexim Ducas, syrnamed MurZufle, the traitor, and for fecret grudge not commonly known, put out his eies : himfelfe an exiled man beeing a mon heavy enemy vnto the other also exiled : and himselse thrust out of the empire, a deadly see unto the other oppressed with the like calamitie. Shortly after which losse of his sight, bee was by chance taken by the Latines, and fo brought backe to Constantinople, where hee we for murthring the yong Emperour Alexim, worthily condemned vnto a ftrange and horible kind of death; for cast off from an high tower, and tumbling heels ouer head downward; he was with the weight of himselse and violence of the fall crushed all to pieces, and so mises. bly died a death too good for fuch a traitor. Not long after it fortuned alfo, That colories him elfe wandring vp and down in Thracia, was by the Marquiffe of Mont-Ferrat. (going. gainst Scurus) taken and stript of his great treasure, and what soeuer else hee had, and so feet away naked; long time after in beggars estate wandring about in Achaia and Peloponnessus now far valike that Alexius which fomtimes proudly reigned in Constantinople: but such is the affurance of euill gotten honor. He hearing that Theodorus Lascaris his son in law teigned in Asia, and there held the state of an Emperor, rejoiced not therat as a kind father in law, but inwardly gricued thereat as an enemy; fory that any other but himselfe should be honoured with the title of the Greek Emperor. In which malicious humor he failing out of Greeceinto Afia, ouer the Ægeum, came fecretly vnto the Turks Sultan lathatines his old acquaintance ! then lying at Attalia, (which famous city he had not long before taken from the Christians) vnto whom he declared his heavy estate, and how his empire had bin rent from him, as well by the Greeks as the Latines, requesting that by his means he might be restored again into some part thereof, especially that in the lesser Asia, which was by Theodorus Lascaris, together with the honour of the Greeke Emperour, vniustly (as he said) detained from him. This Lathating now Sultan of Iconium, was the younger fonne of Sultan Aladin; who not long furniting his father Cai Chofroe, left his Kingdom vnto his two sonnes Azadin and Iassadin, of the Greeks called Azatines and lathatines : where long it was not, but that these two brethren falling out for the fourraignty (which admitteth no equalitie) Iathatines was by Azatines his elder brother driven into exile, and for the safegard of his life glad to fly vnto this Alexius then reig. ning at Constantinople, by whom he was honourably entertained, and as some write, constant ted and baptifed. But Azaines the Sultan shortly after dying, this Iathatines returning home again, and renouncing the Christian religion, was by the Turks received for their Sultan : of whom the Emperor Alexius now in the like extremitie craueth aid. The Sultan nor forgetfull of his own troubles before paffed, or of the kindnesse he had received, and mooned with the pittifull complaint of his old friend, together with his large offers, besides that he was in hope to share out some good part of whatsocuer he got, for himselfe; took him into his protection, and forthwith sent Embassadours to Lascaris, threatning vnto him all extremities, except he did forthwith giue place vnto Alexius his father in law, vnto whom as vnto the Greek Emperor, those countries which were by him possessed, of right (as hee said) appertained With which vnexpected message Theodorus was not a little troubled, as fearing both the Sultans power, and the inclination of the people to their old Emperour. Neuerthelesse having propounded the matter in Councell, and finding the minds of his subjects well affected towards him, and a readinesse in them, in his quarrell to adventure their lives; hee encouraged therwith, accompanied only with two thousand choice horsemen, together with the Sultans Embassadour, without further stay set forward to Philadelphia: the Sultan at the same time with Alexius (whom he carried with him as a bait to deceiue the people with all) and twenty Antioch offer thousand Turks besieging the city of Antioch, scituate vpon the winding banks of the River tedby Jaiba- Mocander, Which the Emperor Theodorus wel understanding, and that the Sultan by gaining that strong city (standing on the passage of the great river the bounder of his Empire) should open a faire way for himselfe into the heart of Romania Asiatica, to the great hazard of his whole Empire; resolued with those few he had to do what he might to relieue his besieged city: and fo fetting forward vpon the spur, carying nothing with him more than a little vidu all; and now come neere vnto the City, fent before the Sultans Embassadour, following him la power, could hardly perfuade him that it was fo, although hee bound it with many es: yet at length perfuaded of the truth of the matter, and that indeed it was fo, he in all but his army in the best order he could vpon such a sudden, but not to his best aduanbeing hindred fo to do by the streitnesse of the place wherin he lay. Of the two thousand thortmen in the Emperors army were eight hundred Italians, all most resolute men, who the first charge, brake through the midst of the Sultans Army, difordering his whole as they went : after whom followed also the Greekes, though not with like courage: hose Italian horsemen now divided from the rest, and in number but few, in comming again, were by the difordered Turks, some on horsebacke, some on foot, so beset on eucle as that there was no way left for them to passe, but valiantly there sighting, were all toer flain, having both before and at the time of their deaths made fuch a flaughter among Turks, as is hardly to be beleeued to haue bin possible for so few men to haue made. The eks also hardly laid to by the Turks, and discouraged by the slaughter of the Latins, were at the point to have fled: when as the Sultan, now almost in possession of a certain victolescrying the Greek Emperor, and trusting to his own great strength, singled him out, bes ready as himself to meet him; when as at the first encounter, the Sultan with his horsmace gaue him fuch a blow upon the head, as might have killed a Bull: fo that the Emtherewith aftonied, fell down from his horse, who yet even in the fall comming someagain to himselfe, and although dismounted, yet quickly recouring his feet, with his hion hoxed the hinder legs of the Mare wheron the Sultan rid, beeing a most beautifull and of a wonderfull height: which now fuddenly falling under him, and fo the Sultan ling down as from an high tower; before he could recouer himself, had his head cut off Jaibatines the Emperor, which by and by put vpon a lance and so holden vp, with the fight thereof so Sultan flain by Theedorus Laslied the Turks, that striken with a sudden sear they presently sled, leaving the victory to caru the greek inperor, before more than halfe ouercome: who for all that confidering his finall num. #mperor. birst not farther pursue them, but entring the city, gaue thankes to God for so great a vi-Vnto whom the Turks shortly after sent their Embassadors, and so upon such reasoconditions as it pleased him to fet down, concluded with him a peace. Alexius himselse or of these troubles, taken in this battell and caried to Nice, was by the Emperor his son notwithstanding his euill deserts, wel intreated and ysed. Whilst the Latines thus spend their forces in subnerting the Greek empire, which should bin imploid for reliefe of the Christians in Syria, and that the Greek Emperor Lascaris thus troubled with the Turks, the Christians affairs in Syria and the Holy land grew stil fe and worfe. Wherof the Knights Hospitalers and Templers (the chief Champions of Christian religion in those countries) greatly blamed Almericus King of Cyprus, for that eing soneer at hand, and having married stable the heir of that kingdome, and so in her ttaken vpon him the title of King of Ierulalem, gaue himfelfe wholly vnto pleafure, dohothing for the defence or reliefe of the poor diffressed Christians, or repressing the In-amongst themselves, yet spared not as occasion served, still more and more to incroach

h them, and by building of new Castles and fortresses to cut them short. Of all which gs the aforesaid Knights by their Embassadors certified Pope Innocentius, requesting his erly care for the remedie thereof: Certifying him withall, that there was yet living one

Now was the ten years peace, before made betwirt the Turks and the Christians in Syria at the comming over of Symon Marquis of Mont-Ferrat (as is before declared) almost explanation red which had not fo much given to those poor remnants of the Christians some time of red and breathing as had the diffcord among the Turks themselves, which having for the spaces nine years continued betwixt Noradin and Saphadin for the fourraignty, was now by the death of Saphadin ended. enemies vnto the Christians. About this time also, or not long after, Innocentius tertius yet Pope, summoned a generall Councel to Lateran, wherunto, besides a multitude of great Bishops and other reverendors lats repaired also the honorable Embassadors of most of the Princes of Christendom, Van whom fo affembled, among other things was propounded the dangerous estate of the Chris stians in Syria, and how the same was by the help of the Christian Princes of the West tobe relieued. Wherunto all the Fathers and Princes there affembled eafily gaue their confent and therupon were some appointed in every country and province, to publish this Decree of the Councel, for the reliefe of the oppressed Christians, and to stirre vp the deuout people for the vidertaking of foreligious a War. The chiefe furtherers of this facred expedition, to be thus taken in hand against the Infidels, were the Bishops of Germany, especially the three great Bishops of Mentz, Cullen, and Triuers, whose example mooued also many others, all which to rehearle were tedious. Out of France also were fent Henry the County of Niver, and one Gualter the Kings great Chamberlaine, with a great number of the gallant youths of France, and so out of divers other places also: so that at length such a number of men were met together at divers ports of the Adriatick, as made vp a fleet of 200 fail: which with a prosperous wind caried ouer into Syria, ariued in safety at Ptolemais the chief city of the Chiftians, now that Ierusalem was lost. After whom followed also Andrew King of Hungary, long before bound both by his fathers commandement and his owne promife, for the vndertaking of that facred Expedition: with whom came also Lews Duke of Bavaria, and Leopold duke of Austria, with their forces all well appointed: vnto whom also Iohn King of Ierusalem joyned himselfe with his power. Great hope and expectation there was for some great matter to haue been done, now that so great forces of the Christians were thus met together. Who fetting forward from Ptolemais, and the first day marching into Galile, by the way met with certain companies of the Turks, whom they eafily ouerthrew and put to flight. The next day they came to the river of Iordan, where they also diffressed certaine of the Turkes garrison. There the King of Hungary bathing himselse in the river, forthwith (as one discharged of his vow and promise) returned with all his power vnto Ptolemais, and so from thence backe again into his own country, all the rest of the army of the Christians crying out to him tothe contrary: who after the Kings departure still marching on, came to the mount Thabor. But shortly after, Winter now comming on, and many of their cattell dying for cold and want of meat, they returned, some to Ptolemais, and some to Tyre, and there wintred. King Iohn and the Duke of Austria in the meane time tooke a Castle betwixt Casarea and Caipha, called the Castle of Pilgrims, from whence they much troubled the Barbarians thereabours all that winter. Vpon the appearance of the Spring, and the army again met together, it was thought best by all the great Commanders, That for a smuch as the kingdom of Egypt was the chiefe maintenance of the Mahometan superstition against the Christians in those parts, and that fo long as it flood vpright, they should not be able to do any great matter in Syria, to attempt the conquest therof, as an exploit best beseeming their valour and so great preparation: for that that land being once subdued, the city of Ierusalem with all the land of Palestine would of the miclues without more adoe straightway yeeld vnto them. And for as much as the famous City of Damiata, called in antient time Pelusium, not much inferiour vnto Alex-was the first and most commodious port for their purpose, as neerest ento Syria; and by the taking thereof they thould have a fair entrance into the great River Wilus, with primared of a most rich and pleasant countrey about it; they resolved there to begin the and therupon imbarking themselves with all things necessary for so great an enterprise, plemais, and caried with a fair wind, they in thort time arised at the defired port. Now The felination ch and antient city, the key of that fide of the kingdom, flood about a mile from the fea Egypt. miwhat distantalio from the great river, invironed with a navigable ditch or out drawn the Nilo in maner of an Island, as a man commeth from Syria by land; and compassed with three frong stone walls, the worke of that good Empetor Blim Pertinan, and of s some affirm, called also Altopolis. At the mouth of this cut, as you should enter into ty; flood a firong watch-tower for defence therof, and round about it a number of faire s, in manner of a pretty town intrenched. Besides that, for the more safety thereof, the out was barred with a great firong iron chaine, in fuch fore as that it was impossible for hip without breaking the same, to enter. The Christians with their fleet entering the th of the river, and comming to this cur, by great strength brake the chain. But thinking haue made their passage to the city, they found a greater stay at the watch tower, which gly built of square stone, and well stored with warlike engine of all forts, and a good garof valiant foldiers, stayed their farther passage, outrwhelming them as they approched, thot, fire, stones, timber, and such like, before provided for that purpose. le Christians, after the maner of the fight of that time, had upon certain flat vessels built in high towers of wood for the affailing of the watch-tower : in the approching wherof. vere not only troubled with the enemy, but with the tumult and ftir of their owne people to a some crying that they should yet draw neerer visto the tower other some crying out to have the bridges cast out, therby to enter: and the enemies likewise with much class couraging one another for the repulling of the Christians. So the foldiers hindred the its to do their busines, and the mariners the foldiers. In the midfl of this hurly, burley mult, one of the woodden towers furmounting the rest in height, ouercharged with the of men, fell, and in falling made such a noise, as if heaven it felfe had fallen; where in int as it were was prefently to be feen a most heavy spectacle; many overwhelmed with Il of the tower, lay there crushed to death; some grieuously hurt, and yet not dead, lay th with the timber crying out for help; others bruiled or hure but not overwhelmed, for further harm, leapt some into the Nile, some abord the other ships neer by, some cryut of his arm, some of his leg, some of his head or other part of his body, to the great diffort of the rest, insomuch that the assault was for that time given over.

ing John (as well for his valor, as for the title of the King of Ierusalem, chosen General of rmy) after he had appealed this tumult, and given the charge of them that were maimed pt, vnto skilfull furgeons, and buried the bodies of fuch as were found drowned or ouermed; with cheerfull speech incouraged the rest of his soldiers, persuading them not to couraged with the accident of the fall of a tower, which was neither to be imputed vnto cowardife, or the valor of the enemy, but only to the chance of war. the mean time Meledin the Egyptian Sultan had with a great Army incamped himselfe in the fight of Damiata, therby to encourage the besseged, and to fill them with hope of e; sending them oftentimes by the river, newes, messages, victuals, soldiers, armour, and socuer else they wanted. The chief cause of his staying there, was to take occasion for arprifing of the Christians, if any should be offered either by chance or their own negli-Euery day some skirmish or other passed betwixt our men and the Barbarians, ours arying away the victory: yet could these Barbarians neither be drawn forth to battell; build our men keepe them from victuals, for a finuch as they had the river Nile at comwherby victuals were out of the upper part of Egypt in great abundance conucighed the Sultans Campe. Whereas on the contrary part, the same River dividing it selfe in hany armes, in some places here and there overflowing, in another cut into many Disched channels, and in some other pent up by walls and causies, gaue to our men a thousand disflures. And therfore feeing that the Sultan would neither give not accept of battel, they lued againe to lay siege to the Tower. Wherefore having with great cunning, upon two

tower, they brought the same neer vnto the Turks tower, and the suburbs adjoining theman after which followed also the rest of the fleet well appointed for the assault. At which time all the rest of the army at land stood in battell ready ranged, as well to discourage them of the town. as that the Sultan should not be able to help them without the hasarding of battell There began a fierce and cruell affault, they of the suburbs right valiantly defending them. selues against their enemies. Within these suburbs, the tower, and the trenches; dwekne only Egyptians (the naturall inhabitants of the country) but also Arabians, Persians, Syriam, Indians, Moores, and Ethiopians, who were there refiant; because that City was a publicular mart, wherunto al fores of merchandile was brought from far out of the remotest patte of the world, and fo from thence in like maner transported also which incouraged them the most to fight for the defence of their lives and goods, the two things which men hold most dense & in like fort animated our men to the affault, as well in the quarrel of the Christian religion as to inrich themselves with the spoils of those rich nations. The Christians with their thing drew as neer as possibly they could voto the land, to the intent that vpon the bank of the rine. they might come to fight hand to hand, and man to man, and fo come close vitto their Ene. mies : but the Barbarians on the other fide fought by shot and all other means they could in keep them farther off, and so from landing.

That which most feared the Egyptians, was, that as one of our ships by chance ran aground voon that side of the river where the enemy lay, and being borded by the enemy, thronging in as fast as he could, and there making a cruell slaughter; one of the Christian fouldiers going down under hatches made there a great hole, wherby the water abundantly comming in fine the ship before the enemy was aware, and so drowned a great number of the Egyptianstoge. ther with the Christians. At which time also the high tower built upon the two ships joining now close to the Watch tower, and mating the same, dismaied the defendants with the ftrangenesse therof as with a miracle, in such fort as they now striken with a great fear, as beeing to fight with a strange, hardy and cruell kind of men, without any great resistance for look the tower and fied. The watch-tower thus taken, & they that should have defended the same some taken, some slain, and some fled; they in the suburbs discouraged, and flying away, were many of them wounded from aboue, out of the watch Tower but now gained by the Christians. At which time also the other ships landed the fouldiers, who entring the suburbs, put all they found there to the fword, even vnto the last man. There was found great abundance of vi-Quals, but far greater flore of riches, infomuch as it feemed to have bin the spoil of Arabia, Persia, and the rich Indies.

Now yet remained the ftrong Towne of Damiata, which was forthwith affaulted by the rain affaulted. Christians, more to proue if in that heate and sudden sear it would be yeelded, than for any hope they had by force towin it. But having done what they could both by scaling & other engins, they gained nothing but hard blowes and wounds, and so retysed. Neuerthelessetter lodged themselves in the suburbs, and laid a great part of the army betwixt the Sultan & the belieged city, to the intent that no supply of victuals should be brought vnto it : yet both the enemy oftentimes attempted to have entred the city, and the befieged to have fallied out, but both the one and the other were letted to doe what they would have done, and that not with out great loffe of their men: for why, the town was now on every fide fo inclosed by the Christians, as that no man could enter in or out therof. Whilst the Christians thus lay at the siege it fortuned that the river of Nile swelling with a great East wind, tose aboue the banks, and so overflowed the places wherin the Christians lay, that they could keep nothing dry, most part of their victuals being therwith spoiled. With which unseasonable rising of the river the Christians not a little troubled, by commandement of Pelagine the Legat, gaue themselves fasting and prayer by the space of three daics. But the wind falling the fourth day, and the river again decreasing, they gave themselves more carnesly to prayer than before, thanking the Almighty, that as hee had put them in a great fear, so he had in mercy againe comforted

Now with long lying, victuals began to grow feant in the Sultans Camp, fo that hee was glad to fend away halfe his Army vp againe into the Country of Caire. At which timeallo it chanced (as if it had been an extreame and common danger of the Mahometane superflition) that Embassadors sent from Corradin Sultan of Damasco and Ierusalem, vinothe ces of the Christian Army, came to sue for peace both for himselfe and his brother the ptian Sultan; promiting in regard therof againe to restore vnto them the Holy-Crosse, shat soeuer else himselfe, his father, or Sultan Saladin had before taken from them, Of h their offer most part of the Army liked well, saying, That they had therefore taken up for the recourry of that which had bin before gotten & gained by the valor of the worbriftian captains, and had of late been taken from them; and to blot out the ignominy Hoffe thereof, to the end it should not be said, that they could not leave whole & entyre heir children, what their fathers had got, when they had the keeping therof; neither haoft it, be able again to recouer it: that all these things beeing restored, there rested not urther occasion of war or let to stay them as most victorious conquerors to return home ribeles Pelagian Pope Honorius his Legat (for Innocentius in the preparation of the wars A faire offer efore dead at Pelulium) with King John, the Masters of the Knights Hospitalers and blers, the Duke of Austria, and the Germans were of opinion to the contrary: alledging this facted Warre was undertaken generally against the Insidels, and for religions sake. nst the Mehometan superstition, wherof the kingdom of Egypt was the chiefe seat and and that therefore they ought especially to impugn that. Which persuasion, together the authority of the persuaders, so prevailed, that the Sultans large offers were rejected, the Embassadors dispatched without any thing obtained of that they came for Wher-Corradin fearing that the Christians would at length come to Ierusalem, as the place most desired, and doubting how he should be able to defend the same, forthwith rased palls thereof, and the more to deface it, ouerthrew and pluckt downe most of the goodly as and other stately buildings thering sparing yet the tower of Danid and the holy sepulwhich he is faid to have done at the humble request and intercession of the Christians ers countries, which yet dwelt there, mixt with the Turks and Sarafins. hilest the Christians thus lay at the siege of Damiata, the plague began to arise in the wherof so many died, that it began to repent the great Commanders of the army, that and so much hearkened to the persuasion of the Legate (a man making no profession of rather than to the found aduice of others, who by long experience taught the sudden alon of matters of war, would willingly have accepted of the Sultans large offers. So beelagius the Legat to be generally cuill spoken of. There were now already six moneths fince the beginning of the fiege, and the Sultan lying in fight had not with him fo great succours feat my as before, but only the floure and choice of his people, having (as is before faid) for wate the before tof victuals fent away the rest up again into the country. Now it fortuned that the Chris, as men weary of the long fiege, flood not so carefully upon their gard, with watch and as before, but gaue themselues more to ease : which the Sultan perceiving, drew neerer he town, in hope vinder the couert of the filent night to fend new supplies to the besieged; ch companies by him appointed for that service, couragiously set forward, in hope to de-

the Christian sentinels, and so indeed came neer to the town unseen or discouered; and the formost of those companies were already entred the town, when the Christians pering them, raised an alarm, and put themselves in arms, and so furiously assailed the hindtof them, and in fuch fort, that they which were before within, and those that were but entred, fearing lest the enemy in that hurly burly should pell mell enter in with the rest, them out of the gates, exposed to the butchery, where all were presently cut in pieces. he Christians incouraged with this victory, the next day leaving a great part of the army te the town to continue the fiege, presented themselves before the Sultans camp to give pattel. Who for all that, well confidering that the loffe of a battell might endanger the le state of his kingdome, would by no means be drawne out of his trenches, but lay still: crwith the Christians, especially the French men (in the first charge naturally furious) kly incouraged, attempted to have forcibly entred their rampiers, but not with succes anhable to their courage. For the Egyptians perceiving the small number of their enemies, ably repulsed them, and in fine forced them to retyre, having lost Gualter one of their chief mmanders with divers others: yea King Iohn in affailing the campe loft many of his men grieuously burnt in his face, hardly escaped himselfe with life. After which discomfiture resolued not to think of any thing else but of the siege, and about all things to provide

t no succours should be brought into the town. They in the city more streitly beset and belieged than before, and now brought vnto extreme necessity and famin, and out of all home of relicie, aftembled them selves to consult of their affairs, and what were best for them with in fo dangerous a state; some one or other of them by night or otherwise secretly flying the the camp. And that more was, the city had undoubtedly bin yeelded by the greater part had not the chiefe commanders within mured up the gates, and commanded that none of the habitants upon pain of death should come upon the wals or rampiers, to the intent that her should not get out, or cast themselves from aboue over the wals into the ditches. The chief. commanders and captains went here and there up and down the City, to fearth and viewant things, especially the shops and store houses, where finding smal store of wheat, they divided it in smal portions among themselves. The common people inforced with want, eat whatfor uer came to hand, were it lawfull or valawfull, or elle forbidden by their fuperfiction, whole. fome or vnwholfome, good or bad, falt or fresh, rost or raw; and so prolonged their lives with fuch things as they could find. Now the belieged not able to endure these extremities of the famin (being the passion that most grieuously and often troubleth mankind) they were also attached by the wrath of God: for the plague (the fury wherof had before attained the came of the Christians, and afterward quite cealed) was now got into the city, where it made grain flaughter; which mortalitie day by day in fuch fort encreased; that menwere not one ly nor no more to be found to visit, comfort, succor, serve, and help the sick , but were wanting also to bury them, to draw them out of their beds and houses, and to seperat the living from thou that were dead : the streets and houses being full of dead bodies, gave forth a most hombs finke, with a most grieuous & insectious aire: there was not any place cleer from the plage or any man that could boast he had not bin attainted therwith, or the fear therof, and remed was there none. The rage and fury of these two denourers, the famin and the plague, denou red them without number, chusing rather so to die, than to submit themselves voto their ene mies, or to humble themselves so low as to crane their favor. That they within were thus sinched with famin the Christians knew, but that the plague so raged amongst them they knew not. Now the Christians had of purpose cast up certain trenches and barricado's, for the let ping in of such as the famin should inforce to come out of the town; thinking that the best ged, to ease their wants, would thrust the baser fort of people and unprofitable mouthes out of the city, vnto whom the Christians meant not to give any passage; for they having long before so streitly inuironed the city, as that no reliefe could be brought vnto it, lay now still en I pecting when the besieged, inforced by necessitie, should yeeld themselves, and so without losse of any man, to become masters of so strong and rich a town. It was now more than a yest that the Christians had thus lien at the siege of Damiata; when as certain of the soldiering on a brauery aduentured with a few scaling ladders to mount the wal: in which doing, finding no refistance, and withall hearing fo great silence as if there had bin no body within the city, they flood still a great while hearkning : but feeing that dumb filence still to continue, they returned vnto the camp, giving the captains to vnderstand how the matter stood : who asthe first thought it to be some policie and finenesse of the deceitfull enemy; yet afterward they thought it good to aduenture certain men, to proue their fortune, and to cause certain Companies well appointed to scale one of the bulwarks of the City, in such fort as if they should have gon against a puissant enemy that had had power to resist them. And hereupon were sea ling ladders brought forth, and all things made ready as for a great affault. So the Christians Demista being couragiously mounting the ladders, without resistance took the bulwarke. But as they were vapopted by entring farther into the town, a small company of the Turks and Barbarians (all the soldier the plane, if that the fury of the plague had left, and they also with the famin and infection of the air very Baset takes weak and feeble) met them, and began to make some smal resistance, but to no purpose, being the christians forthwith all cut in pieces. Which done, the matter wherewith the gates of the city were not red, was presently remoued, the gates set open, and the Christians with ensignes displayed let in. But even at the very entring in at the gates they were attainted with a most grieuous and horrible flink, they faw a fair city dispeopled, and that which was most fearfull to behold, the fireets couered with bodies of the dead, and fuch a dreadfull defolation, as might moue even the enemy himself to compassion. The Christians were entred as men appointed to have don agreat execution, and to have made the chanels run with bloud, as men justly prouoked with the long fiege and the pains they had endured; they had their (words and weapons in their

is, but found none against whom to vse them, for a man could not enter into any house, or hto any fireer, but he must passe ouer the dead, or others which being not yet altogether were miserably drawing toward their end. Of seventy thousand persons in the city were ound aboue three thousand aliue, and those for the most partyet your children; for all Af were dead, taken away either with the fword, famin, or the plague, the greatest part of blay yet flinking aboue the ground unburied. These three thousand that were lest were greand poor that pitty it was to behold them; vnto whom their lives were granted, vpindition that they should make clean the city, and bury the dead, which they were three hus was Damiata taken by the Christians the fift day of Nouember, in the yeare 1221, 1221 it had bin more than a yeare by them befieged. The spoil there taken was great, for bethe rich merchandise brought thither from far, was found great store of gold, filuer, and ous stones. The Christians thus inriched, and the city made clean, stayd there more than rafter, as in a Colony wherin they had bin willing to dwel, forgetfull of their own counin the beginning of these wars, the Princes of the army had with one consent agreed, that focuer city or territory should by them be taken from the Turkes or infidels, should bee a vnto the King of Icrusalem, whom after the departure of the King of Hungaric they nade Generall of the whole army. But now that the City was taken, Pelagins the Legat inding, That by vertue of his Legation it belonged vnto him to dispose of all things tan that facred war; as a man not vinmindfull of his mafter, adjudged the city from thenceto belong vnto the See of Rome. With which indignitie and wrong the King inward. contented, and yet for the Legats authority diffembling the matter, withdrew himfelfe. retyred to Ptolemais.

e year following. Pelagius weary to see the Arms of the Christians to corrupt with rust, 1222 ching doing, confidering the defire and hope he had veterly to have ruinated the Infigether with their superstition; commanded that every man should again take up arms profecuting of this war against the Sultan, and the besieging of Cair. But for all thet. he had commanded what he would or could, the foldiers little regarding his command. bne voice cried out, that they would not be commanded by any but by the King of Jeruonly. So that the Legat, inforced by the foldiers, was glad to fend vnto the King to rehim again to return vnto Damiata, and to take vpon him the charge for the mannaging it war, taken in hand for the defence of the Christian religion. Who for all that, excuimfelfe from fo doing, one while by his own particular affairs, another while by his own position: yet in fine, pressed and ouercome by the prayers and requests of the other La-Princes, he returned to Damiata at the felfe same time that the Duke of Bayaria arrived with a goodly company of braue men, brought thither out of his own country, after hee in now from thence ten moneths abient.

Legat defirous of the profecution of this War, requested and vrged the King, with the Pelagian the lethe Princes and great Commanders, without delay to take the field; telling them that gat perjustite of pterprise of the Holy war was grown old and cold, by those long delayes and protracting the christian time: and that they which kept wars fo far from home, ought to make hast to force the Army to promy, to take all occasions, to lose no time, but ever to be doing, and to prove all things for cred for the ing the Enemy. And that that was the way wherby the Worthies of antient times, both tipi. and Emperours, had gained unto themselves Empires, glory, greatnesse and wealth: twas for them that were inuaded and affailed, vpon whose lines depended the safety of country, their wives, children, and goods, to delay and prolong the time as they might, ade the enemy, to frustrat his designes, to deseat his attempts, and with desaies to dally off; till that having therby weakned his forces, he should together with his courage lose is hope. Cair indeed (he faid) was a great city, but yet that the greatest cities that euer thad by wars become great defarts, forced by the power of their puissant and speedy eneand that great empires (as were those of the Sultans) ought not to be inuaded or affaiy any forrein force, if they were not at the first onset ouerthrown, or at least so weakned, at they could not afterwards lift up their heads or recouer themselues : for otherwise, which had prepared a destruction for others, should fal into the same themselves. That houed either not to have attempted or affailed Egypt at all; or else now, after it had bin

once affailed, not fo to give it over before it were conquered. The King of Ierufalem, whether G it were that he were pricked with grief, that being called the King of the Holy land, he could not have the city of Damiata (vnder his leading and conduct won by the Christians come to the facred War) given vnto him by the Legat; or that he had before proved, that the higher Country of Egypt was not without great and manifest danger to be attempted; faid, That he would not go; alledging that honorable and facred War to have bin taken in hand onely for the recouery of the Holy land, and not for the winning of Memphis, Babylon, or Thebes in Egypt, which after they were taken, would not for any long time continue in their fidelitie and obedience, nor could they possibly be kept by force. Wheras Syria, by Godfrey of Buillon and other great Princes his affociats entred into conquered and possessed, and since his time by divers other Christian Kings and Princes holden, was in right their own: And that therefore he greatly commended the forwardnesse, the diligence, the courage, the desire, and whatfocuer thing elfe Pelagius commended; but that he ought to employ the fame in Syria, and not there where no need was, or from whence no profit was to be drawn or expected. Neuerthelesse the Legat, wedded to his own opinion, by the power of his Authoritie commanded the King of Ierufalem the Duke of Bavaria, with the rest of the great Commanders & Captaines, to take up their Arms, to get them into the field upon the expedition by him appointed against the Sultan; threatening the paine of the high sentence of Excommunication against him or them that would shew themselves backeward or vnwilling to do what hee had commanded. So as it were inforced by the Legat, they began with cuill will & worfe speed to fer forward in August, in the very hottest time of the yeare. At which time the Sultan be. I holding the great army of the Christians, in number about seuenty thousand, retyred as a man afraid, into fuch places as he thought best, farther off. Which the Legat seeing (as one not acquainted with the feats of war) rejoiced greatly as if the victorie had bin already more than half gained; commending to the heavens them that he faw couragiously marching forward, faying, That fortune alwaics fauored the Valiant, and that vnto Cowards all things fell still out to the worst. By the way the Christians seised upon a bridge which the Enemy had made over the Nile, and cut in pieces such companies as were left for the keeping therof. So marching on they drew neer vnto Cair, and there in the fight of that great and rich City incamped : where running vp and down, the more to terrifie them of the city, prouoked them to battel, vpbraiding vnto them their lazinesse, cowardise, and sloath, brauing them (if they were K men) to come out. Yet for all that, they would not fo do, but keeping themselves close & couert within the city, let them alone to brag and boast at their own pleasure. This siege continued long, of purpose protracted still from day to day by them of the city: and the great opinion the Christians had of their own valor, with the smal regard they had of the enemies. made them so proud and careles, that they remembred no more to take good care of the war, of their duty, their watch or their sentinels: their confidence was in their own valor and good fortune, not confidering or remembring that they were come into Egypt, or that they had put themselues within the trenches, sallies, channels, and cuts of a deceitfull river, which not only brought victuals vnto their enemies, but also fortified them; who by how much they were the leffe valiant, and leffe vnderstood the art of war, the more they vsed crast and subtil- L tie for their own preservation: so the cunning enemies drew the Christians out at length, abusing them with many delayes and deceits, shewing semblance of great feat, to make themfelues the leffe to be feared, and the more contemptible in their doings, to the end that they knowing the passages and streits of the country, and reserving themselves vnto the occasions and aduantages both of the time, and of their enemies, might circumuent them and intrap them at such time as they least feared any such matter. The Christians at all adventure had incamped in a low ground within the banks and causies of that senny country, under the couert therof thinking themselues safe as in their trenches, against al sudden sallies or attempts of their enemies. But these places wherin they laywere soft & durty, for a smuch as the country people vsedat their pleasure to water them by channels and sluces out of the river Nile; M The Christians which now pluckt vp and opened, the river began to rise and overflow all. Then too late they ent at within perceived themselves taken as in a grin, without power to defend themselves, or to make any the Stute of cherister Nik, refistance, or by any other means to shew their valor. So the river still arising and overflowing, gaue to the Turks and Egyptians good hope of their wars, and of a victory more defired

A than hoped for ouer a warlike and victorious people. All the ground where the Christians lay incamped was coursed with water to high that the victuals were corrupted and no place left for a man to stand or lie dry in. Now at the fame time the Egyptians had taken the high places, with the passages upon the wals and banks in that drowned country to the intent that the Christians should not be able to retyre or faue themselves out of the bogs and marishes covered over with water. So was their rash valour and presumptuous considence in themselves, exposed vnto the enemies shot and fury; and when they would by force have defended themselves, their hardinesse was overcome by the crafty subtiltie of the weake enemy. Then began every man to cry out against Pelagius the Legaraccufing, condemning, and railing at him: the King himfelfe they blamed not, for that he had done his duty in diffuading of this expedition, and was contrary to his good liking himselfe drawn into this war, the charge wherof he had not without great intreatie taken voon him; neither might he with his credit well complain of this misfortune, lest in so doing he might seem to have had no comfort in himselse. But as for the Legar, What counsell could he then give ? What counsell could he then take for himselfe? They of Venice, Pifa, and Genoa, left at Damiata, were indeed frong at fea, but how could they come to relieue him at Cair? And how or by what forces could the Christians break out of the banks and fluces of the cuts and channels, which winding in and out with a thousand inextricable turnings, inclosed them, befor also on every side with the victorious enemy ? After they had The milerie of bin thus coupt up and enuironed with the waters 3 daies, you might have feen the poor fouldiers in energy place fall down dead for want of food and fleepe, and foperish in the water: the land like miserable kind of death the rest were also in short time after to expect : other helpe there was none, but to yeeld vnto necessitie, and to accept of such conditions as it should please the proudenemy to propound. Now the Sultan defired not fo much their liues as the liberty of his Country; and therefore required to have the City of Damiata again restored vnto him, and all things else in such fort as were before the besieging thereof: and so the Christians without more ado to depart his Countrey. Hard conditions, if a man respect the hope wherupon the Christians had undertaken this VVar, and were so come into Egypt, with the toyle there by them endured. But vnto him that will but enter into the consideration of mens affairs, and especially in martiall matters, it will feem but an accident to be yeelded to, the like wherof hath oftentimes hapned vnto the greatest men of the world. These conditions (such as they were) were by the diffressed Christians accepted of. But when they were brought to Damiata, and there propounded to the Christians there left, a great contention began to arise among them; fome faid they would not accept of them, or furrender the towne, which beeing kept would be a flay for all the affairs of the Christians in the East, and a most commodious place for them to have recourse vnto; but being restored and lost, caried away with it all the hope of the Christians; and that therfore it were better to endure all extremities, than to receiue fuch dishonorable and hurtfull peace. Others of the contrary opinion said, That they ought not to forfake them that were in danger before Cair, nor to expose them to the butcherie, but to have a Christian compassion of so many thousand souls as there lay distressed, seeing they might be faued by furrendring that one town: Townes, as they faid, confifted of the number of men, and not men of the inclosures of walls and ditches. They that were of this opinion for the deliuering up of the town, seeing the other obstinately set down to the contrarie, withdrawing themselves from the councel, presently took vp arms, and by force entred the houses of them of contrary opinion, and took from them their weapons, by that means & perforce to constrain them to yeeld to their desire. As soon as they that lay before Cair (almost drowned in the waters) understood of this diffention at Damiata about the deliverie of the town, they fent them word, that if they would not yeeld the Towne to the Sultan, they would forthwith fend to Ptolemais, which would not fail to do what should be commanded, to have it in stead of Damiata rendred to the Egyptians. So was Damiata again yeelded to the In-F fidels, and fo great labors of the Christians taken at the siege & winning therof, all lost. That which made this indignity more tolerable, was, that Sultan Meladin having without bloudfled gained fo great a victory, did neither by word or deed any thing in despight or reproch of the Christians, but vsed them with all curtesie, relieuing them also with victuals and other things as they wanted, and by faithfull guids conducting them in safety out of the Country.

In like maner also Corradine his brother, Sultan of Damasco, made truce with the Latins for & eight years. Wherupon the King of Ierufalem went ouer into Italy, and there by the personation of Henorius the Pope, his wite being now dead, gaue his daughter Toland (now crowned Queen of lerufalem in the right of her mother) in marriage to Frederick King of Sicilia, and Emperor of the Latines, the rather thereby to ftir him up for the taking in hand of the facred war. Euer tince which time, he and his fuccessors Kings of Sicilia haue bin called Kings of lerufalem, albeit they have eailly profecuted that their pretended right and title, as ftil bufied in more prophanewars against other Christian Princes. King 10hn afterwards departing from Rome for France, was by the way honourably entertained at Pila; but arriving at the French court, he found Philip the French King desperatly fick, who by his last will and Testament gaue vnto the Knights Hospitalers and Templers fixty thousand crownes for the maintenance of their wars against the Infidels, which mony was to their vse afterward pavid vnto King tolm. Who thortly after, to discharge himselfe of a vow he had made, to visit the pilgrimage at Compostella ; going into Spain, by the way married Berengaria the King of Gastiles daughter : and there staying a great while, returned again into France, where he lay long, expecting the fetting forward of the Emperor Frederick his fon in law, for recovery of his wives right to the kingdom of lerufalem : which although hee folemnly vowed at fuch time as hee with all princely magnificence maried the faid Lady at Rome, yet otherwise letted with troubles neeter home, performed not the same untill almost seuen years after. All which time the Christians in Syria enjoying the fruit of the late concluded peace for 8 yeares, lived in great rest and quietnes: where so leaving them vntill the arising of new troubles, let vs in the mean I time return again vnto the troubled affairs of the Turks, Greeks, and Latins at Constantinople and in the leffer Asia.

Henry the second Emperor of the Latines at Constantinople, after he had (as is aforesayd) with much ado repressed the fury of the Bulgarians and Scythes his barbarous enemies, and fo giuen peace to the miserable country of Thracia, died, having reigned a most troublesom Telet Emperor, reign about the space of eleuen yeares. After whom succeeded Peter County of Aussere, his sonne in Law, third Emperour of the Latines in Constantinople. Who in the beginning of his Empire, willing to gratific the Venetians, and to reuenge himselfe of Theodorus Angelus a great Prince of Epirus, Competitor in his empire, besieged him in Dirrachium; which firong City the faid Theodorus had but a little before furprised, belonging vnto the Venetian K Seigniory. At which fiege Peter the Emperour lying, was fo cunningly by the wyly Greeke vsed, that a peace was vpon most honorable conditions betwixt them concluded, and a familiar kind of friendship joined. Infomuch that the Emperour at his request, not well aduised, came vnto him as a guest: who now of his enemy became his host, entertaining him with all the formalities that feigned friendship could deuise. But having him now in his power, and tearing no harme, regarding neither the lawes of fidelitie or hospitalitie, he most traiterously flew him as he was yet in the midft of his banquet. Of whose end some others yet otherwise report, as that he should by the same Theodore have bin intercepted about the pleasant woods of Tempe in Theffaly, as he was trauelling from Rome to Constantinople, and so afterwards to have bin by him cruelly put to death. Of whose misfortune Tepulus Gouernor of Constan- L tinoplevnderstanding, for the more fafety of the state in that vacancie of the Empire, made peace with Theodorus for fine years, and with the Turks for two. Shortly after came Robert (fon revel sustant to the aforesaid unfortunat Emperour Peter) with his mother to Constantinople, and there in his fathers stead was solemnly saluted Emperor, but not with much better lucke than was his father before him: for thortly after his comming, he took to wife a fair yong Lady, the daughter of a great rich and noble matron in the city, but before betrothed vnto a gallant Gentleman a Burgundian born. With whom the old Lady broke her promise, and more carefull of her daughters preferment, than her fidelity, gaue her in marriage vnto the yong Emperour The ioy of which so great an honour was shortly after converted not into a deadly heavines, but cuen into death it self: for the yong Burgundian more inraged with the wrong done him, M than discouraged with the greatnesse and power of the Emperor, consorted himselfe with a company of lufty tall fouldiers acquainted with his purpose, and awaiting his time when the Emperor was ablent, by night entred the court with his desperat followers, and first meeting with the beautifull yong Empresse, cut off her nose and her ears, and afterward threw her old mitted upon the perion of an Empreje. mother into the sea, and so sled out of the city into the woods and mountains, with those desperat cut throats the ministers of his barbarous crueltie. The Emperor pierced to the heart with this fo great a difgrace, shortly after went to Rome, to what purpose was not certainely known; but in returning back againe thorough Achaia, he there died, leaving behind him his yong fon Baldwin, yet but a childe, begotten by his first wife, to succeed him in the empire; who by the name of Baldwin the second, was crowned the fift and last Emperor of the Latins Baldwin the who by the name of Balanin the lecond, was clowned the intend late Limbtol of the Balanin in Constantinople. And for because he was as yet but yong and write for the government, he of the Latinet was by confent of the Nobilitie affianced, and afterward married vnto Martha the younger in confiantidaughter of Iohn Brenne King of Ierusalem, a worthy old captaine, (but as then Gouernour of mple. Rauenna, which city, he being certaine yeres before fent for out of France for that purpose, by Honorius the Pope, he notably defended against the emperor Frederick his son in law, but that affinity was before broken off by the death of the faid Emperors wife) who now fent for out of Italy vnto Constantinople, had committed to his charge and protection, both the person and empire of the yong Emperor Baldwin, now his fon in law. Which great and heavy charge he for certain yeares after worthily and faithfully discharged, vntill such time as that Baldwin was himselse grown able to take vpon him the gouernment. Now although the imperial city of Constantinople, with the countries of Thracia, Thessalia, Macedonia, Achaia, Peloponefus, and the rest of the provinces of Greece; were alor for the most part under the government of Baldwin the Emperour, the Venetians, or other the inferiour Latine Princes; yet were the oppressed Greekes, the naturall inhabitants thereof, in heart not theirs, as abhorring nothing more than that their forrein gouernment; but wholly deuoted to their owne natural Princes, Theodorus Lascaris and Alexius Comnenus, the one raigning at Nice in Bithynia, the other at Trapezond in Pontus, both called by the Greeks, Emperours, and fo of them generally reputed. Lasearis of the two the better beloued, and by farre of greatest power, had during the time of his government fought many an hard battell; (as is in part before declared) and ftrongly fortified his chiefe cities against the inuasion of his enemies, as well the Turks as the Latins: and so having as it were erected a new empire in Asia, and there reigned eighteen yeres, died, leaving behind him one John Ducas Batazes, that had maried the faire Lady Irene his daughter John Batazes leauing behind him one lonn Ducas Batanes, that had maried the faire Lady Irene his daughter and a Emptor and heire, to fucceed him in the Greeke empire in A fia. This Iohn was a man of a great wit of the Greeke and spirit, and of more grauity for his yeres, than was Theodorus his father in law, neuer vnder- in Asia. taking any thing before he had thereof well considered, and once resolued, not omitting or neglecting any thing for the performance therof: so that it was not vnfitly faid of the Greeks, The planting of this new empire to have required the celeritie of Lafearis, but the flay therof to have been the gravity of Ducas. He in the beginning of his reign in very short time having fet all things in good order, greatly augmented his legions, and shooting at a fairer mark than the empire he held, even the imperial city it selfe, and the recovery of all Thracia & Grecia out of the hands of the Latines, which could not be done without a fleet at fea, built a great number of gallies in the ports of the leffer Asia. And so having rigged vp & manned a strong fleet, and scouring the seas, in one Summer took in most of the Islands of the Ægeum, namely Lesbos, Chios, Samos, Icaria, Coos, with the famous Island of the Rhodes, and many others also. And not so contented, to have increased his empire, the next Spring crossing the Hellespont, and landing his forces first inuaded Chersonesus; and afterward to terrific the Latines, forraged the countrey farre and neere, euen to the gates of Constantinople, no man daring to oppose himselse against him. At which time also he tooke many cities and strong towns alongst the sea coast, as, Calliopolis, Cestus, and Cardia, with divers others therabout, fome by force, some by composition, the Greeks almost in every place yeelding themselves, where they were not so oppressed by the Latines, as that they could not help him. Now by these proceedings of the Greek Emperor in Europe, was plainly to be seene again the ruine of the Latine Empire in the East, all things prospering in his hand according to his hearts desire. Assan the Bulgarian King (no small terror both unto the Latines and the Greeks) mo-F ued with the fame hereof, by his Embassadors sent of purposevnto John the Greek Emperor, offered his daughter Helena in mariage with young Theodore his sonne: of which offer the Emperour gladly accepted. For being busied in his great affaires, he was loth to haue so great a King as was Affan, his enemy, able at his pleasure to call in the Scythes; who with their multitude, as a great floud breaking ouer the banks, had oftentimes carried away whole countries

before them. Wherefore the match agreed vpon, the two great Princes by appointment met G together about Chersonesus, where Helena king Assaughter, being then about ten yeares old was with great joy and triumph folemnly married vnto Theodore the Emperors fon, much of the fameare. Not long after, Embassadors were also sent vnto the Emperor from the Sultan of Iconium, to confirme and prolong the league betwixt them; for the Tartars not contented to have driven the Turks out of Persia and the far Easterne countries, began now also to cut them short in their Provinces in the lesser Asia. Wherefore the Sultan of Iconium. fearing lest whiles he had his hands full of those his most dreadfull enemies, of themselves too strong for him, he should behind be set vpon by the Greeke Emperor, and so thrust out of all; fent there his Embassadors vnto him for peace: which he for many causes easily granted. First, for that he foresaw what an hard matter it would be for him to maintaine warre at once H both in Asia against the Turks, and in Europ against the Latins: then by this warlike nation. as by a most sure bulwarke, to keep his owne countries safe from the incursion of the barbarous Tartars, vnto whose fury he should himselfe lie open, if the Turks were once taken out of their way. Both sufficient reasons for the Emperor to yeeld vnto the Sultan, which he did: so then, entuing was the peace concluded, and the Embaffadors dispatched. This peace exceedingly comforted, and afterwards enriched the Emperors countries: for now the people generally delinered of the feare and mifery of continuall war, began on all hands to fall to their fruitfull labours of peace. Yea the Emperor himselfe, to the stirring vp of others to the like good husbandrie, caused so much land to be ploughed up for corne, and so many vineyards to be planted, as might plentifully suffice his owne house, and such poore as he daily relieued; with a great o- I uerplus, which he caused to be carefully layd vp in store : hee kept also great herds of cattell, flocks of sheep, and sowles of all forts, without number. The like he caused his kinsmen and other of the nobility to do, to the intent that euery great man having sufficient for his owne fpending at home, should not take any thing from the poore country men, that so every man contenting himselse with his owne, might live in peace without the grievance of others. By which meanes in a few yeares cuery barne and granarie was full of corne, euery cellar full of wines, enery stable full of cattell, enery store-house full of victuals; the fields were concred with corn and cattel, and in cuery mans yard were to be feen all kinds of tame fowles, without number. About which time also there fortuned a great famine among the Turks, insomuch as that they were inforced to fetch their greatest reliefe from out of the Christian countries. K Then might you have seen every way full of Turks, men, women, and children, travelling too and fro into the Emperors countrey for victuals, their gold, their filuer, their other rich commodities, they gaue vnto the Christians for food; a little corn was worth a good commodity; cuery bird, freep, and kid, was fold at a great rate by which meanes the countrey mens houses were ful of the Turks wealth, and the emperors coffers stored with their treasure: the greatnes of the profit arising of this plenty of the Christians, and penury of the Turks, may hereby eafily be gathered, for that of egges daily fold, so much money was in short time gathered, as At Imperial made the Empresse an Imperial crowne of gold, richly set with most orient pearle and preci-Commendation Ous stones of great price; which the Emperor called Ouata, for that it was bought with egge money. Thus floutished the Greeke empire in the lesser Asia, under the good Emperor Iohn L Ducas: the Turks at the same time declining as fast, daily pilled in one corner or another by the Tartars, and confumed with famine at home.

Frederick the German emperor had of long time vowed to take vpon him an expedition into the Holy land; for performance whereof he was hardly called vpon, first by Honorius quartus the Pope, & afterward for his long delay excommunicated by Gregory the ninth:not so much for the zeale they had vnto the facred war, as to busie the Emperour afar off in warres abroad, whilst they in the meane time, to increase their owne power, drew from him some one part or other of his empire: which he not without cause fearing, from day to day, & yere to yeare, delayed the performance of his vow, so much vrged by the Pope; by his presence & power still disappointing all the slie designes of the Popes, conceiued or put in practise against him: but M now at length mooned, or more truly to fay, inforced with the thundering and lightning of Pope Gregorie, he resolued to set forward in the yeare 1227. About which time, Iolenta, or Toland his wife, the king of Ierusalem his daughter, died in childbed, being before delivered of a faire sonne. Now were met together at Brundusium an exceeding great number of coura-

A gious and deuout fouldiers out of all parts of Christendome, especially out of Germanic, vnder the leading of Lodwick Lantgraue of Thuringe, and Sigefride Bishop of Angusta; al stirred vp with the fame of so notable an expedition. But while it they there staid somewhat long the plague arose among the Germanes, whereof in short time after, both the Lantgraue and the Bishop died, with many of the other best soldiers. The emperor himselfe was upon his way as faras Malea, vpon the further fide of Peloponelus, where falling desperatly ficke of a burning feuer, and put back with contrary winds, he returned agains to Brundusium, and there staid a great while after. Then began the Pope again to fret and fume, and to cast out his excommunications against the emperor, as if it had bin thunder and lightning, accusing him of periury, infidelity, and many other grieuous crimes of all which the Emperor was ready to haue clee-B red himselse in an open assembly of the Princes of Germany to be holden at Kauenna, had it not kin by the Pope and the troubles of Lombardy disturbed. Neuerthelesse, he by open protestations and writings, fully answered all the Popes vniust accusations, wherewith hee had been so hardly charged: and yet desirous to performe the expedition by him taken in hand, having fet all things in good order, and put himselfe againe in a readines, he set forward from Brundusium in August, in the yeare 1228, leaving the charge of his territories in Italy under the care of Reynold Duke of Spaleto. The Pope displeased, for that the Emperor at his departure had neither reconciled himfelfe, nor taken his leave of him, and deeming therein his excommunications and fulminations to be contemned and fet at naught, fell into fuch a rage and choler, that he forbad all the Christian forces that were in Syria, to follow him, or to yeeld to him their obedience; and writ letters also vnto the Sultan, not to come to any agreement with the Emperour, or to yeeld vnto him any part of the Holy Land: which letters the Sultan afterwards sent unto the Émperor. Neither yet so contented, immediatly after his departure, ran vpon his kingdome of Naples, and so filled all Italy with troubles. Neuertheles the Emperour arriving at Ptolemais, was there honorably received of the Christian forces, notwithstanding the Popes threats and cursings. Of whose arrival Sultan Meledin having intelligence, and loth to draw so mighty an enemy as was the emperor, vpon him, by his embasfadors offered him most honorable conditions of peace, which before he would accept of, he by convenient messengers sent vnto the Pope, to have his consent and approbation. But such was his rage, as that he would not suffer the Messengers to come into his presence, or vouchfafe to read the Emperors letters, being brought vnto him, but like a mad man presently rent them in pieces. All which indignities the Emperor neuerthelesse took in good part, and concluded a peace with the Turks for ten yeares, vpon these conditions: First, That he should be anointed and accounted king of Ierusalem: then, That the Holy City, with all the land of Palestine should be deliuered vnto him: thirdly, That he might at his pleasure fortifie the cities of Nazareth and Ioppe: fourthly, That all fuch places as were fometime in the power of Baldwin the fourth King of Ierusalem, and taken from him by Sultan Saladin, should be restored: and last of all, That all prisoners on both sides should be set at liberty without ransome. So the peace concluded, the Emperor with his army came to the defolate city of Ierufalem, and there vpon Easter day with great solemnity was crowned king thereof, in the yere 1229. And 1220 E so having repaired the wals of the city, with certain Churches, fortified Nazareth and Ioppe, Frederickenbe and furnished them with strong garrifons, and appointed Reynold Duke of Bauaria, his lieu- Emperer crawtenant in Syria, he with two gallies only returned into Italy. Euer fince which time the kings rufatem. of Sicilia haue beene also called Kings of Ierusalem, and haue oftentimes borne the armes of both Kingdomes. The next yeare Pope Gregory, in despight of the emperor Frederick, more than for any zeale 1230 to the Christian Religion, did by the Dominicans and Franciscans (two orders of Friers but The vonfortuthen lately erected) as by his trumpeters, stir vp awonderfull number of zealous and deuout nat expedition Christians, almost in euery part of Christiendome, to take upon them the crosse (as they ter- Valuate 1812) med it) the cognisance of such as had by vow bound themselves to take up arms against the the Holy Land. Turks and Sarafins, for a recouery or defence of the Holy land. These deuout men met together in great number, under the leading of Theobald K. of Nauar, Almericus County of Montfort, Henry County of Champaigne, and others too long to rehearse, (of purpose stirred vp to trouble the ten yeares peace before concluded betwixt the Emperor and the Turks in Syria) fet forward, and after long trauell passing the streight of Bosphorus, not far from Constantinople into Bithynia, came to the river Sangarius, & there staid awhile to refresh themselves, & Afterwards passing through Galatia, and so from country to country through the lesser Asia they came at length to the freits of the mountaine Amanus (a part of the mountain Faurus) which they found before taken by the Turks, and the Sultan of Iconium himselfe not far off incamped with a firong army. Neuertheleffe the valiant County of Montfort, which had the leading of the vantgard, couragiously marching forward, by plaine force opened the passage of the mountain, having flain or put to flight the Turks appointed for the keeping thereof. the king of Nauarre in the meane time (though in vair) affailing the Sultan in his camp, who tearing the great power of the Christians, kept himselfe within his owne frength, and would not flir. Wherefore the King seeing it to no purpose there longer to stay, dividing his army into three parts, lest the Sultan, and followed after the County, placing his baggage in the H midft, and the best of his fouldiers in the rereward. But whilst they thus march vp the great mountaine, the Turks better acquainted with those passages, were still at hand, assailing them fomtime behind, fomtime on the one fide, fomtime on the other, as they faw occasion; and at length taking them at an advantage in a great plaine, fet vpon them, now before almost spent with hunger and trauell, and there flew of them an exceeding great number, But by the comming on of the night the battell was broken off, and the Christians repairing vnto their enfigues, passed the streits, and so at length arrived at Antioch, having lost by the way the great test part of the army, with all their wealth, their victuals, and most part of their horses the remnant yet left, having a little refreshed themselves, were by sea transported to Ptolemais; from whence they were afterward by the Templars conducted to Gaza, where they lay, and of 1 the spoyle of the countrey greatly enriched themselves. As for any other great matters, they were not able of themselves to take in hand, and help of such forces as the emperor had before left at Icrufalem, and other places, they could have none; having expresse charge from the Emperor himselse, not to do any thing against the enemy, tending to the breach of the tenne yeares league: which the Turks well perceiuing, and that they had to do but with these new come gueits, and some sew others their partakers, having gathered together their sorces, lay in ambush for them in every corner, to cut them off. Neither was it long, but that these of Gaza going far into the country, and returning laded with spoile, were fet youn by the Turks; whom they (casting away the spoyle they had before taken) notably repulsed & put to flight, the day now drawing to an end. But early the next morning appeared a far greater number of K Turkes than before; which now putting on, charged the Christians, who all that night had stood watching in their armor, and so ioined with them a most cruel battell:wherin the Christians shewed so much valour as was possible for men to do, but wearied with the long fight, and oppressed with the multitude of their enemies, they were ouercome and slaine almost euery mothers fon. Among the rest, the two Counties, American and Henry fell: the King of Nauarre himselfe hardly escaped by the exceeding swiftnesse of his horse, and by vncertaine waves wandring vp and downe the countrey, not knowing well which way to take, after two clayes came by good fortune to loppe : some few others escaped by flight to Ptolemais, the heavy messengers of the misfortune of their fellowes. The King afterwards visiting the holy places at Ierusalem, returned home into his countrey, with some few of his followers, having L performed nothing of that the world expected.

The Christians Logue with the Lurks.

About foure yeares after, Reynold Duke of Bauaria, whom Fredericke the Emperor had left b, perfection his lieutennant in Ierusalem, died, having by the space of five yeres peaceably governed that bruised kingdome. After whose death, the Templers (who, he yet liuing, would oftentimes haue broken the League, but that they were by his wifedome restrained) now tooke occasion to ftirre vp the people to take vp armes against the Turks, without respect vnto the league yet in force, or of the dangers like thereof to infue. Wherof the Ægyptian Sultan hearing, raifed a great army, fending also for the Chorasines, a warlike nation then lying neere vnto Babylon, to come vnto his aid. Thus become very strong, hee first layd siege to Gaza, but a little before repayred and fortified by the King of Nauarre and the Templers, which he at length M tooke by force, and put to sword all that were therein, as well the citisens, as the garrison souldiers in like manner he dealt also with them of Ascalon and other places as he went. To represse this his fury, the Templers and Hospitallers had assembled the whole strength of that weake Kingdome, and neere vnto Tyberias came to haue giuen him battell. Who ypon

A their approach hastily retyred, as if he had for feare shunned battell. But whiles the Christians as victors the night following lay negligently incamped along the river fide, hee returning backe again with his army, came voon them before they were well aware, halfe fleeping, halfe waking, but altogether vnarmed, with a most horrible outcry. The Christians now altogether awaked, and not a little troubled with the fuddennes of the matter, hastily and disorderly (as must needs in so great a confusion) tooke up their weapons, such as came first to hand, and so couragiously opposed themselves against their enemies. There was fought a most terrible and doubtfull battell, and that also for a long space, the Christians still incouraging one another to do their last deuoir: but the Turks stil keeping their order against the disordred Christians, and far moe also than they in number, prevailed, and there overthrew them with a great B slaughter, but not without the losse of many thousands also of their owne men, which there lay dead upon the ground. Most part of the best commanders both of the Templers and Hospitallers were there slaine, such as escaped fled to Tyre.

The Sultan incouraged with so great a victory, marched forthwith to Ierusalem, which he I 2 3 4 tooke without resistance, and there put to sword all that he found therein, men, women, and lerusalem take children, without respect of sex or age: and afterwards having risted the same, rased it downe and rate by to the ground, burning the buildings, and ouerthrowing the wals not long before repaired by the emperor Frederick, and much beautified by his lieutenant Reynold. And carried with an infernall fury, defaced and most shamefully polluted the sepulchre of our blessed Sauior, neuer before then violated or defiled, but of all nations vntouched & reuerenced, which for all that C may feem to have bin done not so much for the hatred vnto the Christian religion, as for that it was the place of all others most desired of the Christians; and for the gaining wherof they had vndertaken so many hard aduentures, and so much troubled the Sarasins and Turks.

Thus by the ynfaithfull breaking of the league, the most antient and famous city of lerufalem, sometime the terrestrial feat of the most Highest, and glory of the world, fell agains into the power of the Turks and Infidels, in the yeare 12 34, in whole hands it hath ever fince remained even untill this day: now a poore ruinous city, governed by one of the Turks Sanzacks, and for nothing now more famous, than for the sepulchre of our blessed Saujour against repaired and much vifited by the deuout Christians, and not vireuerenced by the Turkes themselues. The loffe of this fo famous a city, together with the dangerous state of the Christians in Syria, much grieued the other Christian Princes of the West, especially Fredericke the Emperor, by whom it had bin but a few yeares before gained. Howbeit he could not now remedy the matter according to his defire, being him felfe grieuously intangled with the endles troubles which Pope Gregory had as it were by tradition left unto the other Popes his successors, for the troubling of his state, untill at length they had depriued him of his Empire, and not long after of his life alfo. Among other the great Princes, carefull for the poore Christians in Syria, was Lewis the ninth, the French King, a Prince of great power, but of all others of that time most famous for his zeale vnto the Christian Religion, and for his deuout maner of life: who abounding in wealth and all things elfe of a great Prince to be defired, and often-E times confidering the notable expeditions many Christian Princes had (to their immortal) glory) made, some into Syria, some into Ægypt, against the enemies of Christ, and for the reliefe of the oppressed Christians, was many times about to have taken upon himself the like: But in these his devout motions, before he could resolue voon so great an enterprise, hee fell dangerously sieke, infomuch that for certaine dayes he lay speechlesse, devoid of sence and motion, without any figne of life, but that he did a little faintly breath when comming a liftle vato himselfe, (whether moved by deuotion, or troubled with his former conceits then running in his weake braine, is vncertaine) the first thing he asked forwas the Croffe (the cognifance of fuch asyowed themselves vnto the facred war) which he solemnly received at the hands of the Bishop of Paris. Ac which time also his three brethren, Alphonsus County of P Poitiers, Charles County of Aniou, and Robert County of Arthon, with Hagh Duke of Burgondy, William Barle of Flanders, Hugh County of Saint Paul, and afterwards most of the nobility of France, to accompany the King, tooke vpon them the fame charge. Neuerthelesse it was not by and by taken in hand, but some few yeres let passe in the consultation and preparation for fo great an enterprisemany in the mean time discharging their vow, by dying before at home in peace in their owne countries. At length the denout King still resolute in his for G mer determination, having taken order with Blanch his mother for his affaires at home, and out all things in readines for his journey came to Lyons to take his leave of Pope invecenting the fourth, (who for feare of the Emperor Frederick, then lay, there for his more fafty) and from thence to Marceilles, where imbarking himselse with his army the five and twentieth day of August, the yeare 1248, he the twentieth day of September following arrived in fafety in the Island of Cypius, and was there royally entertained by Guy Lusignan then King of that

Now was the French King defirous to have gone directly for Ægypt, without longer flay in Cyprus, had he not been otherwise persuaded, both for that his whole fleet was not yet come and the time of the yere began to grow unfeatonable, and the weather temperagonarbus H whilft he there staid, passing the Winter, the plague (one of the ready attendants of greatermies) began to arife in the camp, which daily increasing, had in short time taken away a great number of men, and those not of the meanest fort. Among whom were Robert Bishop of Beauvais, lobn County Montfort, the Counties of Vendofme and Dreux, Archambaut Lord of Burbon, with diucis other knights and Gentlemen, to the number of 240. fo that by force of the intectious contagion, the King was confirmined to divide his army into divers places of the Mand, actending vntill the intection should cease. In the meane time the Templers having in suspect both the French and the Turks, (the Turks, for seare they should ouerrunne all the I tench, left having gotten the victory, they should take all into their own hands, and so dimibilli their power and authority wherewith they tyrannized ouer the other poore Christians) I fent Embassadors secretly, vnto Meledin Sultan of Agypt, to persuade him betimes, to some to some good agreement for peace, to to auert the power of the French King from doing, him further harme, or proceeding further in that war. Of which motion the Sultan well diking, fent one of the noblement of streat with the mafter of the Templers congerning a peace, to that it might be by confest of the Freuch. The Templers glad of 10 honourable a mallage, writinto the Freuch king out of Syria how the matter flood perfuading him to accept of the peace offred ferting out in great words the Sultans great preparations and power. And so in deed had abuted the king had not the King of Cyprus, acquainted with hig doings, persuaded him that it was but a finene fle of the great Master, and that he had first sent vnto rbe Sulran, and procured that noble man to be fent which the King vpon confideration perceining to be K true, fed the Turks Emballador with hope of peace, but writ to the Maller of the Templers, you the price of his head from thenemy or to have any further intelligence with him,

Winter now past, and the plague well ceased, divers noble gentlemen and great comman. ders which following the king, and letting forth form hat late or for fears of the plague had flayed by the way, and wintred fome, in one place, fome in another, began to repaire wate Cyprus: as Robert Duke of Burgondy, who having wintred in Achaia; came now an the beginning of the Spring vato the King, with a number of good hor lementand with him William Brines of Achaia, with a great fleet out of Peloponefus, which countrey, with must part of Grecia; was then under the command of the Latines; among others came allo William lynnamed Longs effic, Earle of Salisbury, with a band of lufty tall fouldiers. So the army being metaogethers and all things againe in readinesse, King Lewis departing from Cyprus, and soffed at fearish contrary winds, about fine days after fell with the coast of Ægypt, and there with all his fleet came before the firong towne of Damiata, being (as we have faid) the keyiof that kingdome-The Sultan long before, understanding of the French Kings purpose for the invasion of his country, had fironally fortified his frontier townes, and put into them firong garrifoes, beside the great power, he kept with himselfe in readinesse at all assaies, as occasion should require. Vpon the Christians approch, the Gouernour of Damiata was ready, spon the flyors print a number of braue fouldiers tokeep them from landing; who neverthelesses the last y bases fer down for the performing of that they came for, manning forth their long boats with their M archers and croffebowes to bear the enemie from the those, ranna a Bround with the trothen final boats, made of purpole for the landing of men, and to washout longer they cause to heart with blowes, where for a while was fought a most sharp and cruell hattell, the by his him & Bringer to land, and the Tutke to keep them off, many falling on both fider. But what hould and panden

: A full doe against so many? The Turks oppressed with the multitude still landing more and more, and hauingedone what was possible for them to do, fled into the towne, leaving behind them their governour, with five hundred of their best souldiers dead on the shore.

This city of Damiata was exceeding rich and populous, and had in the former warres not bin taken but by more than a yeares fiege, (as is before declared) and that not so much by the valour of the Christians, as by the extremity of the plague and samine : since which time it had bin figongly fortified by the Turks, with deep ditches, high wals, and ftrong bulwarkes. and was at that time wel stored with victuals also, and all things els for the induring of a long fiege. Neuertheles, the foldiers that were left, and the citizens (discouraged with the losse of their gouernor, and remembrance of the miseries before endured in the former siege, and see-B ing the Christians now ready again to besiege the same) the night following, a little before The chigon of the breake of day, fet fire every man vpon his owne house, and so by a bridge which they had live vpon the made of boats fledouer the great river, breaking the bridge when they were over, for feare attitudes the bridge when they were over the bridge when they were the bridge when the bridge when they were the bridge when the bridge when they were the bridge when the bridge when the bridge when they were the bridge when their gnemies should thereby have followed after them. The Christians perceiving their awaylby the flight, without refistance entred the city, and being strangers, did what they could to quench the fire and to laue that which the inhabitants them selues would fain have with fire destroid. and for afterwards found great aboundance of riches, with plentifull store of all manner of vi-Quals, wherwith the fouldiers both inriched and refreshed themselues. This so happy and vnexpected a victory happed to the Christians about the beginning of October, in the yeare 1349; Sultan Meledin himfelfe, discouraged with the losse of so strong a city, offered vnto the French King for the redeeming thereof, and to have peace at his hands, more territory in Syria and the land of Palestine; than the Christians had of long time before : which large offer was by the French, especially by the Earle of Arthois the Kings brother, proudly reiected, and Alexandria, the most famous port and metropoliticall city of Ægypt, further demanded, to the great discontentment of the Turks and Sarafins. In these troubles died Meledin the old Sultan a man not much beloued of his people: in whose stead Melech sala (or Melexala, as some call him)a vallant and couragious Prince, well beloued of his subjects, and but even then returned out of Saria and Atabia, where he had bin to crave aid of the other Mahometan Princes, was chosen Sultan Which Princes, especially the Sultan of Damasco, although they had not of long blust any good accord among themselves, or with the Ægyptian; yet in this common danger of their superstition, which by the losse of Agypt was like to bee greatly weakned they loyned hands together, and fo fent him great ayd.

The new Sultanthus frengthned, drew neerer to the Christians, which then lay encamped not for from Damiata and had with them a hot skirmish, wherin he was put to the worse, and fowirh fome loffiglad to review But the Christians the next day, in hope of like successes latlying out againe, wich ouerth towns, with ten times more loffe than was he the day before, and fo fain so fly vino the camp By which victory the Sultan incouraged, began now to conceive better hope of the successe of his wars a and by stopping the passages both by water and land, to provide, that no victuals could without great perill be brought either vnto the city or the camp, infomuch that at length victuals began to grow fearce in both whereof the Sultan was H not ignorant, as being thereof throughly informed by fuch fugitiues, as for want or other causes, oftentimes fled out of the French camp into his.

Minger thus passing, and wants still increasing, it fortuned that the governour of the great city of Gaire (vpon the fortune whereof depended the state of the whole kingdome) aman nor audit affected to the Christian religion, and in his heart highly offended with the Sultan, for the diath of his brother by him wrongfully executed; by fecret meffengers perfuaded the Frenchiking to come on with his army to the city, the regal feat of the Sultan, promiting him to deliver it into his power, with full instructions what he had in all points to do for the gaining therof. Wherupon the King, who had before of himselfe purposed the same exploit, but now filled with a greater hope, affembled together the greatest forces he was able to make. As which time allohe fent for the Earle of Salisbury, with the rest of the Englishmen, who for meny prouding dignities offered them by the French (of pecially by the Earle of Artois the kingsbrother) whereof they could have no redreffe, were gone to Ptolemais, without purpole to hanging more ferued in those wars; but now being fent for by the King, with promise of better viage and honorable recompence for the wrongs past, returned againe into Agypt.

there to do their last endeuor, With whose comming the King strengthned, but more by the C new supplies brought vnto him by his brother Alphonsus out of France, leaving the Duke of Burgondy with a convenient garrifon, with the Queene his wife, Odo the Popes Legate, and divers other great Ladies in Damiata, he himselfe set forward with his army toward Caire. Of whose comming the Sultan hearing, and loth upon the fortune of one battell, to aduen. ture his whole estate, offred by his Embassadors to restore vnto him all the land of Palestine. with a great fumme of mony for the defraying of the charges of those wars, and all the prifoners he had taken, so that he would redeliuer unto him the city of Damiata, and joyne with him in league and amity. Which faire offer for all that, the French King, by the perfusion of Legat and others, refuted. So the King marching fill on, was to passean arme of the great river Nilus (the Sultan on the other fide still ready with his army to stay his passage) which H he had thought to have made by a bridge of boats, prepared for the same purpose: but better conducted by a fugitive Sarafin vnto a foord, before to him vnknowne, fent his brother Refers Earle of Artois, with the third part of the army before him, accompanied with the master of the Templers and the Earle of Salisbury, with their followers. Who passing the river at the aforefaid foord, suddenly assailed the Turks in their tents (the Sultan being then absent in folemnifing one of their prophane feafts) & put them to flight. With which victory the French Earle aboue measure incouraged, would needs on forwards, as if hee would himselfe alone have carried away the glory of the whole conquest. Whom for all that certain of the antient Templers, better acquainted with the manners of that deceitfull nation than hee, and better confidering alfo of their owne ability and strength, persuaded him to content himselfe with 1 the honour he had already got, and not to proceed any further in profecuting of the enemie, untill the comming of the rest of the army, especially in that desperat estate of the enemie, wherein he was to win or lose all. Voto whom the proud Earle in great despight replyed, that he would profecute his victory, and follow his good fortune; calling them dastards and cowards, opprobriously obiecting vnto them the common fame, whereby itwas commonly reported. That the Holy land might long fince haue been againe united unto the body of the Christian common-weale, but for the foule collusion of the false Templers and Hospitallers with the Turks and Infidels. With which reprochfull speech, the master of the Templers not without cause moued, answered for himselfe and his fellowes, that he should, when he would and where he durst, display his ensignes, and he should find them as ready to sollow as he was to goe before them. The Earle of Salisbury also willing to stint this strife, persuaded Earle Robert not to be so wedded in his owne opinion, but to liften to the grave and wholsom counfell of the Templers, being men of great experience : and fo turning vnto the mafter of the Templars began likewise with gentle words to pacifie him also. But whilst he was yet spea-King, the Earle interrupting him with many opprobrious words, called him dafterd and coward, and wished that the army were rid of him, and the fearefull cowards his countreymen. Whereunto the Earle of Salisbury answered, Well Generall, on in Gods name, and where focuer you dare fet your foot, mine shall be as far as yours ; and I beleeue we go this day, where you shall not dare to come nigh my horses taile; as afterward indeed it proued. How be it the Earle so said, for that Earle Robers and the Frenchmen had many times in reproch and disdaine, after their manner L called him and his followers English tailes.

The proud earle constant in his former purpose, and not to be otherwise persuaded, set forward; and first affaulted a little towne or castle, not far off, called Mansor, wherunto he inconfideratly approching, was notably repulfed; and having loft a number of his men, was as a man discouraged, about to haue retired. When suddenly the Sultan, neerer at hand than the Earle had thought, stirred vp with the noise of the alarum, came on with his whole power ; and finding the army of the Christians now divided (as he had long wished) with the multitude of his people inclosed them round, and had with them a great and mortall fight: wherin though the Christians right worthily behaued themselues, for the small number they were, yet oppressed with the multitude, and on every side befer, they were slaine down right. Then but all M too late, it repented the Earle of his foolish rashnes, and that he had not harkened vnto better counsel, and seeing the Earle of Salisbury valiantly fighting, cried out vnto him to fly, seeing God as he faid fought against them. Whereunto the noble Earle answered no more, but God forbidthat my fathers some should runne away from the face of a Sarasin. The French Batte thinA king by the swiftnesse of his horse to have saved his life, slying out of the battell, and taking the river of Thafnes, overladed with his armour, was there drowned. The Earle of Salisbury Earle Robert couragiously enduring the enemies charge, with his owne hand manfully slew many a Turke in stying drowand Sarafin that day, vntill that at length having his horse slaine under him, and himselfe so The Earle of wounded in the legs, as that he was not able longer to stand, yet vpon his knees laying about standing fighting him like a desperate man, and selling his life as deere as he could, was there slain, but not vanquished. With him perished the whole army, so inclosed by the Sultan, that scarce any one escaped aliue, more than two Templers, one Hospitaller, and one common souldier, the mess sengers of this heavy newes.

About the same time also sicknes daily increasing in the French camp, the king purposing B to march forward to Caire, sent a great number of sicke and weake people downe the river of Nilus to Damiata: of whose going the Sultan understanding caused a great number of small boats to be carried in carts by land vnto the rivers side, which wel manned, and meeting them by the way, let vpon them, and burnt or drowned them euery mothers fonne, fauing one only Englishman, called Alexander Giffard, who wounded in five places of his body, escaped yet into the French camp, reporting there what had hapned vnto the rest.

Now had the Sultan also got intelligence of the compact betwixt the gouernor of Caire The Governour and the King, for the betraying of the city: and thereupon had caused him to be suddenly ap- of caire appreprehended and put in fafe keeping, vntill he were at better leafure to understand farther of the matter:which no leffe troubled the French King, than did the former misfortune; al his hope for the yeelding up of the city, being therby cut offithus his hopes together with his strength daily decreasing, he would have gladly accepted of the conditions which he before refused. which the Sultan, now growne very strong, would by no meanes heare of, but in stead thereof, by way of derision sent to know of him, what was become of all his mattockes, forkes, rakes, fyths, plows, and harrows, which he had brought ouer with him ? and why he fet them not to work, but suffred them like an euil husband to rot and rust beside him? All which with much more, the good king was glad to put vp: for now his forces greatly diminished, as wel by sicknesse, as by the former losses, finding himselfe far to weake, he would fain haue retired backe again to Damiata: which the Sultan foreseeing, got so betwixt him and home, that now there was no remedy, but either to fight it out, or yeeld. The king himselfe had bin often before intreated by his nobility, whilst the river was yet unpossessed by the enemy, to have conveyed himselfe by water to Damiata, for that in the safety of his person consisted (as they said) the fafety of his kingdom, what ocuer became of them: whereunto he could neuer be perfuaded, faying, that he would never for fake his people, because he would not be for saken of them, but was resolued to indure with them what socuer it should please God to lay vpon him : so pasfing the river by the same foord wherby his brother had not long before unfortunatly passed, and comming to the place where the battell was fought, he might fee the dead bodies of the Christians pitifully mangled, with their heads & hands cut off: for the Sultan, the more to incourage his foldiers, had before the battell proclaimed, that who foeuer should bring him the head or hand of a Christian, should have a great reward for his labor, in hope wherof, they had E so dismembred them. But long he had not there staid, but that the Sultan began suddenly to appeare, with a most huge great army, as if he would even with the fight thereof have discouraged the Christians: against whom for al that, the French men in good order opposed themfelues, and for the space of 3 houres made great resistance: but what could one do against ren, & he also fainting for sicknes & food? the hard plight wherin the greatest part of the French army then was. In conclusion, oppressed with the multitude of their enemies, and no way left to flie, they were all overthrowne and flain, except some few, saucd in hope of great ransome. The king himselfe, with his two brethren, Alphonsus and Charles, and some sew others, were taken prisoners, and brought vnto the Sultan: who demanding of him, what had moued him so to make war against him ? was answered by the King, that it was for religion, and the defence F of the name of his God. In this vnfortunat battel, fought the 5.0f Aprill, in the yere 1250, befides the common foldiers, were flain most of the nobility of France, & all their tents taken. The Sultan presently vpon this ouerthrow, sent of his owne souldiers the like number that the French were of with French enfignes, and difguised in the attire of the slain Frenchmen, to Damiata, where the Duke of Burgondy, the French Queene, and the Popes Legate lay; in hope to have bin fo let in forfrenchmen:but they were not fo wel masked, but that they were G by them of the city discouered for enemies, and so kept out and deceived of their purpose.

The Christians thus overthrown, and the French King taken prisoner, Melech sala the Sultan taking compassion vpon him, and yet minding of his life to make his own gain; cheering him vp with comfortable speeches, began to talk with him of his deliuerance, and of a good attonement to be made betwixt them. The conditions whereof propounded by the Sultan were, That the King should forthwith deliuer again vnto him the city of Damiata, and moreouer pay vnto him for the ransome of himselfe and his, and for the charges of the war, eight thousand pound of gold: That all prisoners should on both sides be frankly set at liberty, and fo a peace to be taken for ten yeres: for the more affurance wherof, the Sultan offred to fwear. That if he failed in the performance thereof, to renounce his Mahomet: requiring alfoof the H king to sweare, If he failed in any thing that he had promised, to deny his Christ to be God: which prophane oath the King detesting and wishing rather to die than to give the same the Sultan wondring at his constancy, tooke his word without any oath at all, and so published the league. But whilft they were comming together to Damiara, Melech-fala now in the pride of this victory, fearing nothing leffe than the fudden change of fortune, or the mischief haning ouer his head, was in the presence of a number of his noblemen suddenly flain by two desperat Mamulukes; and one Turquiminus a flurdy flaue of their owne order and vocation (by whose procurement it was supposed to have beene done) by the consent of the whole armie created Sultan in his stead: who renoking the league before concluded by Melech sala, made another in his owne name with the King, much vpon the same conditions that the other was. I which after he had received Damiata, he caused openly to be proclaimed. Nevertheles after that King Lewis had payed his ransome, and was with the remnant of his army by the Genowaies transported from Damiata to Ptolemais, the false miscreant performed not the half of that he had promised, of twelve thousand Christian captives that should have beene set free, scarce inlarging source thousand; and killing all the sicke souldiers whom by his promise hee ought to have relieved, neither suffering any Christian to cary any of his goods with him out of Ægypt, which by the league he ought to have done also.

The French King comming to Ptolemais, and purposing to have returned home, was intreated by the master of the Templars and Hospitalers, and other the nobility of the Christien ans, to flay, which he did almost by the space of source yeres: in which time he repaired the K cities of Cusarca and Ioppe, and fortified many strong places for the desence of the Christians against the insidels and so commending the protection thereof vnto the Knights of the facred war, and fending his brethren away before him, followed after himfelfe, greatly lamented for by all the Christians in Syria, and so arrived in France the fixt yeare from the time of his departing thence. This was the end of this long and unfortunat expedition of Lovis the French King, wherin as some write, were eighty thousand Christians lost howbeit the French Chronicles extenuating their loffe, report, of two and thirty thousand French, fix thousand to haue returned againe into France. The City of Damiata in the space of a few yeares twice woon, and twice lost by the Christians, was shortly after the delivering vp therof, by the Sultan rased down to the ground, because it should no more serue the Christians for an entrance L

The late Ægyptian Sultans thus oftentimes inuaded by the Christian princes, & reposing no great assurance in the prowes of the esseminate Ægyptians, a people sitter for merchandize and other base occupations than for chiualry and war, had for the strengthening of their kingdome, bought an infinite number of flaues, especially of the poore and hardy Circaffians, called in antient time Geta & Zinchi, neer to Cholchis & the Euxine fea, brought vnto Alexandria and other ports of Ægypt out of those bare cold countries, by Merchants, and from thence transported to Caire & other cities of Ægypt:of which poore flaues, the late Ægyptian Sultans taking their choice, & culling out from the rest such as were like to bee of greatest spirit & ability of body, deliuered them vnto most skilful and expert teachers; by whom M they were carefully taught to run, to leap, to vaut, to shoot, to ride, with all other feats of actiuity, and withall cunningly to handle all manner of weapons, as wel on horseback as on foot, and so instructed, and become cunning, were taken out of their schooles into pay, and inrolled together as the Sultans choice horsemen, and commonly called by the name of MamaA lukes: in whose good service the late Sultans finding great vse, spared for no cost, both for their maintenance and increasing of their number; daily crecking new nurseries stored with yong frie, which growing vp and ready, was still ioined to the other. It is wonderfull to tell, vnto what a strength and glory this order of the Mamalukes was in short time growne by the care of the Ægyptian Kings: by them they mannaged their greatest affaires, especially in time of wars, and by their valor, not only defended their countrey, but gained many a faire victorie against their enemies, as they did now against the French but as too much power in such mens hands feldome or neuer wanteth danger, so fel it out now betwixt the late Sultan Melech sala, and those masterfull Mamuluke slaues; who proud of their preserment, and forgetful of their duty, and seeing the greatest strength of the kingdom in their hands, traiterously slew Melech- Therwin of the fala their chiefe founder, fetting vp in his place (as aforesaid) one Turquiminus, a base slave, in Agype. one of their owne order and fertile vocation, but indeed otherwise a man of a great spirit and valour. This Melech sala murthered by the Mamalukes, was the last of the free borne kings of Ægypt, in whom the Turks kingdome in Ægypt, erected by Saracon and the great Sultan Saladin(as is before faid) and in his stock and family ever since continued, took end, as did also al the power of the Turks in that great & rich kingdome. For the proud Mamalukes having now got the sourraigntie into their hands, & exalted a Sultan out of themselues, imperiously commanded as great Lords ouer the rest of the people, not suffering them to have the vic either of horse or armor, or to beare any sway in the common-weale : but keeping them vnder with most heavy impositions, and still preferring their owne slaves (wherwith the countrey of C Ægypt now swarmed) made the natural countrey people, of all others most miserable, not daring to meddle with any thing more than Merchandife, their Husbandry, or other their base mechanicall occupations: whereof the greatest profit still came vnto the Mamalukes, who as Lords of all, with great infolency, at their pleasure tooke it from them as their owne. As for the great Sultan, they still chose him from among themselues, not suffering any the Sultans children to succeed their fathers in the kingdome, for feare lest they in the processe of time, proud of their ancestors and parentage, should reckon of them as of his slaues (as indeed they were) and fo at length bring in another more free kind of gouernment.

Against which they provided also, not only by this restraint of their Sultans children, but of their own also:taking order and establishing it as an immutable law, That though the sons of the Mamalukes might enioy their fathers lands, and wealth after their death, yet that it should not be lawfull for them in any case to take upon them the name or honor of a Mamaluke: fo debarring them from all government in the common wealth, to the intent it might still rest with the Mamalukes. Neither was it lawfull for any borne of Mahometane parenrs (which could not be flaues) or of the race of the Iews, to be admitted into that order; but only fuch as being borne Christians and become slaues, had from the time of their captivity been instructed in the Mahometane superstition; or else being men growne, and comming thither, had abiured the Christian Religion (as many reprobates did in hope of preferment.) Right strange it is to consider, vnto what honour and glory this slauish empire in short time grew: many of these poore slaues by rare fortune or secret divine power, exalted out of the dust to E the highest degree of honor, prouing most excellent and renowned Princes, of such strength and power, as was dreadfull even to the greatest Princes of the world. In which great glory, this seruile empire (to the worlds wonder) flourished from this time among the greatest by the space of 267 yeares; untill that having run the appointed race, it was with a great destruaion by Selymus the victorious Emperor of the Turks, ouerthrown in the yeare 1517, and the kingdome of Ægypt, with all Syria and the land of Palestine, brought into the forme of prouinces, vnited vnto the Turks empire, as they are at this day, and as in the course of this history shall in due time and place (God willing) at large appeare.

But leaving the kingdome of the Turks thus overthrowne in Ægypt, and the Mamalukes there triumphing, the French King returned into France, & the Christians in peace in Syria; let vs againe returne into the lesser Asia, and vnto the imperial City of Constantinople, whether the affaires both of the Turkes and of the Christians now call vs. All this while the Greeke Empire (for fo the Greekes will haue it called) flourished both in peace and plenty in the leffer Afia, under their Emperour Iohn Batazes: the power of the Latines in the meane time declining as fast at Constantinople, under the gouernment of the Latine Emperour

The beginning

Baldwin the fecond. As for the Turks whom we left grieuoully troubled both with famine C and the often incursions of the Tartars, they had all this while, and yet also, enough and more than enough to do to withstand the same enemy. At length it fortuned that Iohn Ducas the Greeke Emperor died, being at the time of his death about threefcore yeares old, whereof he had happily reigned three and thirty : by whose good and discreet government, the Greeke empire before brought low and almost to nought by the Latines, began againe to gather strength and to flourish both in Asia and some little part of Europ also. Of him are reported many notable matters, which as impertinent to our purpose I could willingly passe ouer. were I not by the worthy remembrance of one of them staid a while by the way.

in toacherth Marcejina.

This noble and famous Emperour having long lamented the death of the faire Empresse Irene his first wife, at last married another young Lady, the fister of Manfred King of Sicilie. # called anne, with whom among ft other honourable and beautifull dames, fent by the King her brother for the acompanying of her to Constantinople, was one Marcefina, a rare paragona of such a feature as if nature had in her meant to bestow her greatest skil. From whose mouth alwaies flowed a fountaine of most fugred words, and out of her eyes issued (as it were) nets to intangle the amorous in yoon this fo faire an object, the Emperor not fearing further harme. took pleafure oftentimes to feed his eyes, untill that at length caught with her looks, he had loft his liberty, and was of a great Emperor cocome her thrall, in fuch fort, as that in comparifon of her he feemed little or nothing to regard the yong Empresse his wife, but so far doated vpon her, that he suffered her to be attired and honored with the same attire and honour that the Empresse was her selfe whom the now so far exceeded both in grace and favour with the 1 Emperor, and honor of the people, as that she almost alone enjoyed the same, without regard of her vnto whom it was of more right due. Whilf the thus alone triumpheth, at length it fortuned that the in all her glory, attended vpon with most of the gallants of the court, and fome of the Emperors guard, would need go (whether for her deuotion or for her recreation. I know not) to visit the monastery and fair church, which Blemmydes (a noble man of great renowne, both for his integrity of life, and learning) had of his own coft and charges but lately built in the country, where he together with his monks, as men weary of the world, lived a deuout and solitary contemplative life, after the manner of that time, with the great good opinion of the people in generall. This Blemmydes was afterward for his vpright life & profound learning chosen Patriarch of Constantinople: which great honor, next to the Emperor him-Marcefina the felfe, he refuled, contenting himselfe with his cel. Marcefina comming thither in great pomp, subme fluit out and thinking to have entred the church, had the doores shut against her by the Monks, before of the Church. commanded fo to do by Blemmydes their founder: and fo was to her great difgrace kept out. For that deuout man deemed it a great impiety, to fuffer that so wicked and shamelesse a woman, against whom he had most sharply both spoken and written, with her prophane and wieked feet to tread upon the facred pauement of his church. She inraged with this indignitie, hardly by so proud a woman to be with patience disgested, and prickt forward by her flattering followers also, returning to the court, grieuously complained thereof vnto the emperor, stirring him up by all means she could to avenge the same, persuading him to have bin therein himselse disgraced. Whereunto also were joyned the hard speeches of her pickthanke fa- L uorites, who to curry fauor, spared not as it were to put oyle vnto the fire, for the stirring vp of the Emperor to reuenge. Who with fo great a complaint nothing moued to wrath, but struck as it were to the heart with a remorfe of conscience, and oppressed with heavinesse, with tears running down his cheeks, and fetching a deep figh, faid, Why prouoke you me to punish so deuout and just a man? Whereas if I would my (elfe have lived without reproch and infamy, I should have kept my imperiall majesty unpolluted or stained. But now sith I my selfe have been the cause both of mine owne diffrace, and of empires I may thanke mine owne deferts it of fuch eaill feed as I have fowne, I now reap alle an enill hirneft.

Theodorus

After the death of this good Emperour, Theodorus his sonne, borne the first yeare of his fathere reigne, being then about three and thirty yeares old, was by the generall confent of the M people faluted Emperor in his stead:who in the beginning af his empire renewed the league which his farher had made with Iathatines the Turkish Sultan: & so having provided for the security of his affairs in Asia, he with a puissant army passed ouer the street of Hellespontus, into Europe, to appeale the troubles there raifed in Macedonia and Thracia, by the King of Bulgaria his brother in law, and Michael Angelus the Despot of Thessalia; who voon the death of the old Emperor began to spoile those countries, not without hope at length to have joyned them vnto their own : by whole comming they were for all that disappointed of their purpose, and glad to sue to him for peace. But whilest he was there busied, he was advertised by letters from Nice, that Michael Paleologus, whom he had left their gouernor in his absence, was fecretly fled vnto the Turks: with which newes he was not a little troubled. The cause of whose flight, as Paleologus himselfe gaue it out, was, for that he perceived himselfe divers waies by many his enemies brought into difgrace, and the Emperors cares fo filled with their odious complaints, so cunningly framed against him, as that they were not easily or in short time to be refelled; and therfore fearing in the Emperors heavy displeasure to be suddenly taken away, to have willingly gone into exile, if so happily he might sauchis life from the malice of them that fought after it.

At his comming to I conium, he found lat hatines the Sultan making great preparation against the Tartars; who having driven the Turks out of Persia and other the far Easterne countries. (as is before declared) and running still on, did with their continuall incursions spoile a great part of their territories in the leffer Asia also, and now lay at Axara, a towne not far off from Iconium:against whom the Sultan now making the greatest preparation he could, gladly welcommed Paleologus, whom he knew to be a right valiant and worthy captain, commending to his charge the leading of certaine bands of Greekes, whom he had retained to serue him in those wars, as he had others of the Latines, under the conduct of Boniface Moline a Nobleman C of Venice: and so having put all things in readinesse, and strengthned with these forrein supplies of the Greekes and Latines, fet forward against his enemies the Tartars: who at the first fight of the strange ensignes and foldiers were much dismaied, fearing some greater force had bin come to the aid of the Turks neverthelesse, joining with them in battel, had with them at the first a most terrible and bloudy conslict, wherein that part of the army that stood against Paleologue and his Greeks, was put to the worfe, to the great discomfiture of the Tartars, being euen vpon the point to have fled, had not one of the greatest Commanders in the Turks army. and a nigh kinfman of the Sultans, for an old grudge that he bare vnto the Sultan, with all his regiment, in the heat of the battell revolted vnto the Tartars; whereby the fortune of the battel was in a moment as it were quite altred, they which but now were about to have fled, fighting like lyons, and they that were victors now glad to turne their backs & fly:in which flight a great number of the Turks fell, the fierce Tartars most eagerly pursuing them. Paleologus, with the Generall of the Turks, hardly chased by the Tartars, and glad every houre to make a stand, and to fight for their lives, with much adoe, after many daies slight recovered a castle of the Generals, neere vnto Calfamona, and so saued themselues. The Tartars after this so great a victory (wherein they had broken the whole strength of the Turks, and brought in hazard the whole state of their kingdome) without resistance forraged all the countries and prouinces subject vnto the Turkish Sultan, making spoile of whatsoeuer they light vpon: insomuch that the Sultan discouraged, and having now no strength left to oppose against them, fled vnto the Greeke Emperor Theodorus for aid, who most honourably entertained him, with E all his traine, and comforted him with such small aid as he thought good then to spare him : which for his more fafety he fent home with him, under the leading of Ifaacius Ducas, fyrnamed Murt Zuffe, a man in great credit with him. In recompence of which kindnesse, the Sultan gauevnto the Emperor the city of Laodicea, whereinto he presently put a strong garrison: neuerthelesse, it was not long before it fell againe into the hands of the Turks, being a place not to be holden by the Greeks. Yet for all this, the Sultan finding himselfe stil too weak to withstand the continual inuasions of the Tartars, and weary of the harmes he dayly sustained, by the aduice of his chiefe counsellors made a league with them, yeelding to pay them a certaine yerely tribute, thereby to redeeme his peace. From which time the Tartars accounted of the Turks as of their tributaries and vallals.

Not long after this, Michael Paleologies was by the Emperors kind and gratious letters called home; with his faithfull promise also before given for his security: who before his return bound himselse also by solemne oath, to be vnto the Emperour and his sonne alwaies loyall, and from thenceforth neuer to leeke after the Empire, or give cause of new suspect for such matters as he had beene before charged with: but for euer to yeeld vnto the Emperour, his fon or other his successors in the Empire, his dutifull obedience and fidelitie. Vpon which conditions he was again made great Constable, and so received into the Emperors savor, and lived the rest of his reign in great honor and credit with him. Now Theodorns the Emperor having reigned 3 years, fell fick and died, leaving behind him his fon John, then but a child of 6 years old, to succeed him in his empire: whom he vpon his death bed, together with the empire, commended to Arfenius the Patriark, and one George Mu. zalo his faithfull counsellor, as to his trusty tutors, to see him safely brought vp, and the Em. pire well and peaceably gouerned. This Muzale was a man of mean parentage, but for his familiar acquaintance and civil behavior, of a child brought vp in the court with the Emperor as his play fellow: with whom he growing up, so framed himselfe to his maners and disposition on that he alone was to him in flead of all, itill at hand, ready to fay or do what focuer might H be gratious or pleafing to the Emperor. And the elder they grew, fo increased this their mu. tual affection and loue: in such fort, that with him now Emperor, he was of all others in greatest fauor & authority, a wary observer of his delights, a ready minister of his affairs, & faithful partaker of his fecrets: for which he was in short time promoted vnto the greatest honors of the court, and honorably maried to one of the Emperors nigh kinfwomen; and now at his death, by his last will, with the reuerend Patriark appointed tutor to the yong emperour and his two yong fifters. And for more affurance therof, a folemn oath of obedience to the yong Prince as emperor and vnto them as his tutors, was exacted of all forts of men, both high and low, of what condition socuer; and that not once, but first a little before the Emperours death, and again after he was now dead: for many of the nobilitie honorably descended, seeing the 1 Ensy in Court. Sudden change of Muzalo's fortune, amongst themselves murmured thereat, as grieving at his preferment, seeing there were many among them, to whom both the tuition of the yong Emperor and administration of the empire of better right appertained, seeing they were both neerer of kin to the Emperor, and fitter (as they thought) for fo great a charge than was My-Talo, whom (as they faid) they had many causes both to contemn and hate: for, beside that he was not honorably born, and had served the late emperor Theodore as the minister of his wrath against some of the nobility (causes sufficient for the peoples hatred) if he should now also in to great authoritie affect the empire, it was by his malicious enemies vainly doubted, that he would not spare to commit any maner of villany for the effecting of his inordinat defire. Of all which MuZalo was not ignorant, a man at all other times of a most quick apprehension for & fuch matters, but as then especially, his wits being awaked with these so great motiues and dangers. Wherfore speedily calling together all the nobility into the court, hee welcommed them one by one, and curteoufly discoursing with them, offred to discharge himselse both of the administration of the Empire, and tuition of the yong Emperor, & willingly to yeeld the fame to any one of them, whom the rest should think fittest for so great a charge. Which although they all with one consent as it were refused, saying, That hee of all others was to bee preferred, vnto whom the Emperor, lord both of the empire and the child, had committed the fame:yet MuZalo erneftly requested the contrary, and ftifly withstood their defire, wishing indeed rather to have led a quiet privat life in securitie, than to have bin so overcharged, not so much for doubt of the enuy then arifing, as for fear of some great danger therof to ensue. But L would he, would he not, remedy there was none, but that as the late emperor had appointed, so must be take the charge vpon him. And now was every one, as well the nobility as the inferior fort, again with greater folemnity than before, the third time sworne, to their vtmost power to defend the yong emperor in his empire, and MuZalo in the tuition of him, and administration of the affairs of state, and faithfully to yeeld vnto them both all due honour and obedience: which if they should fail religiously to perform, they wished to themselves every man, and to all theirs, a shamefull end and destruction. Yet notwithstanding all this solemn swearing, mixt most times with much forswearing, there was not fully 9 daies past, but that certain of the chief nobility, forgetfull or els carelesse of their Oath, and full of enuy, seldom satisfied but with bloud, conspired the vnworthy death of Muzalo the Protector both of the Emperor M and the Empire. The ninth day appointed for the funerall of the Emperor was now come; at which time were met together at Sosandra (an Abbey by himselse built in the honor of the Virgin Mary at Magnesia) many great Ladies and grave Matrons, to mourne as the manner was; all the great Princes of the Nobility, and among them the conspirators also: thither repaired also a number of foldiers prepared for the slaughter, with an infinit number of the common people, as at fuch folemnities is viuall. But what needs many words? whileft the Hymnswere yet in finging, and the obsequies performing the souldiers as before instructed. fuddenly breaking into the Church with their drawn fwords in their hands, flew MuZalo (then Muzalo traitefled to the altar for refuge) with his two brethren Andronicus & Theodorus, both men of great in the church. account, and divers others appointed for the flaughter. So the matrons & the rest of the multitude breaking off their mourning, and for fear thronging out one in anothers necke, fled as fast as they could, some one way, some another, as they thought for their best safety. But the Priests and Monks thinking to have done the like, were by the imperious fouldiers again inforced into the church, where tumbling one ouer another, as thronging in with great force B and violence, and scarse able to stand by reason of the slipperines of the bloud there shed vpon the pauement, they in great fear made an end of those bloudy obsequies. This outrage appealed, Arfenius the Patriarch and only Tutor of the yong Emperour now left, was therewith yet much troubled, as with a thing dangerous both to the person of the yong Prince, & peace of the state: but what good course to take therein he could not tell; for as hee was a man for his learning and integritie of life not inferior to the best, so in matters of state he was as far to feek. As it commonly hapneth, the contemplative man buried in his meditations, to be vnfit for temporall government: wheras he that should perform both, must to his rare vertues and great learning join a civill conversation, with great experience in worldly affairs, not to bee learned but by great and long practife. This reuerend father (of no great reach, yet wishing C all wel) calling together the nobility, confulted with them what were best to be done for the gouernment both of the yong Emperor and the empire, now that Muzalowas dead:not confidering in the mean time, who they were with whom he consulted, or, That counsel grounded vpon no wife forefight or approued experience, was more dangerous to him whom he would have provided for, than all the enemies murthering swords, as shortly after appeared.

Among others of the nobility called to counce! was Michael Paleologus (of whom we have loves additionable). before spoken) much superior to the rest, as descended from the Imperials house of the Comneni, a man of a cheerfull countenance, gratious and curteous, and withall exceeding bountifull and liberall, wherby he easily won the hearts of all men in generall, but especially of the Colenels, Captains, and other martial men commanders in the army: of whose aspiring to the empire, many presages and common rumors (not alwaies vain) had formerly passed also, to the mooning of many; yea the Patriark himfelfe, not confidering his hauty and aspiring nature, made no leffe account of him than did the rest, but voon an especial fauor, committed to his only trust the keys of the common treasure, at such time as mony was to be deliuered out for paiment of the armies, or other like great occasions of the state; the most effectual meanes for the furtherance of his secret practises, and the readiest way to effect that which hee had so long before plotted: for having in his fingring such a masse of treasure, as he might wel have wished, but neuer reasonably hoped for, he poured it out as it were by bushels, among the nobilitie and martial men, and such others as he thought were able to do most with the people; amongst whom were many of the Clergy also. Of which his fauorits were made many mee-E tings, and by them was the Patriarch continually solicited, but yet in general terms, without delay (according to the necessitie of the time) to take order for the good government of the state, which now as a great ship in the midst of the sea without a master, was (as they said) in danger to perish, and being once lost, was not again to be recoursed. At which time also the name of Paleologus was in every mans mouth, as the only man for his wifdom and experience fit to take vpon him the charge and government of the Empire vntil the yong Emperor were come to age. Vnto which common good liking the Patriarch also (seeing no more, or peraduenture not so much as the rest) gaue his consent; and so without longer stay, to the great content both of the nobilitie and people in generall, made him Gouernor of the empire, and Tutor to the yong Emperor, wanting nothing now of an Emperor himselfe, more than the ti-F tle and Imperial ornaments. This was the first step whereby the aspiring man (twice before in diffrace with the two late Emperors, John Ducas and his fon Theodorus) mounted at last to the Empire.

It was not many days after but that his fauorits held another councel, wherein it was alledged, That it was not feemly for him that was Tutor vnto the Emperour, Gouernor of the state L 2 and empire, and to give audience vnto the Embassadors of forrein Nations, to want the honour next vnto the Emperor, as well for the magnificence of the state, as for the credit of his place. Whereupon he was both by the Patriarch and the yong Emperor honored with the title of the Defpot, another step vnto the Empire. But what contentment find the Ambirious even in the greatest honours, so long as there is one above them ? Little fure, or none at 111, more than that it ferueth them to step at next vnto the highest : as did this new made Despot, who was shortly after by certain of the Nobility his great Fauour its, neere vnto Magnefia, with the great applause of the people, hoised up and saluted Emperor. Whereof Arismust be Patriarch hearing, was therewith much troubled, as fearing what would become of the youg childe the right heir of the Empire. And first he was about to have excommunicated as well him that was made Emperor, as them that had fo made him. But afterward changing his purpose, for fear of greater troubles, he thought it better, by solemne Oath to binde both him and the rest, that they should not seek after the life of the Child, or by any force or colour go about to depriue him of the Empire; which was fo done. Yet it was not a ful moneth after, but that even he that had so great a care of the yong child, and so provided for his Michael Valto, fafety, (perfuaded by them of the Nobility and Clergy) with his own hands, and all the acemperor by Ar. customed ceremonies, set the Imperiall Crown vpon this V surpers head, yet not as vpon him entire that should still enjoy the empire, but as voon a man according to the present necessity of the time and flate, thought fittest for fo great a charge vntill the yong Child came to age; vnto whom then he was to give place and refigne the empire. All which being by more solemne oath than before confirmed, good news (as the certain fign of his fortunat gouernment) were brought vnto him, of a great victory obtained by his captains against Michael Angelus despot of Ætolia and Epirus; who having maried the late Emperors daughter, and hearing of his death, with the troubles in Asia, aided by the King of Sicily and the Prince of Peloponesus and Achaia his fon in law, had thought in that hurly and perturbation of the state, to have taken to himselse the greatest part of the Emperors Territories in Macedonia and Thracia; and for the same purpose was with a great Army entred into them, burning and spoiling the country before him : wherof Michael Paleologus (then but newly made Despot) understanding, fent his brother Iohn with some other his best captains, with a great army against him, by whom he with his Complices were put to the worfe, and not without great loffe inforced to retyre: the joyfull newes whereof he received even as he was crowned. Which was shortly K after confirmed by the comming of the great Commanders themselves, bringing with them the Prince of Peloponesus and Achaia, by them taken prisoner; who for his ransome was afterwards glad to giue vnto the Emperor Paleologus, Monembasia, Main, and Sparta, three of the best cities of Peloponesus: whereinto he put strong garisons under the command of Conflantinus his brother by the mothers fide, a right valiant captain : by whose good seruice, and the commodious scituation of the places, hee gained divers other townes and Ciries, and at length the greatest part of Peloponesus, out of the hands of the Latines. For the vtter rooting out of whom, he shortly after with a great army passed ouer into Thracia, with purpose (as was thought) to have besieged Constantinople; but finding it to be a matter of more difficultie than was before supposed, he left that, and laid siege to the castle of Pera ouer against L it on the other side of the hauen, in hope by winning of that castle to haue become master alfoof the towne; where he was notably repulsed, and inforced with losse to retyre. So rising with his army, he fortified divers castles and strong holds in the country about Constantino. ple, and putting into them strong garrifons, charged them with continual incursions, to trouble the Constantinopolitans, and to cut them so short (if it were possible) as that they should not dare to look out at the gates of their city. Which they fo well performed, that in short time the Latines in the city were driven to such extremity, that for want of wood they were fain to burn many of the fairest houses in the city, in stead of fuel. Which done, he returned again to Nice, the chief feat of the Greeke Emperors euer fince that Constantinople was ta-

Now reigned in Constantinople the Latine Emperor Baldwin the second (as is before deelared) a man of smal courage and lesse power, and therefore not much regarded either of the Greeks or Latines: who for the maintenance of his state was glad to sell the publique Ornaments of the City, and to pawn his fon vnto the Bruges merchants for money; by whom he was left at Venice to be brought vo twhich gaue occasion for some writers to report, That he was pawned unto the Venetians. About this time Mange the great Cham of Tartary, stirred by Aitonian the Armenian King, 1260 (by whose persuasion he had also received the Christian Religion) sent his brother Haden Hades the Tarwith an exceeding great Army against the Turks and Sarasins in Syria and the land of Pale-tarsent with an exceeding great Army against the Turks and Sarasins in Syria and the land of Pale-tarsent of the Chailling State Army and Sarasins in Syria and the land of Pale-tarsent of the Sarasins in Syria and the land of Pale-tarsent of the Sarasins in Syria and the land of Pale-tarsent of the Sarasins in Syria and the land of Pale-tarsent of the Sarasins in Syria and the land of Pale-tarsent of the Sarasins in Syria and the land of Pale-tarsent of the Sarasins in Syria and the land of Pale-tarsent of the Sarasins in Syria and the land of Pale-tarsent of the Sarasins in Syria and the land of Pale-tarsent of the Sarasins in Syria and the land of Pale-tarsent of the Sarasins in Syria and the land of Pale-tarsent of the Sarasins in Syria and the land of Pale-tarsent of the Sarasins in Syria and the land of Pale-tarsent of the Sarasins in Syria and the land of Pale-tarsent of the Sarasins in Syria and the land of Pale-tarsent of the Sarasins in Syria and the land of Pale-tarsent of the Sarasins in Syria and the land of Pale-tarsent of the Sarasins in Syria and the land of Pale-tarsent of the Sarasins in Syria and the land of Pale-tarsent of the Sarasins in Syria and stine. This Hadlon (converted also to the Christian faith by his wife) setting forward with a gainst the world of people following him, in the space of six moneths ouer ran all Persia with the countries adjoyning, excepting one ftrong place in the mountains (which some say was Samarchand, afterward the royal feat of the great terror of the world, the mighty Tamerlane) which besieged by ten thousand horsemen by him appointed for that purpose, and so continued by the space of seven and twenty years after, was then at length (as Aiten himselfe writeth) yeelded by the defendants, only for want of cloaths to couer their nakednesse. Haalon (in whose Army those ten thousand lost behind were not missing) marching on, and as a violent tempest bearing all down before him) entred at length into Affyria, and there layd fiege to the great city of Babylon, then the Seat of the great Calyph; whom all the Mahometane Princes honoured aboue all others, as the true successor of their great Prophet Mahamet, and receiued from his mouth the interpretation of their Law as most divine Oracles. Which great City Haalon won, and putting to fword at he found therin, men, women and children, with the spoil therof and the rich treasures of the Calyph inriched his foldiers. The Caliph himselse (referued for that purpose) he commanded to be set in the midst of the infinite Treasure which he and his predecessors had most conetously heaped up together, and that hee should of that gold, filuer, and pretious stones, take what it pleased him to eat; saying by way of derision, that so gainfull a guest should be sed with nothing but things of greatest price, whereof hee willed him to make no spare. In which order the couetous wretch kept for certain dayes, miferably died with hunger in the middest of those things whereof he thought he should never haue had enough : which though they were in value great, and with care layd together, yet served they him not now to suffice nature, best contented with a little. Babylon thus facked and almost rased, the Tartar marching on thorow Mesopotamia, took the City Rhoais: where ditin the Armenian King, and author of this the Tartars expedition, came to him with twe lue thousand horsemen and forty thousand foot, as reporteth Aiten the Armenian Kings Nephew then there present. So entring into Syria, he in few dayes took Aleppo, which Alappo vised Towns hee facked and rafed, in the yeare of our Lord 1260 : with divers other firing towns by the Tariar. sometime belonging unto the kingdom of Antioch. Then was one Malacnefar Sultan of Damasco, commanding over all Syria and the land of Palestine who terrified with the losse of his Cities, and the feare of further danger, with his wife and children came and humbled himselse before the Tartar Prince, in hope so to have faued to himselse some good part of his Kingdom:wherin he was much deceived, being (as some say) caried away afar off into exile, because he should not hinder the Tartars further proceedings. Or as others report (and haply with more probabilitie) being by him detained as his prisoner, and afterwards to the terror of his fon, cut in pieces in his fight under the walls of Damasco, after that it had in vaine bin twice affaulted by the Tartars. Which strong City for all that, hee afterwards tooke by namelto went strong hand, and sacked it, and by the persuasion of his Wise, ouesthrew all the Mahometan Temples, as he had before done in every place where he came. But purposing to have gon on forward to Ierufalem, and to have conquered the whole land of Paleftine, newes was brought him of the death of his brother Mango the great Cham. Whermpon he stayd his journy, and fix years. Thus by the Tartars was the Kingdom of the Turks at Damasco ouerthrown. At which time the broken affairs of the Christians in Syria and the land of Palestine might easily haue bin repaired, and those two goodly kingdomes againe restored vnto the Christian Commonwealth, had the Christian Princes of the West then in time put to their helping hand on the one fide, as did the Tartarson the other. But they then at fatall discord among themselvies, and busied with their Wardat home, teo flip that so fair an opportunity, the like wherof they feldom or neger had fince. Haalon the Tartar Prince, in token of his good will towards the Christians and their affairs; at his departure from Damasco lest his some Abiga there with

city: and further commanded, that his name for one year next following, in all folemn pray. 6 ers and hymns of thanking juing, should be joined with the name of the emperor himself. And vernot thinking to have done him honour enough, caused his lively image afterward to be most curiously made, & as a trophy to be set vpon a fair marble pillar before the great church of the holy Apostles, in perpetual remembrance of him and that he had don for the deliner ry of his Country; which thortly after ouerthrown by an earthquake, was by his fon againe

Now was this great and famous city, somtime the beauty of the world, by these strange and fatall mutations wonderfully defaced, and brought to great defolation. In every place was to be feen great heaps, or rather (to fay the truth) great hills of rubbish, the eternal witnesses of the ruin therof: the houses stood, some quite fallen down, some ready to follow after, & some H other great and stately buildings now the small reliques of great fires: for the chiefe beauty therol was before, at fuch time as the Latins took it, most defaced with fire who all the time they had it ceased not night and day to destroy some part or other of it, as if they had known they thould not long keep it. Neither did this last fire, raised by the Greeks themselves to ter. rifie the Latins, a little deform it: for which cause the Emperors chief care now was to clense the city, in best fort he could to reform fo great a confusion of things, not to be all at once a. mended: first beginning with the Churches, which ruinous or ready to fall he repaired; and next to that, filled the empty houses with new inhabitants. And albeit the chiefe of the La. tines were together with the emperor fled and gon, yet was the most part of the artificers and tradesmen in the city, Venetians and them of Pisa mingled together; vnto whom also to join 1 the Genoa's, and so to fill the city with Latines, he thought it not altogether safe, although that by them he reaped great profit: wherfore he affigued to them the city of Galatia, now called Pera, on the other fide of the hauen, for them to inhabit, granting them great priviledges, and enery of those companies to be gouerned by a Consul or potestate of their own. As for the Imperial city it felfe, he stored it as neer as he could with natural Greeks born.

Now although all things went as Paleologus the Emperor could himselfe have wished, yet could he not relt fo contented, for fear lest those which now did eat their own hearts, and with great griefe smouldred their anger, should at length as the rightfull heires of the Empire by him vsurped, break out into open force, and so breed him great troubles, yea and perhaps work his confusion. For such is the tormenting state of vsurping Tyrants, neuer to thinke them- K felues fafe fo long as any one liueth whom they may suspect. Wherfore at once to rid himselfe of this seare, he thought it best so to dispose of the children of the late Emperour Theoderns Lascaris, as that he should not need of them to stand in doubt. To take them out of the way, be fides that it was a thing odious, he faw it likewife to be vnto him dangerous; Mary and Theodora (two of the eldest daughters) being before by their father maried to two great Princes (the Despot of Epirus and the Prince of Bulgaria) with whom he had before much to do, and of them yet flood in some doubt; but these were safe enough out of his reach. Other two yonger fifters there were in his cuftody, Theodora and Irene, with their brother Iohn, the onely heir of the Empire: Theodora he maried to one Belicurt a gentleman of Peloponesus; and Irene to one l'igintimilio of Genoa: both Latines, men of no great birth or power, such as he needed L not to stand in doubt of. These two Ladies, the daughters of so great an Emperour as was Theodor, thus basely bestowed there remained only their brother Iohn sole heir of the empire, then but ten years old, whom Palcologus long before, euen in the beginning of his reigne, had fent vnto Magnesia, there to be safely kept far off from the court, for fear lest in his right and quarrell some discontented persons desirous of innovation, should now begin some new stirs which might bee dangerous vnto his estate. Which indignitie done vnto the yong Prince, Arsenius the Patriarch (put in trust by his father for the bringing of him vp) took in so cuil part, that he forfook the Court with all his Ecclefiasticall dignity, and as a man weary of the world, retyred himselfe vnto a little Monastery of Pascasins in the country, there to spend the remainder of his dayes. From whence for all that, he was after the taking of Constantinople M from the Latines, almost against his will drawn thither by Paleologus the Emperor, and made Patriarch therof, there together with fo great an honour to find his greater discontent. For Palcologue the Viurper, altogether vimindfull of his faith fo folemnly before given for the fafety and preferuation of the yong Prince, and the restoring vnto him of his Empire; and now fully resoluted to establish to him and his posteritie the sourcaignty of so great an Em-Paleologies canpire, how societ it was got, caused the yong Princes eyes most cruelly to be pur out: the viual Emperories so practile of the Tyrants of the East vpon such as they are loth or feare to kill, and yet would be put out. make them vnfit for gouernment. Of which barbarous cruelty his fifter Theodora (maried to Constantinus Prince of Bulgaria) hearing, ceased not with tears and prayers, and all other Womanly perfuafions, to stir vp her husband in reuenge thereof. Whereunto also Inthatines the Turks Sultan gaue no finall furtherance; who weary of exile, and to be fo into a corner confined as into a prison from whence he might not start; by secret messengers intreated the Bulgarian Prince to make war vpon the viurping Emperor: promiting him a great fum of mony, if by his help he might recour his former libertie. Wherwith he the rather moued, with a great power of his own, and aboue twenty thousand Tartars which then lay by the riner Ister. fuddenly brake into the Emperours territories, and in shorter time than was to have beene thought, ouer ran all the Countrey of Thracia, euen vnto the fea fide, leaving neither man nor beaft in all the Countrey as hee went : in good hope also to have by the way surprised the Emperor himselfe, even then returning from his Wars against the Despot in Thessaly. Who hearing of his freedy comming, beeing govento the fea fide, and having no way left to have escaped by land) (hipped himselse into a Galley of the Latines, which with another her confort bound for Constantinople, by good hap put in there for to water, and so within two days after arrived in sasety at the Imperiall City. Thus disappointed of the Emperour, all his care was for the deliuery of the Turks Sultan. Wherfore marching in halt to Ænum, he fo terrified the Citisens with his comming, that they without further delay deliuered him into his hands, that they might therby redeem their owne peace. In his returne you might haue feen the Souldiers, especially the Tartars, driving before them infinit numbers both of men and Cattel, in such sort as that in the open Countrey of Thrace for a space was hardly to bee seen either Countryman or beast, it was so clean swept both of inhabitants and likewise of Lathatines the Sultan by the Tartars caried ouer Ister, and so by them set at liberty, shortly Jathatines di-

the Turks themselues report) the one called Mesot, the son of Kei-Cubades, and the other Kei-Cubades the fon of Ferancine, born also of the Sel Quecian Family, as were all the other Turks Sultans; but how neer in bloud they were vnto the late Sultan Lathatines they make no mention. Betwixt which two as his Vassals, Gazan the great Tartar Chan (bywhom they were so preserred) for the paiment of a yearly tribute divided the Turks Kingdom; apportioning vnto Mefoot the Cities of Amida, in antient time called Amifus, and Aminfus, in Galatia; Melatia, otherwise called Meletine, in the lesser Armenia; Siuaste, in antient time Sebastia, and Harbarie, before Satabria, both in Cappadocia, with all the Countrey about them. And vnto Kei-Cubades, Iconium the antient feat of the Turkish Sultans, with all Rumilia Assatica, or the Countries of the lesser Asia alongst the sea Coast: Which these two Princes held as the Tartars Tributaries, as had the late Sultan Iathatines before them, vntill fuch time as he was by the same Tartars again expulsed. So that the Turks kingdom, which E had of long time formerly flourished in the SelZuccian Family, in Persia, Syria, Palestine, and Ægypt, were quite ouerthrown by the Mamalukes and the Tartars (as is before declared) and now brought under foot in the leffer Afia likewife, where only refled all the hope of that Nation, was now at a low cbbe, divided betwixt two weak Princes reigning but at the devotion of the Tartar Chan. In which confusion of the Turkish Empire, so rent, not only diucis men of great power and authority mongst them, shared vnto themselnes, some one corner of the declining kingdome, and some another; but many of the obscure and basest people also, bearing with them nothing but their bowes and arrowes, tooke the strait passages of the mountaines, and from thence with their dayly incursions, did much harme in the countries of the Christians joyning voon them: which was no great matter for them to doe, the garrifons which were wont to defend the same, beeing for want of pay quite disbanded, and the Castles vpon the frontiers by them abandoned; which at the first, as a thing of small importance neglected, was at length vnto the Greekes a great cause of the ruine and decay of the greatest part of their estate in Asia. These mischieses vnregarded, grew dayly more and more, the Turks still gaining upon the Greekes what they lost vinto the Tartars. Whose after died. In whose kingdom succeeded not his son Melick (as some write) but two others (as "the inuations (the glory of the kingdom only excepted) was not fo hurtfull to them, as the cause G of their much greater felicitie afterwards. At length it fortuned that a great power of these aduenturous Turks meeting together in Paphlagonia, were about to have invaded the territorics of the Christians; against whom Michael Paleologus the Emperor fent out a strong and puissant army to stay their further comming on, lest breaking in that way, they should without refiftance at their pleafure forrage the country before them. Which army conducted by vuskilful captains, incountring with the Turks, was by them in a great battel ouerthrown and etterly defeated, few or none of all that great multitude escaping for whilst the Greeks vnad. uifedly purfued the Turks, retyring of purpose before them, they were by them drawne into the danger of a great power lying in ambush for them, and so intrapped, were slain with an exceeding great flaughter. After which fo great a victory (the beginning of the mifery of the H Christians in the lesser Asia) the Turks without let or stay ouer ran all the country vnto the river Sangarius, upon the banks wherof the Greek Emperor was glad to fortifie divers towns and forts to keep them out of Bithynia. Neuerthelesse they in short time after subdued all the countries from Pontus and Galatia, vnto the Lycian and Carian sea, and the river Eurymedon, which they divided among them into divers Toparchies; little or nothing acknowledging the fourraigntic either of Mefoot or Kei-Cubades.

Whilst the Turks in the lesser Asia thus win from the Christians on the one side, and lose to the Tartars on the other, many an hard conflict in the mean time passed betwixt the Æ. gyptian Sultans with their Mamalukes, and the Tartars, for the fourrainty of Syria: the poor remainder of the Christians all that while there in doubt both of the one and the other; from I whom and from the Armenians (then also much insested with the Mamalukes) divers Embaffedors were fent unto the Pope and the Christian Princes of the West, to craue their ayd and help in that their hard estate. Whose prayers little prevailing with the rest, yet so mooued Lewis the French king, and Henry the third then reigning in England, that they both promised them aid. Whereupon Lewis a man of great deuotion, and alwaics forward in that sernice against the Insidels, took voon him the Crosse, the cognisance of the sacred War; caufing his three fons, Philip that succeeded him in the kingdome, (syrnamed the Faire) Peter County of Alanson and tohn County of Nevers, syrnamed Triftan (for that his mother was in her greatest heavinesse for the taking of her husband, delivered of him in Egypt) and most of the Nobilitie of France to do the like. Vnto whom also Theobald King of Navar his K fon in Law, Alphonfus his brother, and Guido Earl of Flanders, joined them felues. And fo hauting put all things in readine see, took his way to Marseilles, and from thence embarking himselse withhis Army in the Genoa ships hired for that purpose, set forward the first day of 1 2.70 March, in the year 1270. But being at sea, he was by force of weather constrained to land, in Carthage befi. Sardinia, and there to stay a while. Departing thence, he at length arrived at Carthage, the gedby him desired: where in the entrance of the hauen he surprised certain of the Enemies thips; but landing his men, and affaulting the town, he was notably repulsed. This is not that antient, great, and famous City, which fomtime stroug with the proud Mistres of the World for soueraigntie, but another built long after in the ruines, or at least not far from the ruines of the fame. In the besieging wherof the Frenchmen found such resistance, as wel put them L in remembrance of the antient glory of the Carthaginians. One day it hapned as the king lay thus at the fiege, that the defendants made a great and fierce fally out vpon the Frenchmen; who before commanded fo to doe, by little and little retyred, to draw their enemies further on. Betwixtwhom and the City the Constable with a great power comming and charging them behinde, and they which were before retyred, now flanding close vnto them, they were on both fides hardly befet; who for all that, as became valiant men, worthily defended themselucs, and made there a great fight, though not without extream perill. Which they in the City beholding, gaue out a most hideous and pittious cry, a certaine signe of their hard estate within; astonying with the suddennesse thereof both their friends and enemies. But whilest they of the Towne betwirt hope and despair stood thus beholding the fight at land, M the French men by sea affaulting a Bulwarke on that side of the Towne, tooke it without resistance. Which so dismayed them without, that they forthwith began to flie; of whom the greatest part easting away their weapons, were by the Kings commandment receiued vnto mercy. And they likewise of the Town vpon promise of their liues, yeelded the fame vnto the King. Carthage thus won, the King layd fiege vnto Tunes, the chiefe City of that Kingdom, being not far off. Where by the way he was encountred by the King of that Countrey, who having there loft ten thousand of his Moores, betook himselfe to flight with the rest. Who thus ouerthrowne, resolued no more to tempt fortune, but to keepe himselse fase within the walls of his city, if happely so he might (as it oftentimes falleth out) more weaken his enemies by lying still and protracting the time, than by open force and valour. Which their purpose King Lews perceining, resolued not to stir from thence untill that hee were become mafter of the City, which as it feemed could not hold out for want of victuals, confidering the multitude of people that were got into it. Neuerthelesse thus besieged both by fea and land, and fo streitly hemmed in on every fide, as that no reliefe could possibly bee brought ento it, yet held it out by the space of fix moneths. After which time, wants dayly more and more encreasing amongst the besieged, Embassadors were sent out to the King, to intreat with him of peace. But whilest these Embassadors go to and fro, and reason upon the capitulations of the defired peace, behold, a great and furious plague arose in the French Camp, which began to cut them down by heaps: There died Iohn Triftan County of Nevers. the Kings yongest sonne, born in the first expedition that the faid King his father made into the Holy land, even at fuch time as he was taken prisoner; which Triffan died the twenty fift day of August, in the year of our Lord 12 70. The good King having scarsely performed the obsequies of his son, fell sick of the bloudy flix, whereof he there shortly after died also. About which time arrived there Charles King of Sicilie, the French Kings brother, with a great number of fresh soldiers; whose comming somwhat lightned the Frenchmens hearts (heauy for the death of their King) and daunted the Moores, before brag of the same. Shortly after whom arrived therealfo Prince Edward, King Henry the third his eldest fon; who travelling thorow France, and taking (hipping at Aquesmort, not far from Marseilles, was now in ten dayes with a braue company of English men come to Tunes; and there of the other Christian Princes, namely of Philip the French King (his father Lewis being now dead) of Charles King of Sicilie, and of the two Kings of Navar and Arragon, joyfully received. But these princes had a little before his arrivall concluded a peace with the Moores King and the Infidels, vpon condition that he should pay a yearly tribute of forty thousand Crownes vnto the King of Sicilie, and to suffer the Christian Religion to bee freely preached within his Dominions, by fuch deuout persons as should be there left for that purpose : and that vnto such as should by their preaching be converted vnto the Faith in Christ lesus, it should be lawful for them to be baptised, and to professe the Christian Religion.

Of which Peace Prince Edward understanding, did what he might to have diffuaded them from the same, saying, That the War was by them all taken in hand against the Infidels, as enemies vnto the Croffe of Christ (with whom they were not to haue peace) and for the recouery of the Holy City. But fay what he would, and do what he could, the peace to his great discontentment was now concluded, which they might not (as they said) again break. And therupon with the first fair wind hoised sail and returned towards Sicilie, with purpose the next Spring to haue gon into Syria. Which their determination was shortly after by the E hand of God disappointed: for beeing come vpon the Coast of the Island not far from Drepanum, most of the great Princes and other Nobilitie in their long boats went on land, the rest of the Fleet lying at Anker about a league off; for that being for the most part ships of The Christian great burthen, they were notable to put into the Harbor. But as they fo lay, by force of a vio. Princes cour nine from the lent and sudden Tempest then arising, some were eaten up with the rough sea; some falling nei, suffer shape foule one of another, there perished together; others driven vpon the Main, were there bea- wake vpon ten in pieces. So that of that great Fleet, before the storme ceased, perished about an hun. Stelly, dred and twenty fail, with all the people as well mariners as fouldiers left in them, and great store of Armour and munition. In such fort that most of the common Souldiers and Mariners which had escaped the Plague at Tunes, there vpon the Coast of Sicilie perished by F shipwrack. Only Prince Edwards fleet, beeing in number but thirteene thips, escaped free without losse either of ship or man. Neither were they that were got to land at Drepanum in much better case, the plague still following them; wherof died Theobald King of Navar. and Isabel his wife, King Lewis his daughter, Elizabeth the French queen, with a maruelous number of Noble Gentlemen and other common Soldiers; in fuch fort, that Philip the French King discouraged discouraged with the greatnes of the mortalitie, and the miserable losse at sea, resolved there G to make an end of the intended war, and fo returned into France, as did the rest that were less. 1 2 7 1 cuery man into his own country. Only Prince Edward having passed that Winter in Sicilie timest diseased with the first of the next Spring set forward again on his voyage, and in 15 dayes ariued with his fleet at Ptolemais: where after he had by the space of a month rested himself and his sol. diers after their long travel, and fully inquiring of the state of the country, he with fix or seven thousand soldiers marching from Ptolemais about twenty miles into the land, took Nazareth.and out to sword all them he found therein, and so again returned. After whom the enemies following, in hope to haue taken him at fome aduantage, he vnderstanding thereof, turned back upon them, and killing a great number of them, put the rest to flight. And after that about Midfummer, understanding that the Sarafins were again making head at a place called H Cakhow, about forty miles off, he fet forwards toward them, and comming upon them early in the morning before they were aware, flew aboue a thousand of them, and dispersed the rest. Aided also by the Nobilitie of Cyprus, he with like successe as before, made a third expedition against the Turks and Infidels : infomuch that his fame began to grow great amongst them, and they to stand of him in no little dread. But whilst he thus prevailed, he was by foul treacherie almost taken out of the way. The Admirall of Ioppa feigning himselfe desirous to become a Christian, and willing to further the princes proceedings, had by a secret messenger and letters fundry times intelligence with him, as well concerning his own good entertainment, as the effecting of that which hee had promised. This messenger by the Admirall thus employed, was (though to the Prince vnknown) one of the Affalines, a company of most I desperat and dangerous men amongst the Mahometans, who strongly deluded with the blind zeal of their superstition, and counting it meritorious, by any meanes to kill any great enemy of their Religion; for the performance therof, as men prodigall of their liues, desperately aduenture themselues vnto all kinds of dangers. So now this messenger being resolued to die, comming the fift time vnto the Prince, and being fearched for having any weapon about him (as the manner was) had accesse vnto him, then lying in his chamber vpon his bed, in his jerkin bare headed, because of the heate of the weather. Where after due reuerence done, hee pulled out certain letters from his Lord to the Prince, which hee read with great delight, as penned of purpose for to please. But as hee was further questioning with him of many matters, and all the company voided, the desperat messenger making as though hee would have K pulled out some other seeret letters, suddenly pluckt out an invenomed knife which hee had Friett Edward fecretly hidden about him, thinking to have firuck him into the belly as he lay, for the avoiding of which stroke the Prince lifting up his arm, was therein grieuously wounded. But as the Villaine was about to haue doubled the stroke, the Prince with his foot gaue him such a blow that he felled him to the ground; and with that starting up, caught him by the hand, where in strugling with him for the knife, in wresting it out of his hand, hee hurt himselse therwith in the forhead: but getting it from him, presently thrust it into the murtherers belly and so slew him. The Princes servants being not far off, and hearing the bushling, came running in , where finding the messenger dead on the soor, one with a stool beat out his brains; wherat the Prince took some displeasure for so striking a dead man. This danger of the prin- L ces much troubled and grieued all the Christians in Syria; and the more, for that the wound in his arm, after it had bin certain daies well dreffed by the skilfull Surgeons and Physicians, began to mortifie and grow blacke, infomuch that they and others about him began to mutteramongst themselues, and to looke heavily vpon the matter, as not without great danger. Which Prince Edward perceiuing, sayd unto them, Why whisper ye thus amongst your felues? What fee you in me ? Can I not be healed ? Tell me the truth and feare not. Wherunto one of them answered, May it please your Highnesse, we doubt not of your healing, but that it will be painfull for you to suffer. If suffering (sayd hee) may again restore my health, I commit my selfe vnto you, worke on me your skill and spare not. So the next day they cut out all the dead and poisoned flesh that was in his arm, and within fifteene dayes M after perfectly cured his wound, to the great rejoicing of all his people. The great Sultan to cleere himselse of this so dishonorable a treacherie, sent three of his Noblemen unto the Prince, calling towitnesse his false Prophet Mahomet, That the same was done neither by him nor his consent. Which his Embassadours the Prince honourably vsed, but suffered them not to come nigh him. So having tarried eighteene moneths at Ptolemais, and no ayd comming from the other Christian Princes, as was expected, he tooke shipping, and returning homeward, landed first in Sicilia, and from thence crossing ouer into Apulia, and so trauelling to Rome, was there honourably entertained by Gregory the tenth, then Pope; and from thence by the way of France arrived in England, where he was shortly after crowned King, in the yere 1272, his father the old King, Henry the third, being a little before his returne dead.

The yeare following, Gregory the tenth, not ignorant of the hard estate of the Christians in 1273 Syria, (as having there beene of late himselfe with Prince Edward, at which time he was in his Rodalph the 'absence elected Pope) and now desirous to procure them some reliefe, ratified the election of Empirous ta-Rodulphus of Hapspurge vnto the Empire; vpon condition, That he should promise to take keth upon him relief to the Crosse, and to give them reliefe; for the performance whereof he offered vpon himselte the Crosse, and to give them reliefe: for the performance whereof he offered vnto the Emperour two hundred thousand crownes, with the tenths both of the Clergie and Temporaltie for fix yeres: and many goodly bleffings were in his name also, by the preachers of that time, promised vnto all such as should with him take upon them that sacred warre. Whereupon the Emperour with all his family tooke vpon them the Crosse, the signe of the facred expedition intended: as did alfo the Duke of Lorraine shortly after, with some others. Neuerthelesse the Emperour, otherwise busied in warres against the Bohemians and Bauarians, and delaying still the time, as not greatly willing to take vpon him so long and dangerous a journey, and the Pope still threatning his high sentence of excommunication, the time pasfed, the Pope died, and nothing was as yet done. Untill that at length the Emperour having happily finished his warres in Bohemia, and finding himselse at some good leisure in some part to discharge his vow, and to satisfie the expectation the world had of long conceived of him, sent Henry Prince of Megapolis, or as the Germanes call it, Meckelbourg, with a strong power into Syria, to performe what himselfe had promised. Who comming to Ptolemais, made many notable incursions into the country about Damasco, with fire and sword destroying all before him as he went, and carrying thence many great and rich booties; vntill that at length he was by the Mamalukes circumuented and taken prifoner, and fo carried vnto the Hemrithe printe Sultan at Caire, where heremained in strait prison six and twenty yeares after; untill that by taken prisons, chance one of the Mamalukes (a renegate Germane) being chosen Sultan, caused him to be brought before him, and at his comming demanded of him, If it would not do him good to celebrate the remembrance of the nativity of his Christ with his friends in Germany ? (for now that time of the yerewas at hand) And I know (said the Sultan) that thou art so addicted vnto thy superstition, that thou respectes the same more than thy liberty. Truth (said Henry) mighty Prince; for liberty would availe me nothing, if Christ by his most mild incarnation had not taken away our captiluity: and therefore how much all men owe vnto the reuerend remembrance thereof, I would to God thou, ô King, didft alfounderstand; which as I most heartily wish, so I would I could thereof persuade thee. God forbid (said the Sultan) for I re-

left that common error, haue therewith also changed my private fortune. But as for thy Religion I have nothing to fay, my talke is onely concerning thy liberty: Wouldest thou therefore gladly be free, and so returne home to thy friends? That, Nature craueth (said Henry) although my fortune gaine ayeth, which yet dependeth of your pleasure: I desire indeed to returne home, which if you should deny me, I must as I have done, take it in good part; affuring my selfe, that my wife Anastasia, with my beloued sons, Henry, Leo, and Iohn, have long since celebrated my funerals, and ended their mourning. Thou art deceived (faid the Sultan) for I am member that when as I was a chiefe enginer vnto thy father at Knese-Fenicke in Liuonia, and there did him good feruice, I was altogether of the Christian persuasion; but now having fure that they know thou yet liuest, and pray most heartily for thy returne. Truly I owe much unto the remembrance of thy father, and therefore this day gitte thee thy liberty. And hauing fo faid, furnished him with all things necessary, and gave him leave to depart with one Martin his feruant, who taken with him, had borne him company all the long time of his captiuitie.

F Sotaking his leave of the Sultan, he came to Ptolemais: but shipping himselfe for Cyprus, he was by the way, by certaine Pyrats taken at sea, and as a fugitive Captive brought backe againe unto the Sultan: who pittying his hard fortune, fet him againe at liberty, and by a ship fet out for that purpose, transported him into Cyprus: where he was by the Queene of that Island his aunt (as some say) honourably entertained, and so furnished of all things fit for his estate. Departing thence he came to Marseilles, where after he had some few daies refreshed himselfe, he from thence trauelled by land home into his own Country: where at the first he was not knowne of his owne children and friends, as being growne old in prison, and by them long before accounted among the dead; but now at last found againe, and by them knowne he was of his children joyfully received as their father, and of his subjects as their Prince. Howbeit he shortly after died, and was honourably buried in the Monastery of Dobran.

Thus in the whole course of this History it appears, by that which is already written, what notable expeditions even the greatest Christian Princes of the West, to their immortal glory, from time to time undertooke against the enemies of Christ, and his most facred word, & for the reliese of the poore distressed Christians in Syria and in the land of Palestine: whereof as H divers of them had right glorious successe, vnto the great profit of the Christian Common. weale: 10 some of them answered not with like euent, as undertaken with too small strength. or otherwise ouerthrowne by the discord or malice of the Christians themselues, rather than by the enemies force. Which neuerthelesse, how unfortunatly soeuer they fel out in the hands of fuch worthy men as undertooke them, yet have they this glory, commendation, and comfort, That they were taken in hand for the honor of the Son of God, Christ Iesus, and the de. fence of his verity, against the salse Prophet Mahomet, and his most blasphemous doctrine; so honorable and just a quarrel as might well beseeme the greatnes of the greatest Prince, yea, of all the Princes of Christendome. Yet could not the worthines therof, euen in those more zealous times, or the dangerous estate of that part of the Christian commonweale, euen then like I to perish, (as some others be now) or the lamentable complaints of the poore oppressed Christians, crying out vnto their Christian brethren for aid, any whit moue the Christian Princes of that time, with their combined forces to reach vnto them their helping hands, or to yeeld vnto them any fuccor or reliefesfor they little feeling those harmes so far off, and more regarding their owne hereditary quarrels, employed those forces one against another, vnto the effusion of so much Christian bloud, as might have sufficed not for relief of the distressed Chris stians in Syria onely, but also to have regained whatsoever had beene before from them taken by the Turks or Sarafins. The German Princes were still at a jarre about the choice of their Emperors: the French agreed not with the English, or them of the Low-countries: neither the English with the Scots: the Arragonians were at odds with the French: and in Italy werealmost as many deadly factions as provinces. Of which discord of the Christians (the greatest occasion of their ruine and decay) Melechfares the Egyptian Sultan understanding by his espi-1289 als, raised a great army of the Mamalukes and others, with a full purpose to haue veterly rooted out all the remainders of the Christians in Syria and the land of Palestine, and so to have entirely joyned those two great countries vnto his owne kingdome. But what he had so mischieuously deuised, hee lived not to bring to passe, being in the midst of those his great defignes taken away by sudden death. A fter whom Alphix (or as some call him, Elpis) succeeding him in the kingdome, & with a puissant army entring into Syria, laid siege to Tripolis, which he at length tooke by vndermin ing of it, and put to fword all the Christians therein (except such as by speedy flight had intime got themselves out of the danger) & rased the city down 1 to the ground: which calamitie betided vnto the Christians the ninth of Aprill in the yeare 1289. Presently after, he had the strong castle of Nelesine yeelded vnto him, whereinto he put a strong garrison, to hinder the Christians from building again the late destroied city. In like manner also he took the cities of Sidon and Berythus, which he sacked, and laid them flat with the ground. And after that, he remoued to Tyre, which after three moneths strait siege, was by the Citizens (now out of all hope of reliefe) yeelded vnto him, vpon condition, That they might with bag and baggage in lafety depart. With like good fortune hee in good time, and as it were without refistance, tookeall the rest of the strong Townes and Castles which the Christians yet held in Syria and the land of Palestine, excepting onely the Citie of Ptolemais; whereunto all the poore Christians fled as unto a Sanctuarie, to be there M defended by the honourable Knights Templars and Hospitallers. Nothing now left vnto them more than that strong City, the Sultan of his owne accord made a peace with them for the space of fine yeares, searing (as was supposed) to have drawne vpon him all the Christian

Esplica Sal-

Siden and Re-

Princes of the West, if he should at once have then veterly rooted out all the Christians in those countries together. The Christians affaires thus brought to the last cast in Syria, and yet faintly as it were breathing, by the benefit of the last obtained peace; Peter Beluife master of the Templars, with the grand master of the Knights Hospitallers, suddenly passed ouer (as Embassadors from the rest) into Europe, vnto Nicholaus quartus then Pope, crauing his fatherly aid. Who moued with fo great miseries of the poore afflicted Christians, solicited the other Christian Princes to have fent them reliefe; especially Rodolph the German Emperour, who then busied with the affaires of the Empire, and his troubles neerer home, (as were the other Christian Princes also) gaue good words, but no helpe at all. Yet some of them under the colour thereof, got from their subjects great summes of money, which they employed to their other worse vies: onely the Pope sent fifteene hundred men at armes, whom with deuout persuasion, and much carnest preaching, he had induced to take vpon them that facred expedition, & entertained them of his owne charge: vnto whom also many others out of divers countries, vpon a religious zeale, joyned themselues as voluntary meny who meeting together at Brundusium, and there imbarked with the two grand masters of the Templars and Hospitallers, in safety at length arrived at Ptolemais. There was then in the City a great number of people of all forts: of the militable able men there was about fifty thousand, and about forty thousand of the weaker fort: a. about topprish. mongst whom, divers murders, felonies, rapes, and such other shamefull outrages, (all hasting the dreadfull judgements of God) were dayly committed, and let passe vnregarded, more than of them that were injured. For all the chief commanders were then at variance among themselues, euery one of them laying claime (not worth a rush) vnto the vain title of the kingdome of Ierusalem. Henry King of Cyprus comming thither with a great fleet, charged the Templars to deliuer him the Crowne of that kingdome, which they had (as he faid) wrongfully taken from Almericas and Gny his Ancestors. And Charles King of Sicilia by his Embassadors laid claime vnto the title of that Kingdome, as due vnto the Kings of that Island : and vnderstanding it to be given vnto Henry King of Cyprus, caused all the revenues of the Templars within his dominion, to be brought into his Treasuries, and their lands and houses to be spoyled, Haghalfo, Prince of Antioch, laboured with tooth and naile, to defend the ouerworne right that his father and grandfather had vnto that loft kingdome. And the County of Tripolis layd in for himselfe, that he was discended from Raymund of Tholous; and that befide himselse, remained no Prince of the antient Nobility, which had woon that Kingdome out of the hands of the Sarafins, and that therefore that regall dignity did not of better right appertaine vnto any other than vnto himselfe. Neither did these source Princes more striue for the title of the lost Kingdome, than for the present gouernment of the City, straightway about to perish. The Popes Legate pretending thereunto a right alfo, for that King Iohn Brenne had before subjected it vnto the See of Rome. As for the claime vnto the City of Ptolemais, the Patriarke of Ierusalem challenged vnto himselse the preheminence, for that the Metropoliticall city of Tyre (under which the City of Ptolemais was the third Episcopall Seat) was under his jurisdiction, euen by the Decree of the West Church. The Tem-E. plars also, and the Knights Hospitallers, whose power in the City was at that time farre the greatest, pretended the government thereof of best right to belong vnto them, as the just reward of their bloud, already and afterward to bee spent in the desence thereof: promising great matters if it might be wholly referred unto them. Neither spared the French King, or the King of England, by their messengers to claime the sourraigntic of the city, by their predecessors sometimes won. And they of Pila having still a Consult therein, and by often marriages with the natural linhabitants, grown into great affinity with them, did what they might to get the gouernement into their hands. The Venetians also by their authoritic and great wealth, laboured to gaine the good will of the people, sparing therein no cost. And they of Genoa, no leffe cunning than the reft, supplanted the strongest factions, by giving aid both appertly and covertly vnto the weaker; that so having weakned the saction they most doubted and hated, they might by the joynt fauour of the weaker, aspire vnto the gouernement of the fironger, and so consequently of the city it selfe. The Florentines also by their continuall traffique thither, were not out of hope, by one finenesse or other, among & so many competitors, Island his aunt (as some say) honourably entertained, and so surnished of all things fit for his estate. Departing thence he came to Marseilles, where after he had some few daies refreshed himselfe, he from thence travelled by land home into his own Country: where at the first he was not knowne of his owne children and friends, as being growne old in prison, and by them long before accounted among the dead; but now at last found againe, and by them knowne, he was of his children joyfully received as their father, and of his subjects as their Prince, Howbeit he shortly after died, and was honourably buried in the Monastery of Dobran.

Thus in the whole course of this History it appears, by that which is already written, what notable expeditions even the greatest Christian Princes of the West, to their immortal glory, from time to time vndertooke against the enemies of Christ, and his most facred word, & for the reliese of the poore distressed Christians in Syria and in the land of Palestine: whereof as H divers of them had right glorious successe, vnto the great profit of the Christian Common. weale; to some of them answered not with like euent, as undertaken with too small strength or otherwise ouerthrowne by the discord or malice of the Christians themselues, rather than by the enemies force. Which neuertheleffe, how unfortunatly foeuer they fel out in the hands of fuch worthy men as undertooke them, yet have they this glory, commendation, and comfort, That they were taken in hand for the honor of the Son of God, Christ Iesus, and the de. fence of his verity, against the salse Prophet Mahomet, and his most blasphemous do Ctrine: so honorable and just a quarrel as might well beseeme the greatnes of the greatest Prince, yea, of all the Princes of Christendome. Yet could not the worthines therof, euen in those more zealous times, or the dangerous estate of that part of the Christian commonweale, euen then like 1 to perish, (as some others be now) or the lamentable complaints of the poore oppressed Christians, crying out vnto their Christian brethren for aid, any whit moue the Christian Princes of that time, with their combined forces to reach vnto them their helping hands, or to yeeld vnto them any succor or reliefes for they little feeling those harmes so far off, and more regarding their owne hereditary quarrels, employed those forces one against another, vnto the effusion of so much Christian bloud, as might have sufficed not for relief of the distressed Chris stians in Syria onely, but also to have regained what source had beene before from them taken by the Turks or Sarafins. The German Princes were still at a jarre about the choice of their Emperors: the French agreed not with the English, or them of the Low-countries: neither the English with the Scots: the Arragonians were at odds with the French: and in Italy werealmost as many deadly factions as provinces. Of which discord of the Christians (the greatest occasion of their ruine and decay) Melechfares the Egyptian Sultan understanding by his espi-1289 als, raised a great army of the Mamalukes and others, with a full purpose to have veterly rooted out all the remainders of the Christians in Syria and the land of Palestine, and so to have entirely joyned those two great countries ento his owne kingdome. But what he had so mischieuously deuised, hee lived not to bring to passe, being in the midst of those his great defignes taken away by sudden death. After whom Alphix (or as some call him, Elpis) succeeding him in the kingdome, & with a puissant army entring into Syria, laid siege to Tripolis, which he at length tooke by undermining of it, and put to fword all the Christians therein (except fuch as by speedy flight had in time got themselves out of the danger) & rased the city down 1. to the ground: which calamitie betided vnto the Christians the ninth of Aprill in the yeare 1289. Presently after, he had the strong castle of Nelesine yeelded vnto him, whereinto he put a strong garrison, to hinder the Christians from building again the late destroied city. In like manner also he took the cities of Sidon and Berythus, which he sacked, and laid them flat with the ground. And after that, he remoued to Tyre, which after three moneths strait siege, was by the Citizens (now out of all hope of reliefe) yeelded vnto him, vpon condition, That they might with bag and baggage in fafety depart. With like good fortune hee in good time, and as it were without resistance, tooke all the rest of the strong Townes and Casties which the Christians yet held in Syria and the land of Palestine, excepting onely the Citie of Ptolemais; whereunto all the poore Christians fled as unto a Sanctuarie, to be there M defended by the honourable Knights Templars and Hospitallers. Nothing now left vnto them more than that strong City, the Sultan of his owne accord made a peace with them for the space of fine yeares, fearing (as was supposed) to have drawne vpon him all the Christian

Princes of the West, if he should at once have then veterly rooted out all the Christians in those countries together.

The Christians affaires thus brought to the last cast in Syria, and yet faintly as it were breathing, by the benefit of the last obtained peace; Peter Beluife master of the Templars, with the grand master of the Knights Hospitallers, suddenly passed ouer (as Embassadors from the rest) into Europe, vnto Nicholaus quartus then Pope, craving his fatherly aid. Who moved with fo great miseries of the poore afflicted Christians, solicited the other Christian Princes to haue fent them reliefe; especially Rodolph the German Emperour, who then busied with the affaires of the Empire, and his troubles neerer home, (as were the other Christian Princes also) gaue good words, but no helpe at all. Yet some of them under the colour thereof, got from their subjects great summes of money, which they employed to their other worse vies: onely the Pope sent fifteene hundred men at armes, whom with deuout persuasion, and much carnest preaching, he had induced to take vpon them that sacred expedition, & entertained them of his owne charge: vnto whom also many others out of diuers countries, vpon a religious zeale, joyned themsclues as voluntary men's who meeting together at Brundusium, and there imbarked with the two grand masters of the Templars and Hospitallers, in safety at length imbarked with the two grand matters of the Lempians and Holpitanicis, infantly at length after the milerable arrived at Ptolemais. There was then in the City a great number of people of all forts: of The milerable arrived at Ptolemais. able men there was about fifty thousand, and about forty thousand of the weaker fort: a. about 10 perifs mongst whom, divers murders felonies, rapes, and such other shamefull outrages, (all hasting the dreadfull judgements of God) were dayly committed, and let passe unregarded, more than of them that were injured. For all the chief commanders were then at variance among themselues, euery one of them laying claime (not worth a rush) vnto the vain title of the kingdome of Ierusalem. Henry King of Cyprus comming thither with a great fleet, charged the Templars to deliuer him the Crowne of that kingdome, which they had (as he faid) wrongfully taken from Almericus and Gny his Ancestors. And Charles King of Sicilia by his Embassadors laid claime vnto the title of that Kingdome, as due vnto the Kings of that Island : and vnderstanding it to be given vnto Henry King of Cyprus, caused all the revenues of the Templars within his dominion, to be brought into his Treasuries, and their lands and houses to be spoyled. Hagh also, Prince of Antioch, laboured with tooth and naile, to defend the ouerworne right that his father and grandfather had vnto that loft kingdome. And the County of Tripolis layd in for himselfe, that he was discended from Raymund of Tholous; and that beside himselse, remained no Prince of the antient Nobility, which had woon that Kingdome out of the hands of the Sarafins, and that therefore that regall dignity did not of better right appertaine vnto any other than vnto himselse. Neither did these source Princes more striue for the title of the lost Kingdome, than for the present gouernment of the City, straightway about to perish. The Popes Legate pretending thereunto a right also, for that King Iohn Brenne had before subjected it vinto the See of Rome. As for the claime vinto the City of Ptolemais, the Patriarke of Ierusalem challenged vnto himselse the preheminence, for that the Metropoliticall city of Tyre (under which the City of Ptolemais was the third Episcopall Seat) was under his jurisdiction, euen by the Decree of the West Church. The Templars also, and the Knights Hospitallers, whose power in the City was at that time farre the greatest, pretended the government thereof of best right to belong vnto them, as the just reward of their bloud, already and afterward to bee spent in the desence thereof: promising great marters if it might be wholly referred vnto them. Neither spared the French King, or the King of England, by their messengers to claime the sourraigntic of the city, by their predecessors sometimes won. And they of Pisa having still a Confull therein, and by often marriages with the naturall inhabitants, grown into great affinity with them, did what they might to get the gouernement into their hands. The Venetians also by their authoritie and great wealth, laboured to gaine the good will of the people, sparing therein no cost. And they of Genoa, no leffe cunning than the rest, supplanted the strongest factions, by giving aid both appertly and covertly vnto the weaker; that fo having weakned the faction they most doubted and hated, they might by the joynt fauour of the weaker, aspire vnto the gouetnement of the stronger, and so consequently of the city it selfe. The Florentines also by their continuall traffique thither, were not out of hope, by one fineneffe or other, among & fo many competitors,

Siden and ne-

to find a meane to step vp aboue the rest. But the greatest part of the people for all that were most inclined vnto the Armenians and Tartars, as both for their neernesse and power most like of all other to stand them in stead. All these aimed at one marke, which was, the gouernment and command of the City; and most of them had in the same their owne proper lawes and courts to decide their causes and controuersies in. Whereby it came to passe, that every man might without checke or controlement almost do what he list, the offendors from one course to another remouing their fuits as best served their turnes. Thus were murders (as is before faid) dayly committed in the freets, men abused, houses robbed, shops broken vp, and many other outrages done, to the hastning of the wrath of God, and griefe of all good men. Division and differtion (the ruine of all Common-weales) thus raigning in the City, the fouldiers of late fent thither, or in zeale come of themselues for the desence thereof, gaue u occasion for the more speedy destruction of the same: such is the power of the Almightie. in his wrath and judgements for finne, even by those things werein we most trust and joy, to worke our vtter ruine and destruction. These souldiers, for want of such pay as was promised them, were enforced to feeke abroad; and therefore contrary to the league before made with the Ægyptian Sultan, oftentimes went out in great parties vnto the frontiers of his territories, taking the spoile of such things as they light vpon. Whereof the Sultan vnderstanding, demanded by his Embassadors, That restitution might be made, and the offendors delivered vnto him to be punished, according vnto the League. But in that so sicke a state of a dvine Common weale, neither was restitution made, as reason would, or yet the Embassadors course teously heard. With which insolencie the Sultan prouoked, sent Emilech Araphus a notal I ble Captaine, (and as some say, his sonne) with an hundred and fifty thousand men, to be. fiege the City: who comming thither, and having made his approches, had by a mine in thort time ouerthrowne a piece of the wall; but in feeking to have entred by the breach, he found such strong resistance, that he was glad with losse to retyre. Whilest Araphus thus lay at the fiege of Ptolemais, Alphir the Sultandied at Damasco: in whose stead the Mamalukes made choice of this Araphus for their Sultan, who more desirous of nothing than of the glory of the veter rooting up of the Christians in Syria, was so farrefrom raising of his siege, (cither for the death of the Sultan, or the newes of his Kingdome) that he more straitly beset the city than he had in the three moneths space that he had there lien before. Now had they in the city chosen Peter the master of the Templars, their gouernor; a man of great expe- g rience and valour: vnto whom, and the rest of the nobilitie, the Sultan offered great rewards, and unto the foldiers their pay, with free liberty to depart, fo that they would without more adoe yeeld vnto him the city, which they could not long hold. Which his offer the master rejected, and flatly told him, that he had not learned of his ancestors, to sell for mony vito the Infidels a City bought with so much Christian bloud either did so much regard his vaine threats, as therefore to forget his seruice due unto his Sauior Christ and the Christian Commonweale. With which answer the tyrant inraged, the next day with all his forces assaulted the city, and that in such desperat and surious manner, as if he would even then have carried it; having before filled the ditches, and promifed the spoile vnto his fouldiers, the more to encourage them. Yet having done what he could, and lost a number of his men, flaine both in L the affault, and in a fally which the Christians made out at the same time, he was inforced to retyre backe againe into his trenches. In this fo terrible an affault, not repulfed without forme losse also of the Christians, the grand master and governour of the city was wounded with a poisoned dart, wherof he in three daies after died. With whom the courage of the Defendans fainted alfo, no man being left like vnro him to vndertake fo great a charge, although many there were, that ouerweening of themselves defired the same, In the beginning of this siege the Christians had sent away all their aged and weak people white for service; into Cyprus, where they in fafety arrived. But now many of the better fort both Captains and others discouraged, one after another conveyed themselves away out of the City. Of whom a great number in passing thence to Cyprus, were vpon the Coast of the Island together with the Patriarch drowned. In the City remained only twelve thousand, which were thought sufficient for the defence thereof. Who afterwards (as some report) fled also by sea after their Fellowes, and so left the City empty vnto the barbarous Enemie. Some others reporting of them more honorably, as that they should right valiantly defend the city against the asfault of their enemies, vnvill such time as that most of them being slaine or wounded, and the rest by force driven from the wals into the market place, and therefor a while notably defending themselues, in flying thence vnto the ships, were by the way all cut in funder, or els drowned. But how foeuer it was, the Sultan entring the city (by the Christians abandoned, or by force taken) gaue the spoile thereof vnto his fouldiers; who after they had rifled enery corner thereof, by his commandement fet it on fire and burnt it downe to the ground : and digging vp the very foundations of the wals, Churches, and other publike or private buildings, which the fire had not burnt, left there no figue of any city at all; but purging the place even of the very heapes of the stones and rubbidge left of the rased city, made it a fit place for husbandmen to plow and fow corne in which he did both there, at Sydon, Beritus, and other Townes along it the sea coast, because they should never more serve for a resuge vnto the Christians. or give them footing againe into those Countries. Thus together with Ptolemais was the name of the Christians etterly rooted out of Syria and the Land of Palestine, in the yeare 1221, about 192 yeares after the winning of Ierufalem by Godfrey of Buillon and the other

fons of the Templars or Knights Hospitalers, their subjects, so shamefully now quite cast out of Syria and the land of Promise; howbeit, troubled with their owne turbulent affaires at home or with their neighbour Princes not farre off, none of them once stirred for the redresse or reuenge thereof. Onely Cassanes the great Tartar Prince, having of late subdued the Persians, and married the daughter of the Armenian King (a Lady of great persection, and of a Mahometane became a Christian) at the request of his wife and his father in law, tooke the matter in hand. And for that purpose having raised a most puissant army of two hundred thousand fighting men, and ayded by the Armenians and Georgians, passing ouer the mountaine Amanus into Syria, not farre from the City Hama met with Melcenafer, the Ægyptian Sultans Lieutenant, with a mighty army, whom he ouerthrew in a great and mortall battell, wherin forty thousand of the Ægyptians are reported to have beene slaine, and so draue him quite out of Syria: fending Molais, one of his Captaines, with part of his Army to pursue him, who neuer left him vntill he had chased him ouer the desart sands into Agypt. The victorious Tartar after this battell tooke the City of Hama, where lighting vpon the great treasures of the Sultan, hee bountifully divided it, together with the spoile, amongst his souldiers; reserving nothing thereof vnto himselse, more than a sword and a casket full of secret letters. The Ægyptian thus put to slight, he without resistance tooke in most of the Cities of Syria, with the City of Ierusalem also, which in many places by terusalem tothe Turks and Ægyptians defaced, he againe repaired; and together with the Temple of our head and repaired Sauiour gaue it to the Armenians, Georgians, and other Christians, repairing thither out of Cyprus, Creet, and other places, to inhabit. And having himselfe honoured the holy places with great gifts, returned with his army to Damasco, which was forthwith delinered vnto him. But lying there, with purpose in Autumne following to have gone into Ægypt, and to hauevtterly destroied that kingdome, he was certified of new troubles arising in Persia, and fome other parts of his Empire: for repressing whereof, he with the greatest part of his Army returned himselse into Persia, leaving one Capeapus gouernour of Damasco; who after the ouerthrow of the Sultans Army had revolted vnto him; and Molais (of whom wee have before spoken) Gouernour of Ierusalem: commanding them at his departure to re-edific the City of Tyre, and to fend Embassadors vnto the Christian Princes of the West, to joyne in league with them, for the more fure holding of those new gained countries. And so Tyre was indeed repaired as he had commanded, and deliucred to the Christians, with a convenient garrison for the keeping thereof: but the Embassadors comming to the proud Bishop Boni-F face the eight, then Pope, whom of all others it beseemed to haue furthered their businesse, they could of him obtaine nothing, but returned as they came. For hee at the same time fallen out with Philip the French King, thundering out his excommunications, discharging his fubjects of their loyaltie, and so much as in him was, depriving him of his Kingdome, had giuen the same vnto Albertus Duke of Austria, whom he had declared Emperour: whereof little euen the greatest of the Christian Princes; wronged all or most part of them in the per- Emperous in-

arisegreat troubles. Besides that, he being of the Guelphes faction, was not in any thing more of carefull, than of the vtter extinguishing of the contrary faction of the Gibellines, especially of the most honorable family of the Columny, of whom some he had slaine, some he had depriued of their honours, some he had imprisoned, and driven othersome into exile; so that thue wickedly buffed for the maintenance of his owne proud estate, he had no leisure to further the good of the Christian commonweale: which his intollerable pride, and forgetfulnesses dury long escaped not the reuenging hand of God; being when he thought least, suddenly taken prisoner at his fathers house in the city of Anagnia (where he was borne) by Sara Colum. min his mortall enemy; whom but lately before redeemed out of a pirats gally, the French King had fent for that purpose, with one Longaret (or as some call him, Nogaret) a French knight; by whom the proud Prelat brought to Rome, in the castle of S. Angelo, within five and H thirty daics after most miserably died, in his madnes (as some report) renting himselfe with Leadingtion his teeth, and denouring his owne fingers. This worthy Tartar Prince Castanes (by whom the Christian commonweale might have againe rifen in Syria and the land of Palestine, had not the pride of the great Bishop, and the differtion of the Christian Princes hindred the same) was (as Attornes writeth, who was prefent in this war, following his vnclethe Armenian King) a man o' a very thort stature, and exceeding hard fauor; but with valor, bounty, and other vertues of the minde, plentifully recompending what wanted in the feature of his body. After whose departure into Persia, Capcapus Gouernour of Damasco, considering that the power of the Taitars there left was not great, and that no aid was to be expected from the other Chri. ttian Princes of the West; to recompense his former treason of revolting from the Sultan, with a new reno't from the Tartar, role vp into open rebellion, drawing after him not onely the city of Damasco, but the greatest part of Syria also. Whereof Molois governor of Ierusa. lem understanding, was about to have gone against him with his Tartars; but advertised by his ofpials, that Capcapus in this his conspiracie had compacted with the Ægyptian Sultanalfo, perceiving himselfe too weake to withstand so great a power, retyred with his Tartars into Mesopotamia, there expecting new supplies both from Cassanes and the King of Armenia. Of Treiny of te-whose departure out of Syria the Ægyptian Sultan understanding came directly with his arall springers my to lerufalem, which he tooke, (being for faken of the inhabitants) and prophaned the temple, sparing onely the Sepulchre of our Sauiour, at the humble suit of the religious, making there a greater shew of denotion, than of cruelty. After that, he woon all the other lesser k townes, which the Tartars had either kept for themselues, or given to the other Christians, and veterly rased all the forts of the Hospitallers and Templars, which valiant men, without other helpe, for the space of almost a yeare held out against the tyrant, in which time most of them were honorably flaine: the rest that were less taken by the enemy, had neuerthe leffe leave given with bag and baggage in fafety to depart, having before by folemne oath for cuer abjured the country of Syria: and so these worthy men, the great ornaments of the Christian commonweale, the Hospitalers and Templars, which to the vtmost of their power had by the space of 300 yeres right worthily defended both the Christians and the Christian religion, against the Insidels in Syria and the Holy-land, were now for euer driven out thence about the yeare of our Lord 1300, to the great dishonour of all Christendome.

Wherefore with them now taking our leaue of Syria and the Holy-land, leauing the fame in the possession of the Ægyptian Sultan and the Mamalukes, although it were shortly after like enough to have bin againe recovered from them by the Tartars, had not the death of the great Tartar Prince Cassanes, and their domesticall troubles letted : we will againe returne to the troubled affaires of the Turks in the leffer Asia, whither the course of the time had somewhat before called vs, with the occurrents thereof, more proper to our purpose and the argument we have in hand, but that all cannot be at once told : and for the better understanding of the desirous Reader, I thought it not good abruptly to breake off the course of the aforesaid History, drawing so neere to an end, but to make him partaker of the heavinesse thereof.

Now had the Turks no kingdome left in the leffer A sia, and that also at the pleasure of Ga- N Zan the great Tartar Chan divided betwixt Mefoot and Cei-Cubades, as his vaffals, bound unto him by a yerely tribute, as is a foresaid: who both kept in awe by the greatnes of the Tartar, did nothing worth the remembrance, but as they lived, so also died, almost buried in obscurity. Of their two, Mesos died without iffue; but Cei-Cubades departing, left behind him his sonne

Aladin,

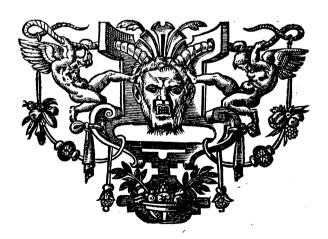

Aladin, who by the name of Aladin the fecond fucceeding in the Kingdome, vnited against the fame before divided, yet paying still tribute vnto the Taitar his Soueraigne, as had his father with the other late Sultans of the Turks before him. Much it was not that this Aladin did, albeit that the power of the Tartars in his time began to decline, and not to lie to heavy voon the Turks as before. He was a man of a quiet ipirit, and therefore much delighted in peace: a great friend vnto Othoman the first founder of the glorious and mighty Othoman Empire, as in his life shall appeare. But this Aladin, the last of the Turks Sultans of the Selzuccian family, dying without iffue; one Sabib his Vefir-Azemes or chiefe Counfeller, and then a man of greatest authority, aspired vnto the kingdome, which he had for most part himselse swaied all the reigne of the late Sultan his master: which vsurped soueraigntie, no way vnto him due, he could neither himselfe long hold, or deliuer vnto his posterity; for that many others of the nobility, men of great power, and borne of greater families than he, enuying at The Turko Vision his honour, and disdaining to be gouerned by him, or any other no greater than themselves, dome real in layed hold fome upon one country or prouince, fome upon another, where they were able to falso. do most, erecting vnto themselves greater or lesser Satrapies, according to the measure of their owne strength and power, without respect of any superioritie one should have over another, but every one of them absolutely commanding over so much as he was able by strong hand to hold. So that as it had oftentimes before chanced, that the great Monatchies destitute of their lawfull heires, had in part, or all, become rich preyes vnto such as could first lay strong hand upon them; even so fell it now out in the great kingdome of the Turks, every one of their great Princes, measuring the greatnesse of his territory, not by the measure of his right, but by the strength of his owne power. Wherein they shared so well for themselues, that Sahib at first in possession of all, was in short time thrust quite out of all: and so the great kingdome of the Turks in the leffer Afia, brought tnto a meere Anarchie; no King now left The Turkes among them, the whole kingdome being now divided into divers Satrapies, or other leffer Toparchies. The greatest of those Princes that thus shared the Turks kingdome amongst them, was one Caraman Alufirius; who as strongest tooke vnto him the city of Iconium, the regall feat of the Turkish Sultans, with all the great country of Cilicia, and some part of the frontiers of the countries of Lycaonia, Pamphylia, Caria, and the greater Phrygia, as farre as Phyladelphia, and the city of Antioch vpon the river Maxander : all which large territory, was of him afterward called Caramania, and by the same name is commonly at this day caramania, knowne, and by our late Geographers described. Of this Caraman also descended the Caramanian Kings, who of long time after vnfortunately strone with the Othoman Sultans for the Soueraigntie of their Empires, untill that at length they with their Kingdome, and all the rest of the Turkish Satrapies, were in the fatall greatnesse of the Othoman Empire, swallowed vp and denoured, as in the processe of this History shall (if God so will) in due time and place be declared. Next neighbour vnto him was Saruchan, of the Greekes called Sarchan, of whom the Countrey of Ionia Maritima was and yet is called Saru-Chan-Ili, and Saru-Saruchania. chania, that is to fay, Sarnehans Countrey. The greatest part of Lydia, with some part also of the greater Mysia, Troas, and Phrygia, fell to Calumus and his sonne Carasius, of whom it is carasic. called Carafia, or Carafi-Ili, (or as we might fay) Carafius his Countrey. The greatest part of the antient Misia, with some part of Lydia, was possessed by Aidin, and was of him cal-Aldinis. led Aidinia, or Aidin-Ili, as his Country. Some part of the great Countrey of Pontus, with the Cities of Heraclea Pontica, Castamona, Synope, and others neere vnto the Euxine, and the Countrey of Paphlagonis, fell into the hands of the fonnes of Omer, or as the Greekes call him. Amur: of whom that Countrey tooke not name, as did the others, of fuch Princes as possessed them, but is commonly called Bolli, of a City in that Countrey by the estile. Turkes fo named. As was also Mendesia, or as some call it Mentesia, a Countrey in the les- Mendesia, fer Asia, so by the Turkes called of Mendos or Myndus, a City in Caria. There were beside these, divers other places and Toparchies in the lesser Asia, which in the renting of this great Kingdome, from the Turkes received names, before vnto the World vnknowne; all which to profecute were tedious. Sufficeth it vs, for the manifesting of the Turkes Anarchie, and the ruine of their Kingdome in the leffer Afia, as in part also for the more enidence of the heavy History following, to have remembred these as the chiefest; especially such as tooke their names from such great Princes or Captaines as in that so great a consusion of the Turks kingdome, by strong hand first seised upon them, and so left them to their posteri- c tie of whom much is to be faid hereafter. These Princes one and all that thus shared the late Aladman kingdome, were descended of the better fort of the Turks, which with the Selznecian and Aladinian Sultans driven out of Perfia by the Tartars, had under them feated them. selves in the lesser Asia, as is before at large declared. Now among these great men that thus divided the Turks kingdome, most of them that write of the Turks affaires, both Greeks and Latines, reckon vp Otheran (the raifer of his house and family) for one, who indeed in the larter time of the late Sultan Aladin began to flourish, and was of him for his valour extraordinarily sauoured (as in this History shall appeare) but of his kingdome held no more than one poore lordship, called Suguta in Bythinia, not farre from the mountaine Olympus, (long before given vnto his father Erthograll, for his good service) with such other small holds there. H about, as he had himfelfe gained from the weake Christians his neighbours. For although he Othoman none were a Turke borne, yet was he not of the Selzuccian family, as were the rest, but of another of the sequential house and tribe, and therefore not of them favoured or thought to have so good right to any of the late Sultans prouinces or territories, as had they who being of his house, and holpen with the prescription of time, enuied at the sudden rising of this oguzian Turk, being to them as it were a meere stranger: whose fortune for all that (I know not by what seeret foreknow. ledge) they seemed to seate, as in time to grow dangerous vnto them and their posteritie. wherein they were no whit deceiued. But of him and his proceedings much more is to be faid hereafter: leaus we him now therefore with the rest vnto their fortunes in this the Turkes Anarchie, and so conclude this part of our Generall History: Glad when I looke backe to haue waded thus far, yet fearing to be drowned before I get ouer; fuch a sea of matter and world of troubles yet remaining, not without much labour and toile, and that in long time to be passed through.

THE RISING OF THE GREAT AND MIGHTIE EMPIRE OF

THE TVRKES VNDER OTHOMAN, FIRST FOUNDER THEREOF: WITH HIS LIFE AND DOINGS.

HAT small assurance there is in mens affaires, and how All wordly fubje a vnto change euen those things are wherein we for things subject the most part repose our greatest felicitie and blisse, (befide that the whole course of mans fraile life, by many notable examples well declareth) nothing doth more plainly manifest the same, than the heavy events and woefull destructions of the greatest Kingdomes and Empires: which founded upon great fortunes, increased with perpetuall fuccesse, exalted by exceeding power, established with most puissant armies, wholesome lawes, and deepe counfels; haue yet grown old, and in time come to nought: So that euen as men, all things else belonging vnto man, are subject vnto the ineuitable course of destinie, or more truly to fay, vnto the fatal doome of the most Highest, prefining vnto every thing that in time begun, a time also wherein to take heed, being himselfe without time, the great commander thereof, and of all things else done therein. The fame of the first A styrian Monarchy, is very The greatest antient, and was no doubt both great and long, yet hath it neuertheleffe found an end; and the kingdoms better the time take more to put'vs in remembrance of our infirmitie, was never with fo much glory and valour by end, or fo com: Ninus erected, as it was with shame and cowardise by Sardanapalus subuerted. With like ne- 10 noughs. cessitie fell the great empire of the Medes and Persians, the time thereof being come. And after them, the Macedonians also. Neither hath the great Roman Empire, or the proud City of Rome it felfe (fometime the mistresse of the world) herein found any exemption but run the fame course with the rest: which grown great with continuall triumphs, and so strong as that it was not with forrein power to be shaken; converted the forces of it selfey pon it selfe, to the ouerthrow of the antient liberty thereof, together with the vtter subuersion of the state. After which time that mighty Monarchy (of all that euer yet were, the greatest) under the Romane Emperors felt many an hard and perillous storme, and by little & little stil declining (though fometime like a ficke aged body, by the valor or vertue of fome one or other her worthy Emperors, a little relieued, and by and by againe cast downe by the folly or negligence of some others succeeding) it became at length a prey vnto a soolish, rude, & barbarous nation, which ir had before oftentimes ouercome, and ouer which many the Roman captains had triumphed, and thereof taken their glorious furnames; which now again without compassion, burning and facking it caused it to stoop, and to yeeld ynto the service yoake which it had in former time proudly imposed upon the necks of others; wherein if any thing be to be blamed, it is not the fortune or folly of this or that man, then fitting at the helm (although that may also much help the matter as a meane) but the instabilitie of wordly things neuer permanent, but alwaies G changeable, and the sooner for their height; and that so forcibly, as that no man knoweth how to remedy the same, either if he did, were he able to performe it; the greatest means that men could possibly deuise for the stay thereof, being oftentimes by a greater power from aboue. converting vnto the more speedy effecting of that, against the which they were by mans wisedome provided. The like might be said of the Athenians, the Laced monians, the Thebanes. and of whom not? What maruell then, if the ancient kingdomes of the Turks likewise in Persia, and the lesser Asia, in Syria, Palestina, and Ægypt, having run their appointed times, migh. tily impugned by the Christians, oppressed on the one side by the Tartars, and on the other by the Mamalukes, and at length by themselues rent in sunder (their destiny so requiring) lost at last their wonted majesty, and so fell into a meere Anarchy, as in the former part of this Hi. H. flory is at large declared? Yet in this far more than any other people fortunate, That after the ruine of their former kingdomes, straight way out of themselues arise another, namely, this Othoman monarchy, the chiefe object of this History : which at the first scarce of the world perceived, or of themselves regarded, in short time so prospered, as that the power and glorv thereof obscured not their former kingdomes only (nothing, in comparison of this) but even the greatest monarchies of the world; ouer a great part of which, it now so proudly triumpheth, as if it should neuer have end: at the beauty wherof the world wondereth, and at the pow. er thereof quaketh: within the greatnesse whereof are contained no small portions of Asia. Europe, and Africke, but even the most famous and fruitfull kingdomes thereof: no part of the world left vntouched but America onely; not more fortunate with her rich mines, than I in that the is so farre from so great and dangerous an enemy. The foundation of this so great a kingdome (and now fo mighty an empire, as holdeth the world in awe) was first laid by the valiant Othoman, or as the Turks call him, ofman; not descended of the Selzuccian family. as were al the former Turks Sultans, but of the Oguzian tribe & kindred : in whose line this glorious empire hath euer fince, by the space of three hundred yeares and three, to the astonishment of the world, wonderfully flourished; and so yet doth at this day, under the gouernment of Mahomet the third, which now raigneth thirteenth in descent from him, knowing none in this world greater than himselfe. But for a fmuch as both his greatnesse, and the greatnesse of the rest of the Othoman Kings and Emperors his progenitors, tooke their beginning from this worthy and warlike Othoman, with whose life and doings we purpose to begin this part of our K History, it shall not be amisse both for the continuation of that we have in hand, with that we have already written, and for the more manifesting of that which hereafter followeth, a little farther to fetch his race and descent also mot meaning with a long and faigned pedegree to set him out of Noah his arke, (which continuall fuccession of Princes, no nation of the world, be it neuer fo antient, the Lewes only excepted, and they also by writings and Histories as much as was possible eternized, could truly and justly chaledge) but onely so farre as shall be pettinent vnto our purpose, and by the authority of good Histories to be auerred.

At fuch time as the Turks kingdom founded by Tangrolipix in Persia flourished in the Sel-Quecian Princes his fucceffors, there was also another kingdome of theirs at the city of Machan, as is before declared, but nothing comparable to the other either in glory or power. In L this city, and ouer this small kingdom, raigned one Solyman, by his subjects honored also with the name of a Sultan or King at the fame time that the Tarrars under the leading of old Zingit their great Captaine, leaving their own countrey, and beating downe the world before them, having conquered the farthest parts of the East, and there seated their kingdome, turned their forces into Persia, and there ouerthrew the Turkes kingdomeat Balch in Corasan, and drave the Turks with Cursumes their last King, out of the country: after that they had there from the time of Tangrolipix reigned about an hundred and seventie two yeres.

This Solyman of whom we speake, then raigning at Machan, was not of the Selzuccian family of Mathan for (as were all the other Turks Sultans, the fucceffors of Tangrolipix) but of the Ognation tribe, 2 dome for feare family famous also among it the Turks, who seeing the Selzuccian Sultan Cursumes (or as some # of the Tartars, call him, Cussumes) his countryman, beaten out of his kingdom by the Tartar, and his country ouerrun, and the great Caliph of Babylon also ouerthrowne; thought it not good longer to flay in that countrey which he could not hold, but by speedy flight betimes to provide for the safety of himselfe and of such his subjects as would follow him and hearing that Aladis the fon of Kei-Hufren, or as the Greeks call him, Cai-Cofree (a great man of the Selzuccian family, & neere of kinvnto the late Sultan Cursumes) who for feare of the Tartars but lately come into Romania Asiatica, had there by force of armes most honourably seated himselfe and the Turks his followers, among the Christians: in hope of like good fortune, and for the zeale towards his superstition (accounting all wel gotten that was gained from the Christians) took his way after him, with such of his kinsmen and subjects as would accompany him in his new aductives. And comming to Artezerum, a city in the borders of Armenia and Cappadocia, thereabout in the countrey according to the scason of the yeare scatted himselfe with his followers, being in number many; who with their wives and children, after the manner of the Tartar Nomades their ancestors, in poore tents and carts coursed with a course kind of cloth. had followed him, being indeed nothing els but a very rude and rough kind of fturdy heardfmen, not wedded to any place, but still removing with their tents and carts vp and downe, as best served for their purpose and the feeding of their cattell, as do the Turcoman nation, the true discent of the Turks, in many places of Asia at this day, and were thereof not only called Nomades, that is to fay, Herdimen, (by which name the proud Ianizaries will oftentimes in contempt call even the greatest of the naturall Turks) but Hamaxophoreti, and Hamaxoby, that is to fay, people carried or lining in carts. Solyman having staid a while about Erzerum, remouing thence came to Amasia; and there spoyling the country, then inhabited by the Christians, did them much harme, oftentimes encountring them in the plaine field, and fometimes feifing vpon their towns and cities, vntil he had subdued vnto himfelfe a right large territory: yetat length having in somany battels by him sought, and cities by him besieged, lost a great number of his people, and so wearied the rest, as that they were not willing further to follow him, and fearing also with such small power as he had left, to be able to defend and keepe the country by him already gotten, in the midft of fo many enemies, he thought it best to depart thence, and to feek his better fortune ellewhere. At the same time it was rifely reported, that the affairs of Persia, after so long trouble (for all this was not a while in doing) began to grow again to some good quiet, the fury of the Tartars being now well abated, and that storm ouerblown:wherefore Solyman resolued now to returne home again, and to visit his native country, of him and his people about all others defired. So passing through Syria, (for thas was now his way)neer Aleppo he seised voon a castle called Ziaber Cala, and there staid a space for the refreshing of his people. Afterward setting sorward again, he came at length to the great and famous river Euphrates, ouer which he must needs passe, but finding there neither bridge non foord, or other meanes to get ouer, he stood still as a man dismaid, not knowing what to doe. Stay there he would not, and go further he could not his defire bid him go, but the great river faid not fo. In this perplexity Solyman himfelfe with his horfe oftentimes taking the riner, in hope to haue found some passage; but finding none, aduenturing too far, was with the sorce of the ftreame carried away, and so together with his horse drowned. His body after long seeking being at length found, was with the great lamentation of his people buried necrevato the castle Ziaber, not long before by him taken : whereof they say the place is now in their tongue called Mefari Zuruc, (viz.) the Turks Grauc. Some of these Oguzian Turks, after the death of their Sultan, weary of their long trauell, seated themselues in the countrey thereabouts, vnto whom the Turks that now hold that castle do refer their beginning. The rest of that great tribe and family diverfly divided, went vnto divers places as their fortunes led them; some of them into the wast ground and defarts of Arabia and Syria, and are at this day called the Damasoene Turcomans: other some returned back againe into Romania, the same way that they came, of whom are discended the Turcomans of Iconium, and Anatolia: who Romania Asia yet with their wines and children, as heardfinen in great companies wander vp and downe the countrey, after the manner of their ancestors.

Solyman thus loft, left foure fons, Sencur Teken, Jundog dis, Ertogrul, of fome called Orthobules The fonnes of (the father of this Othoman founder of the Turks empire that now is) and Dunder, With the fe there f that. foure brethren, nioft part of these Oguzian Turks that were left, returning into Romania (as is unimits. aforesaid)after they had there rested themselves a while, marching vp along the river Euphrates, came to a place called Pasin-Ouasi, about ten miles aboue Arterum, where Ertogrul and his brother Dunder, with foure hundred families, not willing to goe any further, flayed with their tents and carts, their best dwellings. Seneur and lundog dis their other two brethren in the meane time passing the river, returned with the rest into Persia: whom we there s leaue vnto their vnknowne fortunes. In this place Ertogrul with his brother and his three fons stand a while, and had divers conflicts with the country people therabout, vntill that at length he thought it best to returne again into Romania. So setting forward, he came to Ancyra, and from thence vnto the blacke mountaines, and so to a plaine called of the Turks Sultan Vngi, about 75 miles Eastward from the city of Nice in Bithynia, where he had many skirmishes with the Christians.

Now a great while before this, Aladin the elder (of whom we have before spoken in the former part of this history) fled out of Persia, had subdued divers great provinces and countries in Romania Afiatica, or the lesser Asia, for so it is more truly called : so that he was of all the people thereabouts accounted a great Prince, and of the Turks themselues honored with the H name of their Vlu Padifehach, viz. their great King or Emperor. Having placed his regall for first at Schastia, and afterwards at Iconium, which two cities before ruinous, he repaired, and therein reigned, as did some few of his posterity after him, as is before declared. Neither was Eriogral ignorant of the honor, glory, and power of this great Sultan: but having three fons, namely Jundus, Serugatin, and Othoman, sent Serugatin his second son (a bold well spoken man) to him, to request him in that his so large a kingdome, as yet not well peopled by the Turks. to grant vnto them his poor exiled countrymen, of long time oppressed with divers fortunes, fome finall corner for them with their families and cattell to rest in. Which his request, the Sultan not forgetfull of his owne distresse sometime in like case, graciously heard, and with great courtesie vsed the messenger. Now for the furtherance of his suit it fortuned that this I Sultan before driuen out of Persia by the Tartars, and by them also much troubled in these his new gotten countries in the leffer Afia, had with them divers hot skirmishes and sharpe conflicts: in one of which it fortuned the Sultan himselfe, with all the power he then had, to be hardly beset by his enemies, and in danger to have lost the day: when as Ertogrul, but newly come into the country, and willing to do the Sultan seruice, and awaiting all opportunities for the commending of himselse and his followers; vpon the sudden vnlooked for, with source hundred men came vpon the backs of the Tartars, then almost in possession of a great victory, and so forcibly charged them, that vnable to endure the charge, and to maintaine the fight against the Sultan (whose menencouraged by this vnexpected aid, as by succour sent from heauen, began now to fight with greater courage, being both before and behind hardly befet) K they as men in difpair of the victory they had before affured themselues of, turned their backs and fled. After which good feruice, the Sultan honorably welcommed this new come Turke, giving him his hand to kiffe, as the manner of the nation is; and highly commending his valor, commanded a rich cloake to be cast vpon him (among st those Eastern nations a great honor) and all his fouldiers to be bountifully rewarded; and prefently after gauevnto Eriogral and his Turks a country village called Suguta, betwixt the castle Belezuga and the mountain Tonolus in the greater Phrygia: in which village they might liue in Winter, and vpon the aforesaid mountain, and the mountain Ormenius, betwixt the rivers Sangarius and Licus, seed their cattell in Summer. And yet not so contented thus to have honored him, in whom he saw fuch approued valor, committed to his protection that fide of the countrey wherin he dwelt. L being in the very frontiers of his kingdome: which his charge he fo well looked vnto, that all the countrey thereabout, before much infested with the often incursions of the enemy, was by his vigilant care and prowesse well secured.

Thus is Friegrul the Oguzian Turke, with his homely heardsmen, become a petty Lord of a country village, and in good fauour with the Sultan : whose followers, as flurdy heardsmen, with their families, liued in Winter with him in Suguta; but in Summer in tents, with their cattell vpon the mountains. Having thus lived certaine yeres, and broughogreat peace to his neighbors, as wel the Christians as the Turks, before much troubled with the invasion of the Tartars, it fortuned that the Christians of Cara-Chisar (a castle thereby, called by the antient Greeks, Melanopyrgon, and of later time Maurocastron; that is to say, the blacke tower or castle) M The chillians weary of their owne case, and of the peace they had by his cares enjoyed, fel out with him, and cui with cuill intreated both him and his people. Which their ingratitude he taking in euil part, therof and of the wrongs by them done vnto the Turkes, so grieuously complained vnto the Sultan, that hee therewith mooned, raised a great army, and so himselfe in person came and

belieged the castle. But lying there at the siege, news was brought him, that the Tartars with a great army, under the leading of one Baintzar, were entred into Caria, and there spoiling the country, had taken Heraclea. For the repressing of whom, the Sultan was glad to rise with his army; yet leaving a sufficient strength behind him for the continuing of the siege, under the charge of Errogral Beg, for fo the Turks now called him. The Sultan afterwards encountring with the Tartars at Baga, ouerthrew them in a great battell: whilft Ertogral in the mean space hardly besieged Cara Chisar, wherein fortune so much fauoured him, that at length he took the castle, the spoile whereof he gaue vnto the souldiers, referuing only the fift part thereof, as due vnto the Sultan, which he fent him for a prefent, together with the Captain of the castle, who he had taken aliue which Captaine the Sultan afterward inlarged, and restored again to him his castle, for the payment of a yerely tribute, which he truly payd during the life of the Sultan; buthe dying about two yeares after, he refused any more to pay it, and so revolted from the Turks.

Sultan Aladin, founder of the Aladinian kingdome (for fo the Turks call it) being dead at Iconium, after him succeeded Azatines his eldest son, and after him lathatines his yonger brother : who flaine by Theodorus Lascaris the Greeke Emperor, (as is before declared) after him fucceeded in that kingdome another lathatines, the fon of azatines, who was by the Tattars expulsed, and his kingdome subdued, as in the former part of this history it appeareth. After which time also the Selzaccian family there by the Tartars in the lesser Asia depressed, retained scarce the name and shadow of their former maiesty and glory. In which troublesome smallblags in times, and confusion of the state, Ertogral well beaten and wearied in the world, kept himselfe yeld wate the close in his house at Suguta, as well contented therewith as with a kingdome; seeking by all wife great conmeans to keep peace on every side with his neighbours, as well Christians as others. In which quiet kind of life he sweetly passed ouer the troublesome times of Meson the son of Kei Cubades, and of Kei-Cubades the fon of Feramuzin, both Sultans, but the great Tartars tributaries, and reigning but at their pleasure, vntill the time of the second Aladin, the sole and last heire of the Iconian kingdome, before by the Tartars divided, which was no few yeares. All which time Ertogral lived quiet at Suguta, as one amongst many other of the Iconian Sultans subiects, wifely considering the fall of the Selzuccian Sultans, both in Persia and at Iconium, as also the ruine of his own house and family, both from royall state brought almost to nothing: and therfore with patience taking the world as it came, and making a vertue of necessity, contenting himselse with a little, bare himselse kindly towards al men. In which contented kind of life he grew to great yeares, with his three fons, great beloued and honored of their neighbors, as well Christians as Turks; and no lesse fauoured by the second Aladin then Sultan, than he had been of all the Sultans before him whom the young men his fons, after the manner of their nation (forbidding them with empty hands to falute their Princes) oftentimes visited with one present or other. In all which his sons were many good parts to be seen, yet so, as that in Othoman was easily to be seene a greater courage and spirit than in the other two his brethren:which was the cause that he was the more of them of his tribe regarded, but especially of the youthfull and warlike fort, which commonly reforted vnto him when he went to hawke E or hunt, or to other delights of the field (the counterfeits of war) and was of them commonly called Ofman Gazi, viz. Ofman the Warlike.

In this frontier countrey neer vnto Suguta, the dwelling place of old Briogral, had Sultan Aladin divers lieutenants and captaines, governors of his castles and strong holds vpon those frontiers, with whom Othoman was well acquainted, and vnto whom he for friend thip fake oftentimes reforted but especially to the captain of In-Vngi, for that he knew himselfe to be of him well beloued, and therfore vnto him very welcome. So it fortuned vpon a time, that as O. thoman, being yet but yong, was going to make merry with the gouernor of Eski. Chilar (a cafile about 24 miles off, called of the Greekes, Palaocastron) by the way as he went, at a place called Itburne (a towne in Phrygia) chanced there to fee, and afterwards to fall in liking of a faire maiden, called Malhatun: vnto whom his affection dayly increasing, he without his fa- others amathers knowledge fent a fecret friend of his to intreat with her of marriage. Which after long road of Malhadiscourse to her made concerning Othomans affection and request, gatte him answer, that be- Mail twixt Othoman and her was great inequality, a thing especially to be regarded and eschewed of fuch as wished to line a happy life in wedlock bands: she was (as she said) but meanly born,

maids of more worth, & in all respects more answerable vnto himselfe. But among other canfes why the gaue him this answer, one was, for that some that wished her wel, had put into her head that Othoman meant not indeed to marry her, but under that color to obtain of her some few days pleasure, and so having dishonored her, afterward again to cast her off which was indeed far from his thought; for he the more inflamed with her modest deniall, the more desired her for his wife. In the mean time Othoman going againe to the gouernor of Eski Chifar. and courteously by him entertained, chanced (as it oftentimes doth among familiar friends in their merriments) to fall in speech of his Loue, with greater affection than discretion, commending her beauty, her feature, and gracious perfections, not dissembling also, to her greater praife, the repulte by him received at her hands; which the governor hearing, feemed greatly if to like of his choice, faying, that she was by the divine providence (for so the Turks religioully vie to speake) appointed only for him to have. But in the meane time secretly inflamed with the immoderat commendation of Othoman, without respect of friendship, hee began to grow amorous of her himfelfe, whom he had neuer feen; to light is that foolish affection; and that so farre, as that being otherwise a man of good discretion, he was not able to conceale or couer these new conceived shames, but that Othoman by certain conic & tokens perceiued the fame and yet diffembling the matter, as if he had suspected nothing, being risen from the banquet, calling vnto him one of his trufty feruants, fecretly fent him away to certain of the maids friends, willing them in his name, as they tendred her honour, presently to send her away to some place further off, for feare the were not ere long taken from them by a great man I more amorous of her person, than respective of her honour. And by and by after taking leave of his vnfaithfull friend, and bidding him farewell, tooke his way to the Captain of In-Vngi, whom he knew to be his deere friend. But whilst he there stayd certaine days, passing the time in hawking, hunting, and other youthful disports, with the captain his friend, the governor of Eski-Chifar, who commanded all the country therabout called Sultan Vngi, fent one of his trusty servants to Iburne, to see faire Malhatun, and how all things went there. Who comming thither, and understanding of her secret departure, and that by the aduertisement from Other man the was conneighed to certaine of her friends afar off, at his returne, from point to point certified his master thereof. Who exceedingly grieued with the report, and fretting about measure to see himselse sodeluded by O homan, presently sent vnto the Captaine of In-Vngi, K (being within his iurisdiction) to command him without delay to deliuer Othoman vnto him. But he louing of him well, as a faithfull man vnto his friend, could with no threats or intreaty Otherman before be perfuaded fo to do. Wherefore the governour in a great rage prefently raising the greatest gofo bolone, power he was able to make, came to the castle of In Vngi, requiring to haue Qthoman forthwith delivered vnto him. Where among the fouldiers there in garrison with the captaine, began to arise divers opinions; some withing, for the averting of the present danger for which they were now unprouided, to have him delivered; and other some abhorring so treacherous a fact, willing rather to induce all extremities. In the end, after much confultation honesty prevailed, and it was generally resolued, that he should be desended, who could not without, their great infamy be deliuered. But Othoman terrified with that diversity of opinions, which 1 had even at first shewed it selfe; and thinking it not for his safety, to commit himselfe to the trust of such wavering men, entred into a deep conceit of a matter of great adventure, which was, by a sudden fally to make himselfe way through the midst of his enemies. Wherewith having made his brother Jundus and those few his followers there present acquainted, & there upon resolued; he siercely sallyed out, and by plain force brake through the midst of them, and fo took his way towards Suguta, still notably repulsing them that were sent to pursue him:but being come into the frontiers of his fathers territory, & the report of his dangers known, and that being but weakely accompanied, he was by a great number of his enemies pursued; prefently all the lufty youths and fuch as loued him well, tooke horfe to come to his rescue who meeting with the gouernors foldiers, that had Othoman in chace, in a sharp conflict slew divers M of them, and put the rest to slight. Of whom some were also taken prisoners, & among the rest one Michael Coffe a Christian, Captain of a little castle in that country, called Hirmen Caia, or the rocke of Ormeni: Of whom Othoman taking compassion, freely pardoned him that of fence. With which vnc xpected courtefie he was fo moued, that euer after he tooke part with him, and did him great service in his wars; whose posterity hath ever since even vntil this our age continued, next write the Otheman family, most honourable and famous among the Turks, by the name of Michael Oglies, viz, the fons or posterity of Michael.

Ertogralinow spent with age, shortly after died, in the yere of our Lord 1289. having lived 93 yeares, and thereof gouerned the Oguzian family after the death of his father Solyman, 52. His death was of all his tribe and kinred generally lamented, and his body after the Turkift manner honorably buried at Suguta, where he had of long time lived.

After whose death, these plaine OguZian Turkes, in a generall assembly consulting whom they might chuse for their Lord and governor in stead of old Ertogral, casting their eyes especially vpontwo, flood in doubt of which of them to make choice. For although most men The Oragian etally upon two, trood in doubt of which of them to make choice. For although more than Turk in dubt were of opinion, that Othoman for the rare gifts and vertues as well of body as mind, was to of whome to be presented before the rest of his brethren the sons of Ertogril, yetwere there some, and they make chaice for also men of great gradity and experience, who had in suspect the yong mans age, as of it selfe their gouterner. flippery, and for the most part prone to vice, especially in the liberty of great power, and therfore thought it better to make choice of Dunder (Errogruls brother and Othomans vice) a man of far greater grauity, judgement; and experience. But Dunder himselfe being indeed a wise man, and far from all ambition, perfuaded them in that choice not to have any regard at all to his honor or preferment, but to confider what were best for their state and welfare in generall. For he providently forelaw in what danger the Oguzian state stood, exposed on the one side to the mortall hatred and trecheries of the Greeks, grieved to see themselves spoyled by the Turks, and maturally having them for the Mahometun religion; and on the other fide not furely backt by the Sultans of Iconium, brought in thraidome to the Tartars, and dayly grown weaker & weaker. Vnto which inconveniences and dangers (he faid) an old, weake and overgrown body (as his was) could give no help or remedy at al, but required the help of a wife, politick, vigilant, Wirring, and valiant man, fisch as they all well knew was Othoman his brothers fonne. Thus before he came vino the election, he in privat declared his mind vnto the chiefe of the Oguzian family : and afterward at their request comming to the generall affembly, all mens minds and eyes now fixed upon Otheman, he first of all (by his example to encourage the rest) for the good of the Ofazian tribe, hisantient house and family, saluted him their great Lord and Gouemour, promiting vato him all loyalty, with the vtmost of his seruice : whereunto by and by enfued the great applause of the rest of the people, as vnto a Gouernor sent vnto them by God, whom they toyfully wished all happy successe, with long life, and a prosperous gouernment. Thus with all mens good liking was Othoman made the great gouernour of the Oguzian Turks, and fo became among them a great commander, and honoured with the title of Afman-Beg or the Lord Ofman. Newwas this his honor included in a small circuit, plain and homely, without any great pomp or frew, as commanding among it rough & rude heard fmen and thepheards, not acquainted with the courteste of other more civil nations: for as yet they Were the fame homely Seythian Nomades that they were before, and could not as yet be perfunded to follake their woonted rude and uncivill manners, by long tradition received from their ancestors, and so best agreeing with their nature & calling. Amongst which rude herdsmen, this new governor hunfelfe, not too far exceeding the rest in civility, commanded much like to another Romalia of whom also the Turks report many such things as do the Romanes of their founder, which for breuity I thought good to passe ouer.

Now it fortuned that Orhoman elien in the beginning of his gouernment fell first at oddes with one Hagionicholam, or S. Nicholas (captaine of Einegiol, a castle there by) for that he had Oftentimes of purpose troubled and molested these Oguziun heardsmen, in passing to and fro with their cattell by his castle. For which cause Othoman was inforced to request the captain of Bilezuga (another caffletherby, also his neighbor and friend) that his people in passing that way to the mountains, might with their goods and cattel, as occasion should require, take the refuge of his castle, which the courteous captain (wel acquainted with old Ertogral, Othomans F father) eafily granted: yet with this prouifo, that none should with such goods or carrell have accesse into his castleibut the Turks women only which his courtesse Otheman refused not so was the caffile of Bilezuga from that time forward a refuge to the Turks women, who passing that way, and there shrouded with their goods and cattell, vsually presented the captain with fome one homely countrey Present or other, which afterwards was the losse of the castle.

and therefore was not to expect fo great a match : whereas he could not want choice of other maids of more worth, & in all respects more answerable vnto himselfe. But among other canfes why the gaue him this answer, one was, for that some that wished her wel, had put into her head that Othomas meant not indeed to marry her, but under that color to obtain of her some few days pleasure, and so having dishonored her, afterward again to cast her off: which was indeed far from his thought; for he the more inflamed with her modest deniall, the more defired her for his wife. In the mean time Othoman going againe to the gouernor of Eski Chifar. Af threamen and court coully by him entertained, chanced (as it oftentimes doth among familiar friends in their merriments) to fall in speech of his Loue, with greater affection than discretion, commending her beauty, her feature, and gracious perfections, not diffembling also, to her greater praise, the repulse by him received at her hands; which the governor hearing, seemed greatly ! to like of his choice, faying, that she was by the divine providence (for so the Turks religion oully vie to speake) appointed only for him to haue. But in the meane time secretly inflamed with the immoderat commendation of Othoman, without respect of friendship, hee began to grow amorous of her himfelfe, whom he had neuer feen; fo light is that foolish affection; and that so farre, as that being otherwise a man of good discretion, he was not able to conceale or couer these new conceiued stames, but that Othoman by certain conic dures & tokens perceiued the fame and yet diffembling the matter, as if he had suspected nothing, being risen from the banquer, calling vnto him one of his trufty feruants, fecretly fent him away to certain of the maids friends, willing them in his name, as they tendred her honour, presently to send her away to some place further off, for feare the were not ere long taken from them by a great man I more amorous of her person, than respective of her honour. And by and by after taking leave of his vnfaithfull friend, and bidding him farewell, tooke his way to the Captain of In-Vngi, whom he knew to be his deere friend. But whilst he there stayd certaine days, passing the time in hawking, hunting, and other youthful disports, with the captain his friend, the governor of Eski-Chifar, who commanded all the country therabout called Sultan-Vngi, fent one of his trusty scruants to Iburne, to see faire Malhatun, and how all things went there. Who comming thither, and understanding of her secret departure, and that by the aduertisement from Other man the was conneighed to certaine of her friends afar off, at his returne, from point to point certified his master thereof. Who exceedingly grieued with the report, and fretting about measure to see himselse so deluded by O: homan, presently sent vnto the Captaine of In-Vngi, (being within his iurifdiction) to command him without delay to deliuer othoman vnto him. But he louing of him well, as a faithfull man vnto his friend, could with no threats or intreaty orbanian before be perfuaded to to do. Wherefore the gouernour in a great rage prefently raising the greatest get for the louis, power he was able to make, came to the castle of In Vngi, requiring to have Othernan forthwith deliuered vnto him. Where among the fouldiers there in garrison with the captaine, began to arise divers opinions; some withing, for the averting of the present danger for which they were now unprouided, to have him delivered; and other some abhorring so treacherous a fact, willing rather to indure all extremities. In the end, after much confultation honefly prevailed, and it was generally resoluted, that he should be desended, who could not without their great infamy be deliuered. But Othoman terrified with that diversity of opinions, which 1 had even at first showed it selfe; and thinking it not for his safety, to commit himselfe to the trust of such wavering men, entred into a deep conceit of a matter of great adventure, which was, by a sudden fally to make himselfe way through the midst of his enemies. Wherewith having made his brother Iundus and those few his followers there present acquainted, & there upon resolued; he siercely sallyed out, and by plain force brake through the midst of them, and fo took his way towards Suguta, still notably repulsing them that were sent to pursue him:but being come into the frontiers of his fathers territory, & the report of his dangers known, and that being but weakely accompanied, he was by a great number of his enemies pursued; prefently all the lufty youths and fuch as loued him well, tooke horfe to come to his rescue who meeting with the gouernors foldiers, that had Othoman in chace, in a sharp conflict flew divers M of them, and put the rest to flight, Of whom some were also taken prisoners, & among the rest one Michael Coffe a Christian, Captain of a little castle in that country, called Hirmen-Caia, or the rocke of Ormeni: Of whom Othoman taking compassion, freely pardoned him that of fence. With which vne xpected courtefie he was so moued, that ever after he tooke part with him, and did him great feruice in his wars whose posterity hath cuer since even vntil this our age continued, next vito the Otheran family, most honourable and famous among the Turks, by the name of Michael oglies, vil, the fons or posterity of Michael.

Ertogrulinow spent with age, shortly after died, in the yere of our Lord 1289. having lived 93 yeares, and thereof gouerned the Oguzian family after the death of his father Solyman, 52: His death was of all his tribe and kinred generally lamented, and his body after the Turkift

manner honorably buried at Suguta, where he had of long time lived:

After whose death, these plaine OgaZian Turkes, in a generall assembly consulting whom they might chuse for their Lord and governor in stead of old Ertogral, casting their eyes especially vpontwo, flood in doubt of which of them to make choice. For although most men The Ornzian were of opinion, that Otheran for the rare gifts and vertues as well of body as mind, was to be presented before the rest of his brethren the sons of Ertogral, yetwere there some, and they mike chaice for also men of great gradity and experience, who had in suspect the yong mans age, as of it selfe their gouernar. flippery, and for the most part prone to vice, especially in the liberty of great power, and therfore thought it better to make choice of Dunder (Errogruls brother and Othomans vncle) a man of far greater grauity, judgement, and experience. But Dunder himselse being indeed a wise man, and far from all ambition, perfuaded them in that choice not to have any regard at all to his honor or preferment but to confider what were best for their state and welfare in generall. For he providently forefaw in what danger the Oguzian state stood, exposed on the one side to the mortall hatred and trecheries of the Greeks, grieved to fee themselves spoyled by the Turks, and flaturally having them for the Mahometun religion; and on the other fide not furely backt by the Sultans of Iconium, brought in thraidome to the Tartars, and dayly grown weaher & weaker. Vnto which inconveniences and dangers (he faid) an old, weake and ouer grown body (as his was) could give no help or remedy at al, but required the help of a wife, politick, vigilant, Wirring, and Walfant man, fisch as they all well knew was Othoman his brothers fonne. Thus before he came virto the election, he in privat declared his mind vnto the chiefe of the Deuxian family : and afterward at their request comming to the generall affembly, all mens minds and eyes now fixed upon Othernan, he first of all (by his example to encourage the rest) for the good of the Offician tribe, hisantient house and family, saluted him their great Lord and Governour, promiting whto him all loyalty, with the vtmost of his service : whereunto by and by enfued the great applause of the rest of the people, as vnto a Gouernor sent vnto them by God, whom they loyfully wished all happy successe, with long life, and a prosperous gouernment. Thus with all mens good liking was Othoman made the great gouernour of the Oguzian Turks, and fo became among them a great commander, and honoured with the title of Affman-Begor the Lord Ofman. Yetwas this his honor included in a small circuit, plain and homely, without any great pomp or thew, as commanding among it rough & rude heard men and thepheards, not accide inted with the courteffe of other more civil nations: for as yet they were the fame homely Seythian Nomades that they were before, and could not as yet be perfuaded to foliake their woonted rude and uncivill manners, by long tradition received from their ancestors, and so best agreeing with their nature & calling. Amongst which rude herdsmen, this new governor himselfe, nor too far exceeding the rest in civility, commanded much like to another Romalia bf whom alfo the Turks report many such things as do the Romanes of their founder, which for breuity I thought good to passe ouer.

Now it fortuned that Orbonan even in the beginning of his government sell first at oddes with one Hagionicholam, or S. Nicholas (captaine of Einegiol, a castle there by) for that he had Oftentimes of purpose troubled and molested these Oguzium heardsmen, in passing to and fro with their cartell by his castle. For which cause Othoman was inforced to request the captain of Bilezuga (another caft letherby, alfo his neighbor and friend) that his people in passing that way to the mountains, might with their goods and cattel, as occasion should require, take the refuge of his castle, which the courteous captain (wel acquainted with old Ertogral, Othomans father) casily granted; yet with this prouiso, that none should with such goods or carrell have accesse into his castleibut the Turks women only which his courteste Otheman refused not so was the castile of Bilezuga from that time forward a refuge to the Turks women, who passing that way, and there shrouded with their goods and cattell, vsually presented the captain with some one homely countrey Present or other, which afterwards was the losse of the castle.

Yet was not Othoman vnmindfull of the wrong done vnto his people, by his cuill neighbor 6 the captain of Einegiol:but purpoling to be thereof reuenged, made choice of feuenty of his best and most able men, whom he appointed secretly to passe the mountain Ormenius, and so if it were possible, to surprise or set on fire his enemies castle. Of which his designement the wary Captaine having intelligence by one of his espials, in place convenient vpon the mountain laid a strong ambush for the cutting off of such as were by Othoman sent to have surprised his castle: whereof othoman (no lesse wary than he) before warned by his scouts, and augmen ting the number of his men, marched directly to the place where the enemy lay. Where he twixt them (for fo small a number) was fought a right bloudy and cruell battell, and many flain on both fides: among it whom HoZza, Othernans nephew was one. The victory nevertheless fell vnto Othoman: after which time his people in much more fafety, fed their cattell in the Summer time on the mountains, as the manner was, and so in quiet passed to and fro.

The castle of Shortly after, Othoman by night surprised the little castle of Chalce, not far from Einegiol. and there without mercy he put to the fword all the Christians he found therein, and so after ward burnt the castle: which outrage was the beginning, and occasion of great troubles theref The Christians ensuing : for the Christians of the countries adjoyning, much gricued therewith, and affem. complain of the bling themselves together, complained vnto the Captaine of Cara-Chisar the greatest comto them by the mander thereabout. That these Turks, which not many yeres before were of meer pitty receiued as poore heard fmen into that country, began now in warlike manner to lay violent hands voon the antient lands and possessions of the Christians; which insolency (as they said) if it were longer winked at, and fuffered by him, and other fuch men of account and authority as were to reforme the same, they would no doubt in short time drive both them and all thereft of the Christians out of their native countries : wherefore it were now high time, and more than necessary for him, and all the rest, to awake (as it were) out of the dead sleep wherin they had long time drowfily flept and joyning their forces together, to expulse those vnthankfull. incroching, and mercileffe strangers out of their countries the mischief (they faid) being now ipred far, therefore needed speedy remedy, and that repentance would come too late when it was past cure. The Captaine moved with the indignity of the late fact and just complaint of the poore country people, sent with all speed a strong company of souldiers, under the leading of Calanus his brother, with commandment that they should march to the castle of Binegio and there to joyne with the rest of the Christian forces.

Otherman understanding of this preparation made against him, gathering his foldiers together, marched to a place called Opficium, neere to mount Tmolus in Phrygia; where between him and the Christians was fought a sharp battell, whenin he lost his brother Sarug ain (whom the Turks account for a Saint or Martyr at this day) with many other of his foldiers. In this battell was also Galanus slaine, whose belly Othoman caused to be ripped, and his intrals tobe pulled out, naming the place where he was buried, Mefari, Repec, vil, she Dog. grane, by which name the place is at this day known. The body of his brother Sarng atin he carried to Suguta, and there honorably buried it neer to the body of his father Treegral, Aladin Sultap of Iconium understanding of this conflict, was very forry for the losse happened unto Othomas, being a Mahometan of his owne religion: wherefore in token of his good will and fauour he gaue vato him the city of Paleopolis, with all the territority thereunto belonging giving vnto him alfo leave to befiege, take or spoile, the seigniory and castle of Cara-Chisarrior accomplishment whereof he sent vnto him both souldiers and munition. Othoman incouraged with this great bounty of the Sultans, straightly besieged the castle of Cara-Chisar, which at last he woone, and flew all the Christians therein: the captain he tooks aliue, whom he cruelly executed the spoile of the castle he gaue vnto his soldiers, reserving only the fift part therof, which he sent for a present to the Sultan. All this hapned in the years of our Lord 1290. This castle of Cara Chisar, with the rest of Einegiol, Bilezuga, Chalce, and others before and hereaster in the life of othernan to be mentioned, were all seituate in the borders of the greater Phrygia, or els neere therunto in the confines of Bithynia and Myfia: In which pleafant countries (but lately M part of the Constantinopolitan empire) the Christians the antient inhabitants thereof, as yet dwelt, intermingled with the Turks at the rifing of the Othoman empire; with whom they lie tted at continual jarres, vntill that at length they were by them altogether vtterly oppressed and extinguished.

Othernan encouraged with this good successe, and supported by the great Sultan of Iconi- Othernan con um, began now after his ambitious nature to conceit great matters, for the further increase of his breiber his honor and tetritory yet not trufting altogether to his owne aduice, he entred into conful- lundin wha tation with his brother Iundu, which way was best to take to distresse and bring in subjection for the opposit his neighbous the Christians. In which case, Jundus a man of greater courage than discretion, sugof the shell aduised him with al celerity to vrge his good fortune, and presently to inuade the Christians files, bu already discouraged with the losse of Cara-Chisar. But this counsell 'altogether pleased not Otheman, for (fayd he (the castles and forts by vs gained, must be kept with strong garrisons, otherwise they will againe be recoursed of the enemy; which garrisons cannot be maintained and kept, if we spoyle or dispeople the countries adioining upon vs. for in so doing we shal (as it were) with our hands cut our owne throats : wherefore I thinke it better, that we enter into a league of amity and friendship with the Christians round about vs; which league we will keep with some, and break with others, as shall serue best for our purpose. And according to this resolution, he made peace indeed with all the Christians, but specially with Michael Costs, captain of Hirmen-Caia castle, of whom we have before spoken, who afterward served him to great vse in the managing of his wars, and became also a renegat of the Mahometan religion. All this Othoman did the rather, because he was then at great variance with one Germean Ogli (a great man among the Turks, but one of the Selznetian family) who enuying at the rifing of Orhoman, sought by all means possible to hinder his greatnes, as did also the others his quietnesse: which discord the Christians liked well, as a meane for them to live in more rest by.

In the meane time, Othoman deuised with all carefulnes to beautifie and strengthen his new common people; and for the greater concourse of people, built a faire temple in Cara-Chisar for the exercise of the mahometan religion; appointed markets to be kept in al peaceable maper, in his great townes, granting great priviledges to such as resorted thither, as well Christians as Turks wing therein fuch justice; that all forts of people without feare, in hope of gaine reforting thither, furnished his countrey and towns with all things necessary: yet this care of civill policy and government could not fo withdraw him, but that according to his afpiring mind, he had alwaies a greater defire and care to inlarge his possessions and territory. Wherfore intending to make a rode into Bithynia, he requested Michael Coss, the Christian captain before mentioned, to deliuer his opinion what was best to be done: who so politickly directed him in that exploit, that he returned vi & corious, enriched with great spoyle and more honour. This road fo terrified most of the Christians therabouts, that they were loth to give Othoman any cause of offence, for seare lest they should by him be spoyled. It fortuned about this time, that the captains of Bilezuga and Cupri-Chifar falling at ods, Otheran fee he of Cupri-Chifar first taking up armes fiercely inuaded the captain of Bilezugawho there- bit little comupon sent vnto Othoman, to pray his ayd, which he easily granted, and so without further delay menweals. presently came to him with certaine companies of lusty tall souldiers. By whose comming, the captaine of Bilezuga not a little incouraged and strengthened, set voon his enemy where betwixt them was made a sharp conflict, and divers on both sides slaine: but the victory by the help of Othernan the Turke, at length inclining to the Bilezugian, theother vanquished Captaine in all hast fled vnto his owne castle. After whom Othoman following, layd siege vnto the Castle, which at length he tooke together with the Captaine, whom he caused to be presently flaine. It is strange to tell, how proud the Lord of Bilezuga was, to have so revenged himself of his enemy, and to have gained the victory: although it were indeed gotten, not so much by his ownevalour as by the prowesse of the Turke : for whom and his followers in token of his thankfulnesse, he caused a great feast to be provided in the countrey there, whereby he honourably entertained them: and in the end of the feast, caused garments of great price (according to the manner of the Easterne nations) to be given to Othoman, in token of his favour; and his fouldiers to be also bountifully rewarded: but this was done with such a presumptious state and grace, as if he had been some great Prince, offering vnto the common souldiers F of the Turkes, in passing by them, his hand to kisse, as a great fatiour. With which exceeding insolency, Othoman was so much offended, that he had much adoe to hold his hands from him : yet repressing his anger, hee in secret imparted his discontentment vnto his cousin Dunder, his vncle Dunders sonne, grieuously complayning of the intollerable pride of the Christian captain, and of the disgrace by him done to the Turks, in offering them his hand to kifferequiring his opinion how he were for the same to be corrected: who but a little before, of being by the faid captaine made his lieutenant, franckely told his kinfman, That as then new thing was to be attempted against him: first, for that on the one side they had Germem. Oglisa great man among the Sel Juccian Turks) their enemy, and round about them besides they were enuironed with the Christians, whom he should have al in his neck at once if he should offer the Bilezugian captaine any wrong. By which answer, Othoman perceiving his cosins greated fection towards the Christian captain, and doubting to have the mischiefe he had imagined against him, by him reuealed, or at leastwise hindered; without more ado suddenly taking we his bow in his hand with an arrow shot him quite through, and so slew him.

Not long after, Michael Cosi the captaine of Hirmen. Caia, Othemans great friend, hauing concluded a marriage between a gentleman of that countrey and his daughter, inuited all the H Christian captaines of the castles thereabouts, requesting them to come to the marriage and the rather, that fo they might grow into acquaintance with Othoman, whole power begannon to grow dreadfull vnto them : hoping that fuch means might be found at that merry meeting that all being made friends, every man might in more fecurity possesses without frame of being spoiled by him. Vnto this mariage came all these bidden guests, bringing with them fuch prefents as they thought good to bestow upon the new married folkes, according to the maner of the country but Othernans gifts far exceeded al the rest, who besides many other rich things, gave vnto them whole flocks and droves of sheep and cattel: which thing drew all the Christian captains into no little admiration of his bounty, infomuch that they began to fav among themselves, that Othemans wealth and good fortune did portend some greater matter, 1 to their otter ruin and fall: which to preue no, they thought it best by secret means to compasse his death. The execution of which device they referred to the captaine of Bilezuga, as puto one with him best acquainted. This captain was of great wealth credit, and authority among the Christian rulers thereabours, but very full of crass and distinutation; which his entill dis polition, Othoman of long time well perecived, yet having occasion to vie him, in fubrill man ner gaue him (in outward thew) all the honour he could, magnifying him in words, and deba fing himselfe as plaine and poore in comparison of him. But to give a beginning to this tree cherous deuile, the captaine meeting with Othoman, in friendly manner told him how that the intended shortly to marry, the daughter of the Captaine of Iar-Chifar, earnestly requesting him to honour that his marriage with his presence of the time whereof, he said he would give r him farther knowledge arterwards and all was but a colour, to bring Othoman within his dalger, not fearing any such treason. Othernan understanding that the time of the marriage drew nigh, fent thither a present of certain fat exen and sheep, in the name of his brother Junductor the captains prouision against the marriage y certifying him, that Othoman himselfe, with his fimple retinue, would be present at the marriage; and then present him, not with such present as were agreeable vnto his honour, yet such as his poore ability could afford. This message with the Presents were wonderfull welcome to the Captaine, hoping assuredly that his deuts fed trechery would take such effect as he wished; and therefore calling vnto him Michael Coff, in whom he had reposed an especiall trust, declared to him his whole deuise (whereof he was not before altogether ignorant) requesting him to take the pains to go vnto Othoman to bring l him to the marriage, the time being now certainly appointed & at hand; which he knew Coffe might easily do, being of his familiar acquaintance: and in token of great friendship, he sent to Othoman by the same messenger, a present of gilt plate. Cossi tooke vpon him this message, which when he had deliuer'd to Othoman, he found him very willing to go, as a man not doubting any harme. But Coss inwardly grieuing to see so braue a man, and his kind friend, by such trecherous maner to be brought to his end, moued with compassion, discouered vnto him the whole conspiracy of the captaine against him, and of the plot laid for his destruction, willing him to take heed vnto himfelfe: for which verture, Othoman gaue Coffi great thankes, as to his friend for fauing his life; and withall richly rewarded him, promifing greater matters if he would continue that his faithfull friendship. Now concerning the captain of Bilezuga (faith he) at your return recommend me vnto him, and tell him, That I thinke my felfe much bound vn'o him for many courtesies, but especially for that he hath heretofore divers times in most friendly manner protected my goods and cattell, within the safegard of his castle: which his friendship I most humbly request him to continue for one yeare more, inforced thereunto by reason of the dangerous wars betwixt me and the Prince Germean-Ogli, as he well knoweth: wherfore if it might to stand with his good pleasure, I would presently fend unto his Castle fuch things as I make most reckoning of requesting him once more to be the faithful keeper therof, as he hath bur before : and telling him further, that my mother in law, with her daughter my wife, defire nothing more than to find opportunitie to be acquainted with the honourable Lade his mother for which caute, if it please him, I will bring them both with mee to the mariage. This othomans request when the Captain of Bilezuga understood by Michael Cosi, he fent the same Coss back again to hasten his comming, willing him to bring with him what guests he pleased; appointing the certain time and place when and where the mariage should be solemnised. And because the castle of Bilezuga was thought to be too little, conueniently to receive the multitude of people that were expected at the mariage, there was an other open place of greater receit appointed in the country for that purpose, about 3 miles distant from the castle. The mariage day drew nigh, wherunto Othoman must repaire for his promile fake: and therfore prepared with all diligence to fet forward, and to put in execution what he had deuised for his own safety, and destruction of his enemy. Othoman had of long accustomed in dangerous times to send by caringe the best of his things made vo in packs, to be kept in fafety in the castle of Bilezugavinder colour wherof he now made great packs in form as he was wont; but in stead of his rich houshold. Stuffe and other things of price he thrust in armed men, couering those packs with homely courrings, sending them by carriages to the castle of Bilezuga, charging that they should not come thither before twilight. After that, he apparelled certain of his best soldiers in womans attyre, as if it had bin his wife & mother in law with their women: fo casting his journy, that he with these difguised soldiers and the other sent in packs, might at one instant meet at the castle aforesaid. The captain being now in the country, & vnderstanding that Othoman was comming in the euening with a great train of gentlewomen; thought the cause of his late comming to be, for that the Turkish women vie to shun the sight of Christian men by all means they can. Qthoman being now come to the place in the country where the mariage was the next day to be folemnifed, having done his humble reuerence to the Captain, requested him to do him the honor, that his gentlewomen which were nigh at hand, might by his appointment be fent to his Castle, there to have some convenient lodging, where they might alight and bestow themselves apart from others, according to the homely manners of their nation, lest peraduenture the presence of so honourable a company of noblemen and gallants might out them out of countenance: Which the Captain granted, & having faluted them afar off after the Tunkish maner, commanded them to be conveied to his castle, making reckoning of them all as of a rich prey. At the same time that these disguised souldiers arrived at the castle, came thicken also the other soldiers covered in packs in the cariages, who follow as as they came into the castle; suddenly leaping out of the packs and drawing their short swords, with the help of their disguised sellows slew the warders of the castle, and without more ado possessed the same; the greatest part of the Captains people being before gon out of the castle to the place of the mariage. Othoman having taried follong with the Captaine, as he supposed the Castle as that time was by his men sur. E prised so soon as the Captain had taken his chamber, suddenly took horse with all his sollowers, accompanied also with Goffi, taking his way directly to the castle of Bilezuga. Of whose the captaint of fudden departure the Captain understanding, presently took horse and pursued him with all broady in. his train (which were for the most part drunk) and outertaking him before he came to the Ca king the and h Ale, set vpon him; in which conflict he was by othoran flain, and the rest put to flight.

The same night Othoman vsing great celeritie, early in the morning surprised the Castle of flux. Iarchifar, where also he took prisoner the Captain therof, with his fair daughter Lulufer (who should have bin maried vnto the Captain of Bilezuga the next day) with all fler friends, as they were ready to have gon vnto the mariage: which fair Lady he thortly after maried vnto his eldest fan Orchanes, who had iffue by her Amurath third King of the Turkes, and Solyman F Baffa.

Otheman omitting no opportunitie, presently sent one of his Captains called Durgut Alpes,a man of great efteem and valor, to befiege the castle of Einegiol. Wherin he vsed such celeritie, that preuenting the fame of that was done at Bilezuga, hee fuddenly enuironed the Castle in such fort that none could passe in or out ; vntill such time as that Othoman having brought his prisoners and prey to the castle of Belizuga, and there having fer all things in a good order, came with the rest of his men of war to Einegiol, which he presently by force took promiting the spoile thereof vnto his fouldiers. The captaine called Hagio Nicholane his antient enemy, he caused to be cut in small pieces, and all the men to be flainte; which crueltiehe vied, because they a little before had vied the like tyranny against his Turks.

Urloman by almintaration of suffice tirene buctb

When Othoman had thus got into his fubication a great part of the strong castles and forces of the greater Phrygia, with the territory to them belonging, he began with all carefulnes to make good lawes, and to execute justice to all his subjects as well Christians as Turkes. with great indifferencie studying by all means to keep his countrey in peace and quietnesse. and to protect his subjects from the spoile of others, as well Christians as Turks : whereby it came to passe, that the old inhabitants which had for the most part forsaken the countrey, by H reason of the great troubles therein, repaired now agains to their antient dwellings; and nor only they, but many other strangers also, supplying the places of them whom the late warres had confumed. So that by his good gouernment, that wasted countrey in short time grew to be againe very populous.

Thecityof

The civill government of his countrey well established, he besieged the city of Isnica in antient time called Nice, a city of Bithynia, famous for the generall Councell there holden against Arius in the time of Constamine the Great. This city he brought into great distresse. by placing his men of war in forts new built vpon euery passage and way leading to the same. so that nothing could be brought out of the countrey for the reliefe of the poore citisens. They in this extremity by a fecret messenger certified the Emperour of Constantinopleson. I der whose obedience they were) in what distresse the city stood; and that except he sent them present reliefe, they must of necessity either perish with famine, or yeeld themselves into the hands of their enemies the Turks. The Emperor moued with the pittifull complaint of this messenger, with all expedition embarked certain companies of souldiers from Constantinople to relieue his besieged city. But Othoman understanding by his espials, where these souldiers were appointed to land, in fecret manner withdrawing most of his forces from the siege, lay in ambuth neer to the same place where the Emperors foldiers (casting no perill) landed ; who before they could put themselves in order of battell were by Othoman and his Turks in fuch fort charged, that most part of them were there slaine, and the rest driven into the sea, where they milerably perished, Othoman having thus politickely overthrown the Constantinopolitan fouldiers, returning to the fiege, continued the same in straiter maner than before. Thebesieged citisens driven into great penury, and now dispairing of al help, yeelded themfelues with the great and rich city of Nice into the hands of othoman, with the spoile wherof he greatly inriched his men of war.

Aladin the great Sultanof Loonium, glad to heare of the good successe of Otheman against the Christians, in token of his fauour and loue, sent vnto him a faire ensigne, with certaine drums, and trumpets, a fword and princely robe, with large charters, That what foeuer he took from the Christians should be all his owne; and also that publicke prayers should be said in al the Turks temples, in the name of Othoman, for his health and prosperous estate; which two things properly belonged to the dignity of the Sultan. These extraordinary fauours gaue occasion for many to think, that Sultan Aladin (hauing no children) intended to make Othoman his adoptive fon and succeffor in his kingdome.

The presents and charters sent him, Othoman humbly accepted, sending to Aladin the fifth part of the spoile of Nice, taken from the Christians; but the princely honors due to the Sultan only, he vscd not during the life of aladin intending not long after to have gon himselse in person to visit the Sultan, and so to have grown into his further favor. But having prepared all things for fo honourable a journy, at what time as he was about to fet forward, he was certainly informed of the death of saladin; and that Sahib (one of his great counsellors) had taken vpon him the dignity of the Sultan (as is before declared:) which newes much decontented the aspiring mind of this Oguzian Turk, in good hope to have succeeded him in the kingdom, M or at lestwife to have shared the greatest part thereof vnto himselfe, whereof he was now altogether disappointed. Yet immediatly after the death of Aladin, he thought it now fit time to take vpon him the princely honours before graunted vnto him by the Sultan in his life time, which he for modesty sake had forborn, Aladin yet living, wherefore he made one Dursu sirnamed Fakitche, (viz. a man learned in the Turkish law) Bishop and Indge of Cara-Chifar, commanding the publick praiers which were wont to be made for the health and prosperous reigne of the great Sultan, to be now made in his owne name; which was first openly done by the faid Bishop in the pulpit of Cara. Chifar. At the same time also he began to coin money in his owne name, and to take vpon him all other honours belonging vnto a Sultan or a King: which was about ten yeares after the death of his father Eriogral, and in the yere of our Lord 1 300, vnto which time the beginning of the great empire of the Turks is vnder the fortune of 1200 this Othoman, to be of right referred, as then by him thus begun.

When Othoman had thus taken upon him the maiesty of a King, hee made his son Orchanes Prince and gouernor of Cara-Chilar: promoting his principall followers, to be gouernours of other strong castles and forts divers of which places retaine the name of those captains at this day. He himselse made choice of the city Neapolis, about twenty miles from Nice, to Neapolisthe Leat his regall Palace in where also divers of his nobility built them houses, and changed the of the Others. name of the city, calling it Despotopolis, as who should say, the city of the Lord or Prince. Kings. For all this, Otheman cealed not to deuise by all meanes he could to augment his kingdome: and for that cause being accompanied with his son Orchanes, made many rodes into the countries adioyning upon him, furprizing fuch places as might best serue his purpose, for the enlargement of his kingdome, all which in particular to rehearse were tedious.

The Christian Princes, rulers of the countries bordering vpon this new kingdome, fearing Prufa bestieged lest the greatnes of Othoman might in short time be their vtter confusion, agreed to joyne all their forces together, and so to commit to the fortune of one great battell their owne estates with his: according to which resolution, the Christian consederate Princes, which were for the most part of Mysia, and Bithynia, lenying the greatest forces they were able to make, with fire and fword inuaded Othomans kingdome: who having knowledge before hand of this great preparation made against him, had in a readinesse all his captains and men of warre: and heaging that his enemies had entred his dominion, in warlike manner marched directly towards them; and meeting with him in the confines of Phrygia and Bithynia, fought with them a great and mortall battell, wherein many were flain on both fides, as well Turks as Christians: and after a long fight, obtained of them a right bloudy victory. In this battell Castelianus, one of the greatest Christian captains was slain:another called Tekensis of the countrey which he gouerned in Phrygia, chased by Othoman vnto the castle of Vlubad, not farre distant from the place where the battell was fought, was for feare deliuered vnto him by the captaine of the fame castle, and was afterward by Othomans commandement most cruelly cut in pieces, within the view of his chiefe castle: which Othoman afterward subdued, with all the country thereabouts. The other Christian Princes and captaines saued themselues by flying into stronger holds farther off. The Prince of Bithynia chiefe author of this warre, fled into the strong city, Prusa, which the Turks now call Burusa, whether Othoman not long after led his army, in hope to have woon the fame; but finding it not possible to bee taken by force began presently at one time to build two great and strong castles upon the chief passages leading to the city, which castles he with great industry finished in one yeare: and in the one placed as captaine Actemeur his nephew, in the other one Balaban zuck, both men of great courage, and skilfull in feats of warre: and in this fort having blocked up the city of Prula, so that little or nothing of the captaines before named. Othoman returning home to Neapolis, honorably rewarded his foldiers, according to their deserts, establishing such a quiet & pleasing gouernment in his kingdom, that people in great number resorted from far into his dominions, there to seat themselves: whereby his kingdom became in few yeares exceeding populous, and he for his politick government most famous. And so living in great quietnesse certaine yeares, being now become aged and much troubled with the gout; his old foldiers accustomed to line by the wars, abhorring peace, came to him, requesting him as it were with one voice, to take some honourable war in hand, for the inlarging of his kingdom, with great cheerfulnes offring to spend their liues in his service, rather than to grow old in idlenes: which frowardnesse of his men of war greatly pleased him, and so giving them thanks, for that time dismiss them, promising that he would not be long vinmind-could without great danger be brought into it, he subdued the most part of Bithynia; and for returned home, leaving the two castles well manned with strong garrisons, under the charge

full of their request. But yet thinking it good to make all things safe at home before he took of any great wars in hand abroad, thought it expedient to call vnto him Michael Cosi the onely Chustian Captain whom for his great deserts he had at all times suffred to live in quiet with his possessions, as it were in the heart of his kingdome; and by faire means (if it might be in perfuade him to forfake the Christian Religion, and become a follower of Mahomets, foto take away all occasion of mistrus: which if he should refuse to do, then forgetting all former friendthip, to make war vpon him as his vtter enemy. Wherupon Coffe was fent for, being per. fuaded by the meisenger, that Othoman had fent for him, because he had occasion to viehis wonted faithfull counfell & service in a great exploit which he had intended, as he had often. times before. Celli thinking of nothing leffe than of that which enfued, came accompanied with fuch foldiers as he thought to vie in that service: But comming vnto Othoman, and vnder. H countries the finding the very cause why he was fent for, and seeing danger eminent on every side, kissing twint's This. Orbinates hand, after the maner of the Turks, requested him in courteous manner to enter him in the principles of the Mahometan religion, which he promifed euerafter to embrace: And to faving certains words after Othoman, he turned Turke, to the great displeasure of God, and the contentment of Othoman & his nobility. For which his revolting, Othoman presently gave him an entigne and a rich robe, tokens wherby the Mahometan Sultans affure their vaffals of their fauour and the vindoubted pofferfion of fuch land and liuing as they then hold.

Oftentimes after this, Othernan for the contenting of his fouldiers, inuaded the countries bordering youn him, tooke many strong castles and forts, subdued the most part of Phrygia, Miffia and Bithynia and other great regions, vnto the Euxin fea: and being now very aged and discased as is asoresaid with the gout, and thereby vnable to go into the field in person him. felic, oftentimes fent his sonne Orchanes against his enemies; who to the imitation of his sa-

Now happily might the confiderate reader (and not without just cause) maruel, what dead fleep had overwhelmed the Greeke Emperors of those times; first Michael Paleologia, and afterwards his fonne Andronicus, both men of great valour, and ftill refiant at Constantinople, thus to fuffer the Turks (not Othoman for he as yet bare no fway but others the sharers of Sultan Aladins Kingdome) to take their cities, spoyle their countries, kil their subiects, and daily to incroch upon them in the leffer Afia, and especially in Bithynia, so neere unto them, and as it were even under their nofes: But let him with me, here as in a most convenient place but g breathe a little, and confider the troubled state of that declining Empire, now hasting toan end; and he shal plainly see the causes of the decay thereof, and how like an old diseased body quite ouerthrown and ficke to death, it became at length a prey vnto the afpiring Turks. Michael Palcologus having by great trechery obtained the Greeke empire, and by rare fortune reconcred also the city of Constantinople from Baldwin the Emperor (as is in the former partof this History declared) fearing the power of the Princes of the West, but especially of Charles king of Sicilia, then a prince of great fame and power, whom he knew Balamin (the late Empty ror) cealed not to folicite for the restitution of him againe into his Empire, and to have also ioyned with him a neere bond of affinity, by marrying his daughter vnto Charles his forhesto auert this danger, and to intangle Charles with troubles neere home, by his Embassadors offered vnto Gregory the tenth, then Bishop of Rome, to vnite and confirme the Greeke Church vnto the Latine, and to acknowledge the Bishops supremacy, in such fort as that it should be lawful for any man to appeale vnto the Court of Rome, as vnto the higher and most excellent Court; of which his offer the Pope gladly accepted, promising to performe what he had be fore requested, for the keeping of Charles otherwise busied. But when it came to the point, Charles, that this reformation and alteration of Religion in the Greek Church should be made, soft the Patriarch, to begin with all, gaue up his place, and shortly after for faking the city, retired himselfe into a monastery neer vnto the streit of Bosohorus, where he at quiet deuoutly spent the rest of his life. The rest of the clergy also discontented with this innovation, in their sermons openly inneighed against it, persuading the people not to receive it; crying out, That I now was come the time of their trial, the time of their martyrdome, and the time wherin they were to receive the glorious crown of their painfull fufferings; infomuch, that great tumults were therupon raifed, and all the city and country in an vproare: for it was not the clergy only, and the vulgar people by them moued, which disliked & abhord these the Emperors procee-ings, & made these stirs, but many of the better fort, yea, of the chiefe magistrats themselues Bio. So that Michael Paleolog w the Emperor leaving all other forrein busines, was enforced to onuertall his power and study vnto the appearing of these domesticke troubles, as deeming hem of greater danger than those abroad. And first to persuade his discontented subjects, he old them, That this alteration was made not for any good liking he had thereunto, but in repect of the dangerousnes of the time : and that it was a point of wisedome, to foresee dangers hanging ouer our heads, & not to delay, if any thing were to be altred, for the auerting therof: for if the enemies (as he faid) should come, the city yet in many places rent, or but lately repaired, and as it were but newly raised from death to life, the present mischiefs would be sar greacer than those forepassed, and that then their enemies would become lords not of their religion and ceremonies only, but of all at once, their wives, their children, & what soever els they had: where their liberty changed into bondage, they should be constrained to conforme them. selues not with their bodily seruice only, but even with their minds also, vnto the wills of the Latines their enemies. And that fo it would come to passe, that no man should be able to keep the old customs and maners of their ancestors, but should see even their most facred rites and ceremonies changed & quite ouerthrown. Which he carefully foresceing, had not (as he said) refused to yeeld into necessity, and as wisdome would, neglected a little harme in respect of a greater benefit; and in the leffe to have yeelded vnto his enemies, to enjoy the benefit of the greater. With which the emperors perfuation fome were moued, and fo held themselues contented : and some others not; against whom he was inforced to vie other more seuere remedies, as against his rebellious subjects: of whom some he imprisoned, some he banished, some respection in he tormented, some he dismembred, some he bereft of their sight, or consisted their goods, the church for matvfing (in briefe) all the means whereby the minds of the refolute or the weake were to be moued. All which things, they whose zeale was grounded voon knowledge (in number fewest) with patience indured: but the greater part void of judgement, and the refuse of the people in fimple attire, ranne rogueing abroad, some into Peloponesus, some into Thracia, some into Achaia, & some as far as Colchos, as men persecuted for their conscience, not regarding greatly whither, so it were out of the emperors jurisdiction, and somthing fitting their own humors neither conforming themselues vnto the religion then commonly by the emperor establisht, neither yet agreeing among themselues, but taking vnto them divers names, some as the disciples of Arfenius, some of logeph, and some of others; some of them, themselves deceived, and deceiuing others also. Thus for the avoiding of forrein danger out of the West, was the Empire at home no little indangered, and the state therof shaken. Wherewith the Emperor was so encombred, as that he had no leifure to prouide for the tempest arising by the Turks out of the East, but was inforced wholly to imploy himself & al his indeauors to the keeping of his people & subjects in their due obedience at home. All whose deep deuises, first in aspiring to the empire, no way vnto him due, & great trauels afterwards for the affuring of the fame to himfelfe and his posterity, against all right, even with the alteration of the religion of his fathers, yeelding him in the winding vp of all, not fo much as credit of an honorable sepulture: but dying in these troubles not far from Lifymachia, as hewas making preparation against the prince of Thessalie, was there by his son Andronicus his commandement (for whose aduancement he had strained both his faith and honor) obscurely buried in a field, a good way from his camp, as vnworthy of a better sepulture, for revolting from the antient religion of his ancestors, although his obsequies were for fashion sake afterward with some solemnity celebrated. This was the end of the great emperor Michael Paleologus, in whose time the Turks, the successors of Aladin, greatly incroched upon him in the leffer Afia, as is in part before declared: a man greatly adorned with the good gifts both of the body and the mind, had he not for the aduancement of himselfe and his posterity, stained the same with soule treachery and apostacie; for which(as some say) he euer after lived in conscience troubled, and dying was even by his own fon not thought worthy of an honorable funerall. A notable example unto all fuch as with agreer dinesse leeke after vaine glory, and foolishly expose themselves unto such adventures, a oftentimes overwhelme their deepest denices having in themselnes no certainty, preferring their inordinate desires (et hor for themselves or their posterity) before that which is good and wertuous. Twice wretched in so doing; first in their folly, and then in their indeanors : who beside that they finde God himselfe against their designes and purposes, they by and by also evidently meet with other things than what they had for-

casted contrary unto them; and so themselves oftentimes, contrary to their expettation, cast headlong in. to extreame mifery: for lo cuen he of whom we now speake, otherwise a man of great wisedome, and ho pie in his doings, ouercome with his affection towards his children, in desiring to leave unto them the Rm. pire, when as he ought to have cast all the care both of himselfe and of them, especially upon the providence of God; he like a blind man following his owne deepe conceits, not grounded upon the feare of God, but voon mans wisedome onely, cast himselfe before he was aware, into miserable troubles, and became odion even unto his subjects, and them also for whom he had forgot himselfe. For whereas God had even from his childhood allotted wato him the Empire (as was by many enident fignes and tokens to have beene on thered) if he could have moderated his votimely desires, kept his tongue from perjury, and his hands from blond, and not turned out of the way after strange doctrine; he had by many degrees excelled even the bell Emperors hu predecessors : whereas now he lieth obscurely buried, shrouded in the sheet of defame, u the report of his foule and faithleffe dealings far exceeding all his other worthy vertues.

Andronicus Paleologus succeeding his father in the Empire, and thinking by restoring again the government of the church, together with the rites and customes of the Greeks, to have appeafed all fuch troubles as were before by his father raifed, by bringing in those of the La. tines: found himselse therein much deceived, and his troubles no leffe than his fathers: they which had before received the Latine customes, and well liking of them, with great obstine. cie defending the same; and the other of the contrary faction now countenanced by the Emperor, without modesty or measure insulting upon them: whereof arose exceeding great stirs and troubles, especially in the beginning of his raigne: to the great benefit of the incroching Turks, who in the mean time ceased not by all means to increase their territories in Asia; and not only there, but in the Islands of the Mediterranean sea also. For Andronicus by the death of Charles King of Sicily, deliuered of the greatest feare for which both he and his father before him had to their great cost and charge both built and maintained a strong fleet of gallies. now persuaded by some, whose action and speeches were after the manner of the Court, all framed voon the Princes appetite, (as the readiest way to thrine, without respect of the common good) to spare that needlesse charge (as they termed it) which yerely cost him more than any thing else; had discharged all his mariners and sea men, and commanded all the gallies to be laid vp, some in one creeke, some in another; where neglected and not looked vnto, they in time for the most part rotted and perished. As for the marriners, they went some one way, fome another, as their fortunes led them, to feeke for their liuings in forrein countries, euen with the Emperors enemies 3 and fome gaue themselues to husbandry, thinking it better by doing something to live, than by sitting stil to perish. Which good husbandry at the first seemed to be very profitable vnto the Emperour, but especially vnto such as being neere vnto him, and conetoully given, made small reckoning of all other the most necessary defences of the empire, in comparison of hoording vp of mony, vatill that it was afterward too late by experience found hereof to have fprung many great mischieses, vnto the great weakning of the Greeke Empire. For besides, that the Turks without let did great harme on the seasthe Pyrats now out of feare of the Emperours gallies, at their pleasure tooke the spoile of the rich Islands in the Mediterranean, and robbed the towns all along the sea coast, to the vnspeakable griefe of the poore country people: and yer not fo contented, came with their gallies, fome. I time two, sometime three, and sometime moe, as it were in contempt, euen close vnto the Imperiall city. Yea, the Venetians were so bold, as vpon a right small displeasure to risle and afterward to fet fire vpon the suburbs thereof, which they would hardly haue aduentured, had the Emperors fleet been preserved and maintained in the wonted strength.

At the same time also Andronicus the Emperor (to the great hindrance of the affaires of the empire, and aduantage of the forrein enemy) was not a little troubled with a jealous suspition of his brother Constantine (commonly called Porphyrogenisus) as if he had fought to haue aspired vnto the empire; feeking by all means to win vnto himfelfe the loue and fauor of all men, but especially of the nobility both at home & abroad, and so by that means to mount vnto the height of his desires: All which (as most men thought) were but meere slanders, maliciously M deuised by such as enuying at his honor, & taking occasion by the emperors suspition, ceases not to increase the same, untill they had wrought his vnworthy destruction. The first ground of this false suspition in the Emperors head, was, for that, that this Confantine euen from his childehood, was for many causes, better beloued of the old Emperour his father, than vonicas, as better furnished with those gists of nature which beautiste a Prince, and of a more curteous behauior than was his brother; infomuch that had he not bin the yonger brother, his ather could willingly haue left him his fuccessor in the empire. This was one and the chiefest cause of the emperors grudge, and the ground of his suspition. Yet was there another also, and that not much leffe than this: for that his father in his life time had of long thought to haue Reparated from the empire a great part of Theffalia & Macedonia, and to have made him absolute Prince thereof; and had haply so done, had he not bin by death preuented: which thing also much grieued Andronicus, and the more insenced him against his brother. Which his secret hatred he for all that, according to his wisedome, cunningly dissembled, not only during the time that his father lived, but three yeres after his death alfo, making thew of the greatest loue and kindenesse towards him that was possible. Constantine in the meane time, of such great reuenues as were by his father affigned vnto him, reaping great profit, most bountifully bestowed the same upon his followers and sauorits, and others that made sute unto him, as well the meaner fort as the greater, and with his fweet behaulour woon unto him the hearts of all men: for affability and curtefie in high degree eafily allureth mens minds, as do faire floures in the spring the passengers eies. This was the precept of the wife Indians, That the higher a Prince was in dignity, and the more curteous he shewed himselfe vnto his inferiors, the better he should be of them beloued. He therfore that should for the two first causes blame Constantine, should do him wrong; as both proceeding not of himselfe, but of his fathers too much loue : but in the third he was not altogether blamelesse; for if for want of experience he prodigally gaue such gifts, as for the most part might have beseemed the Emperor himselfe, Immoderate he ignorantly erred, yetdid he no little offend : but if he knew, that for his too profuse bounty bounty in great he could not be vnsuspected of his brother, and yet without regard held on that course, he was greatly to be blamed therein. For if nothing else might have moved him, yet he should haue considered, to what end the like doings of others in former times had sorted, and how many it had brought to untimely end. So although perhaps that Constantine meant no harme anto his brother, or any way to supplant him, yet did not these things a little increase and aggrauate the former suspitions, and open the cares of the Emperour his brother vnto such calumniations as commonly attend vpon immoderate bounty. But to returne to our purpose, this honorable Constantine then lived in Lydia, but lately married, and in good hope long to live, being not past thirty yeres old: but pleasantly spending the time with his wife at Nymphea in Lydia, at such time as he was thus secretly accused vnto his brother, the Emperour thought it good, as vpon other occasions of businesse, to passe ouer into Asia himselfe, but indeed with a fecret resolution, vpon the sudden to oppresse his brother vnawares, as by proofe it fell out. For at his comming ouer, Constantine fearing nothing lesse, was forthwith apprehended, with all his greatest fauorits, of whom one Michael Strategopolus (somtime a man in great authority with the emperor his father, and of all other, for wealth, honor, and noble a &s most famous) was chiefe : who together with Conftantine were fast clapt in prison, where we will leaue them euery houre looking to die, their lands and goods being before confiscated. But these worthy men, especially Constantine and Strategopulus, thus laid fast: who many times in great battels discomfitted the Turks, and notably descended the frontiers of the Empire a long the East side of the river Meander, they now finding none to withstand them, forraged not only all the rich country beyond the river, but with an infinit multitude passing the same, did there great harme alfo: fothat there was no remedy, but that the Emperor must of necessity makechice of some other worthy captaine for the defence of those his cities and countries, by the incursion of the Turks then in danger in that part af Asia.

There was then in the Emperours court one Alexius Philanthrepenus, a right valiant and ronowned captaine, and then in the floure of his youth; of him the Emperour thought good to make choice for desence of those frontiers of his empire in the lesser Asia (against the Turks) which were before, the charge of his brother Constantine and Strategopulus, joyning to him one Libadarius, an old famous captain, and a man of great experience alfo: appointing vnto him the gouernment of the ciries of Ionia; and vnto the other the frontiers along the winding bankes of Meander. Where Alexius having now gotten a charge worthy his valor, and in many great conflicts with the Turks ftill carrying away the victory, became in short time of great fame: besides that, he was exceeding bountifull and curteous vnto all men; a costly, but a ready way 0 2

vnto dangerous credit and renown. Thus at the first all things prospered in his hand according to his hearts desire: yea the Turks themselves, bordring vpon him, hardly beset on the one side by the Tartars, & on the other by himselfe; and yet not so much feared with their enemies by hind them, as moved with his courtefie, came over to him with their wives and children and ferued themselves (many of them) in his camp. But as they fay, That in Iupiters court no man might drinke of the tun of bliffe, but that he must taste also of the tun of worso fell it out with this great captain, who having but tafted of the bitter tun, had the worfe all poured full vpon his head For Libadarius feeing all to prosper with him, and somewhat enuying thereat, began to feare & suspect, lest he proud of his good fortune, and now grown very strong, casting off his allegiance, should aspire vnto the empire, and so first begin with him, as the neerest vnto him: which thing many of the nobility secretly surmised also, but how truly many doubt. But this a enuions plot was not yet ripe, but lay as fire raked up in the afthes. Now there was with Alexiu Philar thropenus, certaine companies of Cretenfians, whom for their good feruice and fideling he both honored and trusted aboue others, vsing them all for the gard of his own person. These men proud of their credit, hearing of the furmifed afpiring of their Generall, & in hope by his advancement to raise their own fortunes also, ceased not continually to suggest vnto him high conceits of himfelf, and to perfuade with all fpeed to take the matter vpon him; the very conccir whereof(as they faid) would be vnto him no leffe danger, than if he should enter into the action it felfe, as he might well fee by the wofull examples of the noble Constantine and Stratigopulus, both in extreame perill but for the jealous conceit furmifed against them. Which quicke fugge flions wrought in his great mind divers, & those most contrary motions, so that he scarce knew himselfe what he would or would not. For they which are unto themselves in conscience guilty of any grienous crime, if any mischiese hang oner their heads therefore, it happeneth umo them as foreknowing and expetting the same even from the time that they offended : unto whom, if nothing elfe, yet that fame very forcknowledge eafeth not a little the griefe and mifery : whereas comrain wise, they which are with sudden mischiefes, and unlooked for, overwhelmed, not knowing any just cause why, must needs stand as men dismaid, and almost beside themselves. But at length after divers great conflicts with himselfe, the euill persuaders of rebellion prevailed with him. Yet did heat the first forbid any mention to be made of him in the army as Emperor: which caused the Cretensians, the chiefe authors of his rebellion, almost to force him forthwith to take vpon him the imperiall ornaments, therby to confirme the minds of his followers and favorits: for that T fuch refolutions were (as they faid) forthwith to be put into execution, neither that any thing required so joynt celerity and dexterity both of the mind and the hand; and for that longer delay would but fill his foldiers heads with doubts, and discourage them with the seare of the vncertainty of the euent : all which for all that moved not him fo to do; but whether for feare of the greatnes of the danger, or for that he secretly thought how first to circumuent Libadarisu, of whom he stood most in doubt is uncertaine. The report of all which his doings and defignes were in short time carried first vnto Libadarius, as the necrest, and so in post vnto the empetor:who were therewith not a little both disquieted. And had Alexim (as some persuaded him) at the first set vpon Libadarius, then unprovided, no doubt but he had done much : but God, by whom all Princes reign, and whose power confoundeth the deuises of the proud, tur- L ned him from Libadarius, by whom he was to be oppressed, to follow after Theodorus the Emperors brother, of whom he was to haue feared no harme. This Theodorus, the first man that 4lexim shot at, warned by his brother Constantines harme, lived a pleasant privat life in Lydia, far from the ambition of the court, and therefore fo much the more beloued of the Emperor: but Alexius fearing left in that hurle many should resort vnto him, as vnto the Emperors brother, and so hinder his proceedings, thought best first to make him sure, and afterward to op-Librdarius op- presse Libadarius not aware, that in stead of the body, he followed but after the shadow. But p-tab bing-life Libadarius, as a man of great experience, taking the benefit of this his overfight, and knowing unding of this mony to be the finewes of warre, gathered together all the coune he possibly could, both of his owne and his friends, sending also for the Emperours Treasures to Philadelphia, and M with all speed raised the greatest power he possibly could out of Ionia, which he furnished with all things necessary, promising vnto his fouldiers great matters, and filling them with greater hopes, and that within ten daies he would with a great army meet the Robell in the heart of Lydia, and there dare him battell. But withall confidering that the Cretenfians, men but of a mercinary faith, had always the gard of Alexius his person, he thought good to make proofe if they might with gold be woon to betray him: and fo well wrought the matter by great sums of mony presently given, and promises of greater presements with the Emperor, that they (somwhat before discontented with Alexius his slacknes, and now doubting also his fucceffe) yeelded vnto his defire, promifing in the beginning of the battel to deliner him into his hands, which they shortly after in the very joyning of the battell accordingly performed, delivering him fast bound vnto Libadarius his enemy. Who not a little proud thereof, vied him with great infolency, and within three daies after put out his eies, for feare the Emperor according to his curteous nature should have given his pardon; and so kept him in prison vntill the Emperors pleasure were further knowne. Thus through false suspect and ambition were the greatest champions of the Grecke Empire brought to confusion. Now after this rebellion of Philanthropenus, Andronicus became so jealous of his own peo- Andronicus Le ple, as that he wish not whom to trust, reposing greater considence in strangers, than in his own Greekempe or Tubjects, to the great hurt of his estate. At the same time it fortuned, that the Messagers (com. trust in fortuned, that the Messagers (com. trust in fortuned, that the Messagers (com. monly called Alani) which then dwelt beyond Ister, being Christians, but oppressed by the aid, than in the European Tartais, weary of their flauery, fent secretly vnto the Greeke Emperor Andronicus, greatly harteth offring that if he would affigue vnto them a convenient place for them to dwell in they would bis flate. come ouer vnto him with ten thousand of their families, and faithfully serue him in his wars against the Eurks (who then grieuously wasted his countries in Asia, destitute of good captains and commanders:) which their offer he gladly excepted, as standing then in need of aid, & not greatly trusting his own people. But when there Massagets, in stumber about 10000, comming Ouer with their wives and children, were to be furnished with all things, and specially the men with horses, armor, and pay, (all which the Emperor could not of himselfe doe) the subjects were therewith hardly charged, and Commission sent out into every country and province, for the taking up of horses and armor senery city enery country towns and village, enery gentlemans house and poore mans cottage, was searched and ransacked, and all things taken from them, that was there found fit for feruice, to their great discontentment, enery man murmuting and grudging to have his armes taken from him, and given to strangers : but when they were also to be contributers voto their pay, they then openly cut sed and banned them even vnto their faces. Yet at length (though with much ado) thefe strangers well furnished with all things necessary, were with some other forces also, shipped ouer into Asia, under the leading of Michael Paleologus the Emperors eldelt fon, and then his companion in the Empire. Who marching along it the country came and incamped about Magnefia. Where the Turks at the first, after their wonted manner retyred themselves into the high mountains and thick woods, that from thence they might more fafely learne what strength their new come enemies were of, and what discipline of war they kept: for they knew that vpon the comming of great armies many false reports did run, and that things were made far greater than indeed they were, as did of these also, as of a people inuincible; and therefore they thought it best so protract leffe than if they had beene their enemies) they came downe in good order from the mountaines, from whence at the first they aduentured but a little, but afterwards they came on surther, and with greater confidence, in such fort, as that it seemed they would ere long affault the yong Emperor in his camp. Wherewith he with the rest discouraged, without any stroke giuen retyred; the Turks still following him at the heeles. For neither he, neither the rest, any thing confidered the small number of their enemies: but as drunken men, whose heads filled with groffe vapors, are deceived in the greatnesse of the object that they see, and oftentimes the time, vntill they might fee in what fortbest to deale with them. But so hourring ouer their heads, and perceiting them oftentimes without order to roame abroad in the country fee-

king after prey, (for why, they after the manner of mercinary men spoiled their friends no think one thing to be two; so were they also in like manner with their owne feare blinded. Beside that, most commonly it falleth out, that the army which insolencie and injury forerunneth, is appointed to destruction, and by the fearefulnesse of it selfe ouembrowne before the enemy set vpon it, they themselves becomming enemies to themselves and Gods just vengeance appointing vnto them such an end as their deeds have deserved : neither was it like that they should doe any great good, that at their first setting forth, in stead of provision, carried our with them the bitter curses and execuations of their friends. Michael the Emperor seeing the Maffagets fly, and not daring with those few hee had left, to oppose himselfe against his c enemies retyred himselse into the strong castle of Magnelia, there to expect what would be come of these mischieses. But the Massagets spoiling the country of the poore Christiant as they went, marching directly to the streit of Helespontus, and there againe passed ouer into Europe, as if they had beene therefore only fent for ouer the river Ister, to shew the Turks the fooner the way vnto the fea in Afia. For it was not many daies after, but that Michael the Em. peror being returned to Constantinople, the Turks comming downe with a great power fulle ducd all the Countries, even vnto the coast of Lesbos, to the great ruine and weakening of the Grecke Empire.

It was not long after these great stirs made by the Massagets, but that one Rongerius (some. time a notable piratibut as then a most famous Captaine) hearing of the great entertainment that the Greeke Emperor gaue vnto strangers, by messengers sent for that purpose offred vnto Remerius what him his feruice in his wars against the Turks, as had before the Massagets. This Rouzerius of whom we speake, had out of Catalonia a Province of Spaine, and out of that part of France which is called Narbonensis, and some other places also, gathred together a great number of base needy naked men, yet lusty able bodies, and fit for service either by sea or land with whom he manned foure tall gallies, and fo as a notable pirat long time robbed, not onely the merchants trading to and fro in the Mediterranean, but landing his men oftentimes in the rich Islands, carried away thence much rich spoile also; untill at length by the mischiefe he did being become famous, and great wars then arifing betwixt Charles King of Naples, and Theo. dorus King of Sicilia, he was by Theodorus fent for and requested of aid : which he (lining of I the spoile) easily granted, and so came vnto him with a thousand horse and as many foot, all old expert foldiers, whose good service stood the King in those wars in great stead. But as the end of war is peace, so at length vpon the cuill successe of Charles, a peace being concluded betwixt the two Kings, and confirmed by a marriage betwixt their children, RonZerius living altogether by his fortunes, was to seeke for new entertainment, both for himselfe and his men, as having neither house nor certain dwelling place to repaire to but being as needy men met together, some out of one place, some out of another, in hope of booty as their fortune led them. In which case RonZerius their Generall thought it best to offer his service to the Greeke Emperor in his wars again the Turks, whereof he gladly accepted, and so fent for him : vnto whom he thortly after came with two thousand good foldiers, called (after the proud Spanish & manner) by the name of Catalonians, for that they were for the most part Spaniards of the country of Catalonia. Of whose comming the Emperor rejoycing more than he had cause (as afterward by proofe it fell out) in token of his great fauor, honored him with the name of the Great Captaine, and afterwards gaue him his neece Mary in marriage. But within a while after, when as one Tenfa another Catalonian Captaine fent for by Ronzerius, was come thither allo with more aid, the Emperor to gratific them both, gaue vnto Ronzerius the name of Cafar, and vnto the other, the name of the Great Captaine. But when these new Captains with their followers were to be transported into Asia, it is not to be spoken what harme they did by the way vnto the country people, and in the villages alongst the sea coast; abusing the men and women as their flaues, and spending their substance at their pleasure, for which they had ma- L ny a bitter curse: and this was their first yeares entertainment. The next spring they set forward to relieue the great City of Philadelphia, being as then long besieged by the Turkes, and hardly bestead without with the enemy; and within, with extreame penury and famine: which good seruice they most valiantly performed, and raised the siege. For the Turks beholding the good order of these Latine souldiers, their bright armour, and couragious comming on, rose presently and departed, not only from the city, but quite out of the Emperous territoric. Besides that, in this army were joyned vnto these Catelonians great numbers of the best souldiers of the Greeks, and all the power of the Massagets: so that had not the Emperor expressely before commanded, not to pursue them too farre, it was by many thought, all those cities and countries might then againe have beene in short time recovered from M the Turks, which they had before taken from him. But in Kingdomes appointed vnto ruine, faire occasions helpe not for the stay thereof; yea the greatest helpes provided by the worldly wise, by a secret commanding power aboue, being oftentimes connected to the destruction of that they were provided for the safegard of; as it now fell out with the Emperour and these Spanish souldiers: for this service done, the Greekes returned home, as did the Massagets alfo. But thefe Catalonians with Rongerius their Generall, roaming yound downe the Rongerius for Emperours territories in Asia, did there great harme, turning their forces (as enemies) vpon Boile Live Emthem whom they were fent for to relieue: alleadging that they had not their pay according peros for college to the Emperors promise; and that therefore they must live vpon them that had fent for them and deceived them. So were the poore people in every place spoiled, their wives and daughters rauished, their Priests and aged fathers tortured to confesse such secret store as they had : all was subject to these dissolute soldiers rage and lust; yea many of them that had nothing to redeeme themselues, vpon the greedy soldiers imagination, having their hands or feet, or fome other part of their bodies cut off, lay by the high waies fide begging an halfepenny or a peece of bread, having nothing left to comfort themselves with, more than their miserable voice and fountaines of teares: with which their wrongs and miseries, worse than those they had sustained by the Turks, the Emperor much grieued, and well the more, for that they were done by him by whom he had entertained to relieue them : but what remedy, his coffers were fo bare as that he was not able to do any thing for the redresse thereof. Ronzerius having thus spoiled the Emperors country in Asia, and lest nothing that pleased either him or his, with all his power passed ouer into Europe : and leaving all the rest his army at Calipolis, with two hundred of his men went to the young Emperour Michael (then lying with a small power at Orestias in Thracia) to demand of him his pay, or if need were to extort it from him with threats: with whose insolencie at his comming, the Emperor more offended than before, his fouldiers there prefent perceiuing the same, with their drawne swords compassing him in, fast by the court, slew him, with certaine of his followers, the rest sled in all haste to Calipolis Konzerius stain to certifie their fellowes what had happened.

Thus by the death of RonZerius, the young Emperor had thought to have discouraged the Catalonians and abated their pride, as like enough it was to have done; yet in proofe it fell not out fo, but was the cause of far greater enils. So when God prospers not mens actions, the best falleth out vnto the worst, and their wisest deuises turn to meere follies: for the Catalonians at Calipolis hearing of the death of RonZerius their Generall, first flew al the citisens in the city, and notably fortifying the same tooke that as their refuge. Then dividing their soldiers into two parts, with the one part of them manned with eight gallies, which under the leading of the great captain Ten 74, robbed and spoiled all the Merchants ships, passing the streets of Hellefpontus, to or from Constantinople: the other part left in the city, in the mean time forraging the country all about them. But Ten a shortly after encountering with a sleet of the Genowaies, well prouided for him, was by them ouerthrown, and most of his gallies sunk, and himfelse taken; but yet afterwards redeemed by his fellows, and so againe inlarged. Now the Catalonians at Calipolis fomwhat discouraged with the losse of their sleet and so many of their men, for certain days kept themselves in quiet within their wals, not knowing wel what course to take, for they feared both the Massagets and Thracians: them for that they had vpon light causes abused them, and slain diners of them in the late Asian war, and these, for that they had but euen the other day burnt their houses and spoiled their labors in the country there by: for which and other their outrages, they veterly despaired of the Emperors fauor, whom they had fo highly offended. But that which most of al terrified them, was, for that they looked for euery day, when Michael the yong Emperor, who as then lay not far off, should with a great power come to affault them: for feare of whom they call a deepe ditch about the city, with a strong counterscarse; so preparing themselves, as if they should have been even presently besieged. But the time to paffing, and the Emperor delaying his comming, they began to think of other matters: for being brought to that streit, that they could not wel tell which way to turn them, but that they were on every fide befet with danger, they upon a malicious resolution, and unto the Greekes most fatall, by messengers sent of purpose, craued aid of the Turks that dwelt on the other side of the streit ouer against them, in Asia; who presently fent them side hundred good foldiers, after whom followed also many other fugitiues and loose companions, in hope of spoile; with whom the Catalonians for the present strengthned, and being themselves three thousand strong, issued out of the city, and forraged the country therabouts, bringing in with them great heards and flocks of theep and other cattel, together with their keepers: wher with both the Emperors & their subjects incensed, prepared themselues for reuenge. This was the The water of first calling in of the Turks into Europe (that I read of) and the beginning of those endlesse a miscries wherewith the Christian commonweale hath beene euer since most gricuously afflicted, and a great part thereof ouerwhelmed; few or none griening thereat, but such as themselves tecle the heavinesse thereof, whom God in his mercy comfort.

The Catalonians and Turks now lying about Cypsella and Apri in Thrace, Michael the Lingcior with his Macedonian and Thracian fouldiers, the Massagets and the Turcopuli.en-The Turcopule Competat Apri. These Turcopuli were Turks, also in number about a thousand (who as is in the former part of this History declared) beeing fled with their Sultan Lathatines vnto the Greeke Emperor, and left behind him at fuch time as he was by the Europian Tartars deliucted, had forfaken their Mahometane superstition, and so being become Christians, were inrolled amongst the Greeke soldiers. Shortly after the Emperor (advertised by his scours of # the approch of his enemies) commanded every man to be in readinesse, and his captaines to put his army in order of battell: who feeing the enemies battell divided into three parts, put theirs also in like order, placing the Turcopuli & Massagets in the left wing, the Macedonian and I bracian choice horfemen in the right wing, and the rest with the footmen in the maine battell. At which time the Emperor himselferiding from place to place, with comfortable speeches encouraged his men to fight valiantly against their enemies. The Sun rising the ene. mics battell began to come on, in number much inferiour vnto the Emperors, yet in like orderathe Turks being placed in both wings, and the Catalonians well armed in the midft. But the figuall of battell being given on both fides, the Massagets, whether it were by agreement to before made with the enemy, or vpon a fudden conceived treafon, prefently withdrew p themselves aloose off, and so stood as idle beholders, giving aid neither to the one nor to the other, as did also their Turcopuli their companions, which greatly difmaid the Grecians, and encouraged their enemies: for the Greekes difmaied with that sudden defection of their fellowes, were even in the joyning of the battell discouraged. Which the Emperour perceiving, with great instancy intreated the captaines and commanders of his army, calling them oftentimes by name, not to be so suddenly discouraged; but they in so great a danger little regarding his words, and fill firinking from him, when as the greate ft part of the footmen were trod nunder foot and flaine, turning himfelfe vnto them that were left, which were but few, he La d. Now worthy men is the time wherein death is better thanlife, and life more better than death. And homing fo faid valiantly charged the enemy: in which charge his horse was slaine under him, K and he indanger to have bin taken had not one of his faithfull followers remounted him your his ownehorfe, and fo faued his life with the loffe of his owne. The Emperor flying to Dydimotichum, where Andronicus his father then lay, was of him joyfully received, but sharpely re; roued for adventuring his person so far. The enemies pursuing the chace, flew some tooke others, vntil that by the comming on of the night, and weary with the long fight they rotifed: an I the next day dividing the spoile, afterwards at their, pleasure forraged the country. The renegat Turks, called Turcopuli, within a few daics after revolting to the Catalonians, were or them joy fully entertained, and inrolled into the regiment of Chalel, the Turks Generall. ...

Shortly after this victory, the Catalonians began to mutiny among themselves, the great captaine Tenza, and Pharenza his companion, disdained to be commanded by Recasors their L Generall: in which tumult, the matter comming to blowes Tenza was flaine, and Pharenza for fafegard of his life glad to fly vnto the Emperor Andronicm; of whom he was, contrary to his expectation, right honourably entertained. About this time also the Massagers having done the Greekes more harme, than the Turks against whom they were entertained, and enriched them clues with the spoile of their friends both in Asia and Europe, were about with their wives and children, and wealth, to returne again vnto their old dwellings beyond Ister. Which the Turcopuli, with the Catalonians understanding, and bearing unto them a secret grudge, for that they (as the weaker) had of them often times beene wronged in the divivision of the spoile of the Greekes, lay now secretly in wait for them, as they should passe the straits of the great mountain Hemus, which bounded the Greeke Empire from thn Bulgarians: where fet- M ting upon them, fearing no fuch danger, they flew them almost all; and with the spoile of them, recompenced themselves for all the wrongs they had from them before received.

The Catalonians proud of their victory at Apri, and well strengthened by the reuolt of the Turcopuli with continual rodes spoised not onely all alongst the Sea coast of Thracia,

A but all the inland country also, as far as Maronea, Rhodope, and Bizia, laying all waste before them. And having torraged most part of Thracia, brake into Macedonia, and there wintred about Cassandria, somtime a samous city, but as then all desolate and ruinous. But the Spring cassandria. being come, they removed thence, with purpose to have spoiled the cities of Macedonia, and especially the rich city of Thessalonica, where the empresse Irene then lay: wherein they were by the Emperors good care and forefight preuented; who doubting such a matter had fortified his cities in that country, and furnished them with strong garrisons, and all other things needfull for their defence: which they quickly perceining, and finding the country al defolate and for saken by the inhabitants, were about to have againe returned into Thracia: but as they The Cataloniwere the upon resoluing, they were informed by one that was with them captine, how that the ans some of

B Emperor by a mighty strong wall built at a place called Christopolis, from the sea side even vnto the top of the mountains, had fo shut vp the passage, as that it was not possible for them that way to enter. With which vnexpected news they were at the first exceedingly troubled, as foreseeing. That if they should there long stay in that spoiled country, they should in short time be driven to exceeding wants (for they were now in number aboue 8000 fighting men) and afraid also by a generall conspiracie of the people about them, to be oppressed. Thus befet, and not well knowing what to doe, or which was to turne themselues, they desperatly refolged, no longer there to stay, but forthwith to set forward, and to breake into Thessaly, with the plentifulneffe thereof to relieue their wants, or into some other country further off, towards Peloponesus, and there to seat themselves, and to end their long travels: or at leastwise, C if they could not so do, to enter into league with some that dwelt vpon the sea coast, and so returne againe into their owne country. Wherefore leaving Thessalonica, and delivering the Emperour of a great feare, they in three daies came to the Thessalonian mountaines, Olym-pus, Offa, and Pelius; where they at the foot of them found fuch plenty of all things necessary for their reliefe, that they there wintred. But Winter past, and the Spring being come, they passed ouer those high mountaines and the pleasant vallies called Tempe, and so at last came downe into the fruitfull plaines of Thessaly, where they spent that yeare at their pleasure without refisfance, denouring the labours of the poore country people, and making hauocke of what socuer thing came in their way: for as then the state of that country was but weake, the Prince thereof being but young, and withall very ficke and like to die, and the fuccession fo ending in him, as that it was feared, who after his death should lay hand thereon, and euery man therfore more carefull of his own privat than of the common good. Yet to atlert these forreine enemies, who like a confuming fire deuoured the country before them; the nobility thought it good, with great gifts to ouercome their Captains and Commanders, and then to offer them guides to conduct them into Achaia and Bætia, Countries more pleasant and fruitfull than was theirs, and more commodious for them to dwell in:promifing also to give them aid for the seating of them there, if they should so need. Of which their offers the Catalonians accepted, as thinking it better with their hands full of gold so easily gotten, to go seek their better fortunes, with their power yet whole and strong, and help also if need were, than to hazard all upon the fucceffe of a doubtfull victory, and fo foolishly to preferre an uncertain hope before a most certaine benefit. So making peace with the Thessalians, and the Spring being come, received of them their promifed rewards, and guides to conduct them, passing ouer the Mountaines beyond Thessaly, and the streits of Thermopile, they encamped necre vnto Locris and the river Cephilus: which rifing out of the Mountaine Pernaffus, and running towards the East, hath on the North side of them Locris and Opus; and on the South the inland country of Achaia and Boetia: and being a great river untill it come to Lebadia and Haliartes, is there divided into two rivers; the one called Æfopus, and the other Ifmenus; whereof the former runneth thorow the Country of Attica, vntill it come into the Sea; and the other neere vnto Aulis (where the noble Gracians, as they fay, being about to goe vnto Troy, met, and their staied) falleth into the Eubcean Sea. But the Duke of Thebes and Athens, and of all that Countrey, hearing of their comming, and (as he thought) well prouided also for them (as having all the Winter and Spring time before put his forces in readinesse) with great pride and contempt denied them passage thorow his Countrey, at such time as they asked the same; making no more reckning of them, than as of a fort of loose wandering rogues that could find no place to rest or thritte in wherewith they inraged, resoluted

among themselues, either there to seat themselues in his country, or to die therefore. And so G patting the river into Beotia, not far from the same encamped themselves, being in number about 3500 horse, and 4000 foot. But so lying and expecting the comming of their enemies. A notable firm they caused all the plaine ground about where they lay and meant to fight, to be plowed up. which they with certaine imall cuts out of the river so watered, as that it differed but a little from a deepemarish or bog. Hither about the middle of the Spring commeth the Prince of the Countrey, with a gallant army raised out of Athens, Thebes, Platea, Locris, Phocis, and Megara, in number about 6400 horse, and 4000 foot, an army too strong he thought for so contemptible an enemy. But the weakest enemy not feared, doth oftentimes the greatest harme, as here by proofe was to be seene: for the Prince comming into the aforesaid plaine, now growne greene with graffe, and casting no perill, encouraging his men, came brauely on H with all his horsemen to have charged his enemies : who stood fast vpon the firme ground, a little without their trenches, as ready to encounter him. But before he was come to the middle of the plaine, his horses finking deepe into the rotten and new plowed ground, and there intangled as in a marth, lay for the most part tumbling in the mire, together with their riders. or elfe plunging in the deepe, and having cast them, ran vp and downe the plaine, as fortune led them; otherfome flicking fall, flood with their riders ypon their backs, as if they had bin very images, not able for to moue. Which the Catalonians beholding, and therewith encouraged, our wholmed them with all manner of thor, and flew them at their pleafure, vntill they had almost made an end of them : and with their horsemen so speedily pursued the rest in chace, even vito the cities of Thebes and Athens, that they without more adoe even at that instant surprised them both with all that was in them. So the Catalonians having as it were at a caft at dice won a most goodly country, garnished with faire towns' and cities, which they neuer built; and flored with all manner of wealth, which they neuer fweat for there ended their long trauels, and feated themfelues: not ceafing (as faith Nicephorus Gregorius, the reporter of this history, speaking of the time wherein these things were done, and wherein he himfelfe lived in Constantinople) vnto this present day, by little and little to extend the bounds of their territory. Where leaving them, with whom we haply have too long flraied from our purpose, let vs againe returne vnto the Turks and Turcopuli their companions.

In the army of the Catalonians, at such time as they were about to have besieged Thessalonica, were three thousand Turks, of whom eleuen hundred were of them (as we faid) which K remained with Melech at Ænum, after the flight of Iathatines their Sultan vnto the Tartars, and renouncing their superstition, became Christians; and so being baptized, and bauing wives and children, were enrolled among the Emperors fouldiers; but at the battell of Apri revolted vnto the Catalonians, and were commonly knowne by the name of Turcopuli: the other being the greater part, were such Turks, as with Chalel their captaine came out of A sia, being fent for by the Catalonians. Now all these Turks, as well the one as the other, at such time as the Catalonians were about to inuade Thessalia, and to seeke their new fortunes in the countries more Westward, and so farther off from Asia: partly distrusting the society of them, as dangerous vnto them; and loth also further to follow their vncertaine fortunes into countries farther off, amongst people to them vnknowne, began to rise in mutiny, and to refuse to L go. Whereupon their captaines Melech and Chalel requested of the Generall of the Catalomans to give them leavewith quietnesse to returne which their request he easily granted, (as now not greatly needing their helpe, after that he was departing out of the Emperors dominion) and so they gladly departed; proportionally dividing all the captives and spoiles they had taken in that long war, according to the number of both parts.

These Turks after their departure from the Catalonians, divided themselves into two parts, the Turcopuli or renegat Turks following Melech, and the rest Chalel their General. But Melech being before becom a Christian, as were his followers also, & after that having received most honorable entertainment at the Emperors hands, and yet again most shamefully breaking his faith before given, and violating his religion, had revolted to his énemies despairing of the M Emperors surther friendship, which he had so euill deserved, made choice rather to goe vnto Charles Prince of Sernia, by whom he was fent for, than to come again into the fight of Andronicus the Greeke Emperour. And so going vnto him with a thousand horse, and fine hundred foot, was there of him well entertained himselse: but his souldiers all commanded to deliver unto the Prince both their horses and armour, and to fall to other trades, and not to beare armes but at fuch time, and fo many of them as should seeme good vnto the Prince, that had received them into his countrey.

But Chalel with the Turkes his followers, in number about 1300 horse and eight hundred foot, staying at Macedonia, offered vnto the Greeke Emperour quietly to depart his country. fo that he would give him passage by the streits of Christopolis by him fortified and in safetie transport him and his soldiers with all their substance, ouer the streit of Hellespontus into Afia: vnto which his request, the Emperour considering the great harme done in his prouinces, and defirous also to be discharged of so great a burthen, easily granted; and so fent Sennacherib, one of his most valiant captaines, to conduct them out of Macedonia into Thracia, vnto the fireits of Hellespontus. Where the Greeke captaines and fouldiers seeing the great multitude of horses, and abundance of money and other spoiles, which they having taken from the Greekes, were now about to carry away with them into Afia, they thought it a great indignitie to suffer them so to do; and allured also with the hope of so rich a prey, as had bin of long in gathering, they entred into a deuice far different from that which was vnto the Turks before promifed, neither prouiding them of thipping, neither carefull of their fafety, but purposing vponthe sudden by night to destroy them. Whereof the Turks having got vnderitanding, fuddenly rifing, furprifed a castle in the country there by, which they notably fortified for the defence of themselves, to the great astonishment of them that had purposed their destruction, who now not able to force them, were glad to get them farthar off, and to certifie the Emperor what had happened: who (after I wot not what received custome of the Greek Emperors his predecessors) slowly dispatching things requiring greatest hast, carelessy delaid the time, to the great trouble of his state, and advantage of his enemies. For they wifely considering the danger and distresse they were in, by speedy messengers sent ouer the streit, craued aid of the Turks their countrymen in Asia, which they presently sent them, wherwith they not a little both encouraged and strengthned, with their often & sudden incursions grieuoufly wasted the country round about them, to the great discontentment of the Greeke cap. tains, not able without greater help to remedy the fame. Who thereof certified the yong Emperour Michael Paleologius, requesting him with all the power he could make, to come and besiege the castle, and to suppresse these so dangerous enemies. For the performance whereof not only the captains with their foldiers, but the country people in generall with their spades and mattocks came flocking to the Emperor; not as if they would have befreged the castle, but have digged it downe and overthrowne it together with the Turks their enemies.

Now the Emperor with his captains and fouldiers, and a multitude of those country peo- The unfortunate ple, being come thither, who all gladly followed him, most part of them foolish, thinking of battell of the nothing but of the spoile of their enemies not considering with what danger the same was to that Patein be gained: so that the more the enemies provided for the necessary defence of themselves, as gus with the in number but few, and shut up in their enemies country, the more carelesly & negligently, and forefus, without all order, the Greeks proceeded in their fiege, for that they were in number far more, and better prouided of all things than their enemies: not reputing with themselues, nothing in this world to be firm and fure; and al worldly things (as faith the divine Philosopher) to be but the mockery of God, and to be hastily turned up-lide downe, and with most uncertaine course this and that way towarder. But their enemies, who before feared even the very fame of their comming, accounting themselues rather among the dead than the living, seeing their confufed and difordered rainnes; therewith much more than before encouraged, bestowed all their wealth, their women, and other things vnnecessary for battell, in good safety within their trenches: but themselues, with eight hundred chosen horsemen onely, and they very well armed, fallied out even to the place where the imperial enfigne flood, being neither of any great fafety, neither guarded with any fuch strength or carefulnes as beseemed: with which sudden and desperat eruption of the enemies, the Grecians terrified, especially that rustical and volandish F company, began to fly: after whom by little and little others followed, vntill at length all the rest without further resistance sled also which the Emperor seeing, did what he might to have staid their flight: but in so generall a confusion and searc, when every man was to shift for one, who regarded him? wherefore wearied and feeing no other remedy, he was glad to take the same course and to fly with the rest: yet many of the more expert captaines, ashamed of so

foule a flight, made divers stands : and so staied the barbarous enemy from further pursuit of G the Emperour and the other flying Greekes. In which doing, many of them inclosed by the Turks, were of them taken prisoners : vnto whom all the Emperors treasure became a prey alfo, and what socuer honourable ensignes of the Empire else that were found in the Emperors tent; yea, the Imperiall crowne it selfe, richly set with pearle and pretious stones, was there taken also, which (they say) Chalel putting vpon his head, pleasantly scoffed at the Greeke

Emperor that but late before wore it. After this victory, the Turks with great pride spoiled almost all Thracia, in such fort as that the people for two yeres together durft scarcely go out of their strong walled townes to plow and fow their land, which exceedingly grieued both the Emperors, the father and the fon: for in their owne power they had no great confidence, God having (as it were) taken from H their people, both their hearts and courage, so that all their hope was to entertaine forrein aid (the miserable shift of the great distressed ones) wherin also they found many distinculties and lets, whilst they considered the greatnes of their charge, their coffers being then, if euer, empty by reason their territories were so long and grieuously by their enemies wasted: yet need admitted no law, Andronicus the old Emperour was glad to fend to Charles Prince of Servia, his fon in law, to pray his aid. But in the meane time he making no hast (as men in relieuing others commonly do) and the misery more and more increasing, it pleased God to stir vp the heart of one Philes Paleologue the Emperours neere kinfman, to undertake the protection and deliuerance of his Prince and Countrey; and was afterward for his great valour by the Emperour worthily made Lord great martiall of the empire. This Philes of whom we now speake had all I his life time bin brought up in the court, and was for his upright dealing and integrity of life beloued of all men, but specially of the old emperor his kinsman, whom he with like affection honored; but was a man altogether vnskilful of the wars, as being by nature of a weake conftitution of body, and so very sickly, and withall more given to devotion and the service of God, than the affaires of the world, oftentimes spending most part of the day at his praiers in the church. He now grieued to see the perplexed Emperor, and the misery of his country, requeof the Empirer fled of him that he might with some small power, and some few captains of his owne choice. goe out against these proud Turks: hoping (as he said) by Gods grace to reuenge the wrong by them done, and to returne to him againe with victory. Vnto which his request, the Emperor easily yeelded, saying, that God was just, which delighted not in many legs, neither in the K greatnes of any mans strength, but in a contrite heart and humble mind:not so giving his help vnto Michael the Emperour, his son, for the offences of his parents: as happily he might vnto this fovpright and deuout a man, regarding more his integrity of life, than his skill in armes: for turning me about, I have seen in this world (said he) I have seene, the swift not to gaine the prize, neither the valiant the victory; wife men to want bread, and men of vnderstanding. wealth; the simple to gain fauor, and the subtill to fall into difgrace: such alteration worldly things in time find. So the emperor (as is a foresaid) yeelding to his request, furnished him with mony, horses, and armor, and such a convenient power, as he himselse desired. Which he hauing received, first of all incouraged his captains and soldiers with all manner of courtesie and kindnes, giving vnto them mony, horses, armour, jewels; yea, sometime he gaue vnto one his L purse, vnto another his cloke, his rapier, or some other such thing, as he had about him, to encourage them in their forwardnes: after that, he perfuaded them to an honest temperate course of life, and valiantly to play the men, promising according to their deserts to reward every one of them, the war once happily ended: and before his fetting forth, vnderstanding by his espials, that Chalel with a thousand foot & two hundred horse was forraging the country about Bizia, he hasted his departure, that so he might by the way encounter them, laded with the spoile of the country and fo fetting forward, came the third day to a little river, which the inhabitants call Xcrogipfum, and there in a great plain neer vnto the fame, encamped. Where after he had fet all things in order fit for battel, he with cheerfull speeches as a great commander, encouraged his captains and foldiers; leaving nothing vnfaid or vndone, that might ferue for the animating of them to fight. But he had not fo lien two daies, but that his fcouts about midnight comming in, brought him tidings, that the enemy laden with spoile, was even fast by at hand: who by the rifing of the Sun were come within fight, and had themselues a far off also discoucred the Christian army, all glistering in bright armor. Wherfore staying a while to prepare

A themselves for battell; and first of all compassing themselves round with their waggons and other carriages, they bestowed in them all their captines fast bound together, with their booty taken; and afterwards as their manner was, catting dust vpon their heads, and their hands vp toward heaven, they came on. And now the Christian Army came on forward also; Phi- The battell be. les still encouraging borh the horsemen and the footmen, and right well conducting them, as tweet thines the time and place required. So it fortuned, that he that had the leading of the right wing and the Turke of the army, gaue the first charge youn a squadron of the enemies, and at the first onset valuorfed one of the enemies, and after him another. But having his horfe fore wounded under him. he hastily retyred out of the battell: which somewhat troubled the Christians, and encouraged the Turks, who now with a barbarous outcry began most fiercely to preffe youn the rervring Christians: Philes in the mean time with many cheerful words and comfortable persuafions fill encouraging them to play the men; and with his cies oftentimes cast up to heaven. with tears running down his face, most heartily befought God, the giver of all victory, no longer to fuffer those his enemies, and the ministers of his wrath, to triumph ouer his people: as did also the poor captines which lay bound, doubtfully betwixt hope and seare expecting the cuent of the battell. The Christian footmen at the same rime encountring hand to hand with the Barbarians, affailed them, and were affailed; flew of them, and were them felues flain by them: fo that there was a cruel fight made on both fides. But Philes with the multitude of his men having almost incompassed the Barbarian horsmen, with a company of his most valiant foldiers broke in vpon the fide of the enemies battel, and fo made way thorow the midst C of it: which fo troubled the Turks, as that they well knew not how to flay, or what to do. So The Turks out of being on every fide circumvented and hardly charged, most of them there fell, except forme throwas. few horsmen, whom the Greek horsmen pursued vnto the entrance of Chersonesus, with purpose there to shut them vp. Philes comming thither also, there vpon those streits incamped. At which time the Emperor presently sent out fine gallies to keep the street of Hellespont, so that no aid might be brought vnto these Turks out of Asia. Whilst these things thus went, two thousand choice horimen came to the aid of Philes out of Servia; and the Potestare of Pera came by sea also with eight gallies more into Helespontus, to the aid of the Christians. Wherefore when the Grecians and Servians had thus on the one fide that them up by land, and they that were in the gallies on the other fide by fea; Philes with all his power came and D camped about the town and trenches wherin the Turks lay; planting his battery against the castle, wherwith he greatly shook the same, and made great slaughter of the Turks and their horses, and that not only by day, but by night also. But the Turks seeing death now present before their eies, and no way left for them to cscape, for that they were on every side both by fea and land inclosed, thought good thus to adventure their lives, resolving by night to set vpon the Grecians, rather than vpon the Servians, whom they had hitherto accustomed to ouercome, and whom they had with often flaughters much terrified; that so the rest by them also haply discouraged, might so delay the assault. But in attempting the same they perceiued themselues much deceived, finding them even at their sirst sallying out ready in arms to receive them: wherfore having in vaine given the attempt as against a strong fortresse, they E were shamefully inforced to retyre. Yet were they not therwith so discouraged, but that the fireit fiege still continuing, they made the like attempt upon the Servians: but being also by them in like maner with loffe repulfed, they began now veterly to despair. Wherfore the next day about midnight casting away their arms, they with their bosoms and pockets ful of coin ran down to the sea side towards the Gallies, with purpose to yeeld themselves vnto the Genowaies that were therin, as fearing of them lesse harm, as of men whom they had never hurt: but the night being dark and misty, and the Moon giving little light, many of them vnawares came unto the Greek gallies, and there flying the imoke, fell into the fire; for being lightned of their mony, they were by them forthwith without any pitty flain also. But the Genowais flew not all their prisoners, but only such as had brought with them the most coin; lest afterward bewraying the same, it should haue bin sought after by the Greeks. The rest they cast into bonds, of whom some they sent unto the Emperor, other some they kept to themselves as their own prisoners. Thus by the valor and good conduct of this worthy deuout Captain, the Turks were for that time again chased out of Europ, and the country of Thracia deliuered of

Now by that we have already written is easily to be seen the chief causes of the decay and G ruin of the Greek Empire to haue bin, first, The innovation and change of their antient religion and ceremonies by Michael Paleologus, wherof enfued a world of wo. Then by Couetoufneffe, concred with the name of good husbandry, the vtter destruction of the chief strength of the Empire. Next to that, by Envy, the ruin of the Great: by falle Suspe &, the loser of friends. Ambition, Honors ouerthrow; Distrust, the great minds torment; and Forrein aid, the Empires faithlesse porter, opening the gate even vnto the Enemy himself:wherunto foul discord joined (as thall be forthwich declared) what wanted that the barbarous enemy could defire, tor the helping of them in the supplanting of so great an empire ? But again to our purpose.

Michael companion with his father Andronicus in the Empire, had by his Wife Mary two fons, Andronicus who had afterwards the Empire, and Michael fyrnamed the Despot, and two H daughters, Anne maried to Thomas prince of Epitus, and I heodora maried to the prince of Bulgatia, Of all the fe, the old Emperor Andronicus their grandfather fo intirely loued Andronicus his nephew, as that in comparison of him he seemed little to regard either his own children, or the rest of his nephews, wishing them all rather to perish than him. Which many suppofed him to do as purposing by him the better to establish the succession of the empire in his house as also for his excellencie of wit, and comlinesse of person; the likenesse of name also haply furthring his kind affection. For which reasons he caused him to be honorably brought vp in his court, as not willing to spare him out of his fight either day or night. But when he was out or his childhood, and grown to be a lufty youth (at which time mens hot defires are commonly most vehement) he began to contemn all chastisfement and government, especial. ly in to high a calling, and in the prime of his youth. Befides that, his Companions became vnto him the ministers and perfuaders of all those vain delights which vnstaid youth most defireth, and at the first began to lead him forth to walk the streets, to hawk, to hunt, and haunt playes, and atterwards to night walks also, not well befeeming his state. Which riotous course of life, when as it required great expense, and his aged grandfather gaue him but a certaine ipare allowance for his conjunient maintenance; he acquainted himselfe with the rich merchants of Genoa which dwelt at Pera. Hereof arofe hard taking vp of mony, great debt, fine devices how to come by Coin, with fecret confultations and purposes of flight. For when he faw his grandfather old Andronicus long to line, and his father Michael like to fucceed him, he had no hope of afpiring to the Empire; wherupon his ambitious thoughts and impotent K defires long time tormenting his haughty heart fuggested vnto him such purposes. For when as he would not obey his grandfather as his tutor, nor follow other mens counfels, as a child, he fought after the Imperial liberty, and abundance of wealth, that he might have that was funicient for himself, and wherwith to reward others as the followers of an Emperor. Which feeing he could not do, his grandfather yet living, and his father reigning, he fought after the fourraignty of other Principalities and Countries: one while after Armenia, as belonging unto him in the right of his mother the King of Armenia's Daughter: Another while after Peloponeffus; and fomtimes he dreamed of Lesbos and Lemnus, and other the fruitful Isles of the Agean fea. Which when it was fecretly told, somtime to his Father, and sometime to his grandfather, he was now croffed and reprodued of the one, and afterwards of the other. And to passe over many other his youthfull prancks, he vsed in his night walks secretly to repaire vnto a certaine Gentlewomans house, more honourably borne, than honestly qualified; which woman, a certaine Gallant (and another Adonis) no lesse affected than himselfe. Wherewith he highly offended, as with his Riuall, appointed certaine Ruffians and Fencers towatch her house. But vpon a certain time about midnight, Manuel the Despot (his yonger' brother) feeking after him, chanced to paffe that way where these Watchmen lay; who seeing him hasten by, and not knowing him in the darke, and supposing him to have bin the man which they looked for, the Gentlewomans best beloued, set vpon him, and so wounded him that he fell down for dead from his horfe: but beeing by and by after known by others comming in he was taken up and halfe dead caried unto the Court. Which outrage in the mor- M ning beeing knowne vnto the Emperour, cast him into a great heavinesse, as beholding not the time pretent only, but wifely confidering what was like to infue in the time to come also-But Manuel the Despot being dead of the wounds there received, and the report thereof brought vinto Michael the yong Emperor his father, then lying at Theffalonica, strooke him

And therefore appointed one Syrgiannes, a man of great credit and authority in the Court (in whom as in a reconciled enemy, he had vnaduisedly reposed too much trust) to infinuate himselfe into the youthfull Princes acquaintance and fauor, that fo founding him and his fecret defignes, he should not possibly be able without his knowledge to step aside: which of all things the old Emperor feared most, as the beginning of greater troubles. This Syrgiannes beeing a B man of great place, and of a fubrill wit, was formtime himself suspected of a spiring, and therfore as vpon the misprission of treason, was by the old Emperor imprisoned: but afterwards by him againe inlarged and received into favour, was now by him put in truft, warily to obferue the doings of the yong Prince. But he not vnmindefull of the wrong before done vnto him, and in hope by troubling the State, either to aspire vnto the empire himselfe, or at leastwife to some good part therof; thought now a fit occasion to be ministred vnto him, for him to work vpon, both for the one and the other, by fetting the old Emperour and his ambitious yong Nephew together by the ears. Which opportunitie he not minding to let flip taking the yong Prince one day afide, discourred vnto him all his Grandsathers devices, in briefe as followeth.

The yong Prince mooued with this speech as if it had bin with a Charm, easily consented to his defire, confirming the same by his Oath conceined in writing. At which time were pre-F fent fuch as were especially to be acquainted with the plot of the conspiracie, namely Iohn CataenZenus and Theodorus Synadenus (both men of great honor, and the old Emperors antient supposed friends, and of him beloued, much of like age vnto himselse) and Alexius Apocaneus the third (not of like honor with the other, yet a man of great place, and of a most subtill and deep wit) who all understanding the matter, shewed themselves not as ministers, but as Ring-P 2

Your Grandfather, Noble Prince (faid he) bath fet me as a Watch over your actions, or more truly syreiannes bis

leaders and captains of the intended rebellion. This conspiracy with most solemn oaths and G promifes on every part confirmed, they began right cunningly to attempt the matter: and to begin withall, Syrgiannes and Catacuzenus, by corrupting divers of the great and most gratious courtiers, procured to themselves the government of such cities and provinces in Thrace, as they thought fittest for them to begin their rebellion in. Syrgiannes having the government of the fea coaff, and the inland country even from the fea fide to the top of mount Rhodope. and Catacuzenus the government of the country about Oresias. In all which places they muthed fouldiers, provided armor, entertaining also strangers and other vagrant and masterlesse men, as for some great War. Besides that, in the government of the Cities they placed their trustiest friends, removing such others as they had in suspect. All which they colored by rumors falfly raifed, one while of the comming of the Europian Tartars from Danubius, and a. H nother while by the comming of the Turks out of Asia : against whose inuasions these preparations were given out to be made, for avoiding of suspition, and the traitors for their provident care highly commended eyen by the Emperor himfelfe, againft whom they were intended, All which things Syrgiames notably diffembled, oftentimes withall certifying the yong

Prince, what he had done, and what was likewife of him to be performed. But t'e old Emperor feeing his youthful Nephew not to hearken to his graue aduice, but flil to proceed in his diffolute kind of life, was about folemnly to have reproued him before the Patriark and fome others of the chiefe nobility, if haply fuch open reproofe might have wrought in him some change of maners; if not, then to have committed him to prison. And like enough he was to have fo done, had he not bin otherwise persuaded by Theodorus Mitochito (a ho of all others was able to do most with him) by reason of the liberty of the time; for then it was almost Shronetyde, when as the people diftempered with the excesse of meat and drink, were of all other times most fit, vpon any light occasion to be drawn into a tumult or vprore: for fear wherof, he was contented at that time to let him alone. But Shrouetyde past, and a good part of Lent alfo; the old Emperor feeing no amendment in his Nephew, calling vinto him Gerasimus the Patriark, and the rest of the reverend Bishops then present in the city, fent for his Nephew, openly before them all to chide and schoole him for his disorderly life, but etp. cially for his purposed flight; that ashamed of such open reproof before such Reuetend fathers, he might either amend his life, or at leastwife of all men be thought justly punimed for the same, if he should still proceed therin. So the yong Prince being sent for came, accompanied with many of his fauorits and followers, most of them being secretly armed, and he himselie not altogether unprovided: for it was agreed among them, that if the Emperour thould vie gentle and fatherly admonitions toward him, that then they should bee quiet, without any thew of infolency or difcontent: but it he should in anger reproue him, or threaten to punish him, then vpon a fign gluen, forcibly with their swords drawn to break in vpon him, and to killhim in the Imperial feat, and without more ado to place yong Andronicus his nephew in his stead. But comming in, and (as his manner was) taking his place next his aged grandfather, his desperat followers attending without, he was indeed of him grieuously blamed and reproned for his former follies and euil course of life; yet with such moderation and Granity, as all feemed (as it did) to come of a most fatherly care and regard: so that then no inchontrage was committed as was by divers his followers wished; but the affembly quietly difinified, and a folemn oath taken on both fides: of the grandfather, That he should not appoint any but his nephew to fucceed him in the Empire; and of the young Prince, That hee should never seeke to attempt any thing to the shortning or hurt of his Grandfathers life or empire. But the conspirators thronging about him at his comming out, fretted and sumed at him as if he had broken his fairh and oath before given them; faying, What greaten wrong coulell thou dows than being by us made strong and become dreadful to thine enemies to distrole of thine aftairs at thy pleasure, to thine own safety, and to leave we thy most faithfull friends and servants in the Dinels month to be denoured? For now they both doubted & feared left their conspiraciewas difcour cd. With which speeches he both discouraged and ashamed, sent for Theodorus Metochi. M ta his Grandfathers chiefe Counfellor, requesting him to deal with his Grandfather for the pardoning of all his Followers, as he had done for himselfe. Of which motion he disliking, told him, That he was to give God thanks, for that he himselse had escaped so great a danger; and to him allo, as a mean for the fafegard of his life: although hee treated not for fuch

A traiterous persons, with whom if he were well aduised he would have nothing to do, either thinke that they would ever be faithfull to him, who respecting neither God nor man, had so fouly broken their faith before given vnto the Emperour his Grandfather. With which vnexpected answer of fo great and grave a Counsellor the Prince not a little troubled, & withall discontented, stood a while as in a muse all silent, reasoning as it were with his own passions: but afterwards commanding him without further reply to depart, and the old companions of his follies reforting vnto him, he by their persuasions entertained again his former disloyall thoughts and defignements: which his grandfather vehemently suspecting, and therewith not a little grieued, would (as if it had bin by inspiration) oftentimes in his heavinesse fay vnto them that were about him, In our time is lost the Majesty of our Empire, and the denotion B of the Church. Yet to preuent the worft, he thought it good betimes to lay hands upon his fuspected Nephew, and so to detain him in sase keeping : acquainting none therwith but Gerasimus the Patriarch, and his Ghostly Father; who presently acquainted the Prince therwith, and was the cause that he hastned his flight, flying himself before. For he now certainly vnderstanding the danger he was in the night before he should have bin apprehended, with all the rest of the conspirators his complices, in the dead time of the night fled out of the City. by the gate called Gyrolimnia, which Gate (all the rest being thut) was still at his command, for that he vied commonly therby at his pleature very early to go out on hunting, as he now pretended to do; but the next day after, came to Syrgiannes and Catacuzenus Camp, who then both lay with a great power at Hadrianople, expecting his comming. The old Empe-C ror before the rifing of the Sun aduertifed of the flight of his nephew, the same day commanded him to be proclaimed Traitor, and profcribed, with all his Conspirators, and who so ever els should take his part. And for the more surety, euery man in the city was sworn to be loyall and faithfull vnto the old Emperor, and enemy vnto his Nephew and his adherents. But he on the other fide proclaiming liberty and immunitie abroad in all the Cities and Villages in Thracia revol-Thracia, fo won the hearts of the Countrey people in generall, that they reforted vnto him dronicus. from all places in great numbers, ready armed to do what focuer he should command them. And to begin withall, they first layd hands upon the Collectors of the Emperors mony (then abroad in the Country) whom they ill intreated, taking from them their money. After that, and yet not seuen dayes expired, almost an incredible number of horsemen, footmen, archers and others departed from Hadrianople toward Constantinople, under the leading of Syrgiannes, in hope at their first comming to take the City, being at discord within it selfe, and most part of the meaner fort, in hope of gain, fauoring their rebellious proceedings, fuch as the feditions find in such rebellious tumults. So having marched four days, they came and incamped at Selyrbia: but as they were about to have gon on farther, the old Emperour doubting lest the citisens seeing so great an army before the City, should therein raise some tumult or fir to the indangering therof; thought good before to fend Embassadors vnto his Nephew, to proue if haply these so dangerous troubles might by their means in some good fort be appeafed. The chief of these Embassadors was one Theoleptus Bishop of Philadelphia, a man no leffe famous for his vertue than his wildom, and yet for both of all men honored, & with hint E alsowas sent Syrgiannes his mother, as of all others sittest to appeale her son, and to persuade him not to approch the city, for that therof might enfue much bloud shed, and the destruction of the city, or at least wife the vtter vndoing of many: wherof if he should bee the author, how could he euer after liue in conscience quiet, but that the torment therof would follow him even into his grave; and therfore to request him to retyre a little, and so to come to talk and to demand what he pleased. Syretannes moved as well with the presence of the reverend Bishop, as the prayers of his mother, retyred to the yong Prince which then lay about Orestias; whither the Emperors Embassadors came also: with whom, after long debating, it was agreed. That the yong Prince should in all royalf maner hold all Thracia, from Cristopolis to Anideset A. Rhegium, and the suburbs of Constantinople: and withal, that such lands as the yong prince prement by had already given vnto his followers, in Macedonia, should still remaine vnto them (which Empericant were fuch as yearly yeelded vnto them a right great reuenue:) And that the old Emperour his Rephires should hold vnto himselfe the Imperiall City, with all the Cities and Provinces of Macedonia bevond Cristopolis: and that he alone should have the honour to heare Embassadors sent from forrein Princes, and to give them their dispatch; for that the yong Prince took no plea-

face in those weighty affairs, as by nature more delighted in hawking, hunting, and his other G vouch ail pleatures. V pon which conditions a peace was concluded, better liked of the yong Prince than of the old Emperour, who although he was defirous otherwise to have redreft for great wrongs, yet wanting power, was glad to yeeld to what his nephew would requeft. Thus was the Greeke empire in Europe (as then all or the most part inclosed within the bounds of Maccomia and Thracia) now divided betwixt the grandfather and his nephew: Asia in the meane in ne (wherein the Greek Emperors their predecessors somtime held great kingdoms) being Lift for a prey to the greedy Turks. Othoman on the one fide even in the heat of these mounts laying the foundation of his empire in Phrygia & Bithynia; and the other the Turks ... Princes the fuccessor of Sultan Aladin encrocking as fast upon the emperors territories and countries on this fide the river Mocander. And not fo contented, at the same time also built H great flore of gallies, wherewith they robbed the Christian Merchants trading to Constantihople, and spoyled the coasts of Macedonia and Thracia, and the Islands of the Ægeum. and among others took the famous Island of the Rhodes; which they held not long, before they were as usine drinen out of the same by the Kings Hospitallers, under the conduct of William W. Marci, aided by the Genowaies and the King of Sicilia, which they from that time held (to the great honor and benefit of the Christian commonweale) by the space of 214 yeres, known "" by the name of the Knights of the Rhodes: vntill that in the memory of our fathers it was (I Target in any no more, but prieue therefore) shamefully lost vnto the Turke, forwant of reliefe: neuer place being more honorably defended, as in the proceffe of this History shall appeare: euer tince which time those honorable men (the flower of chiualry) have feated themselves in the Ifle of Malta, which they to their immortall glory, and the comfort of all good Christians, have most norably defended against the mighty Sultan Solyman, and all the fury of the Turks, as thall be also in due place declared.

But to turne againe vnto the troubled estate of the Greeke empire. Syrgiannes the Greeke captain & author of all the aforefaid stirs betwixt the old emperor and his nephew, had even from the beginning thought, as a companion to the yong Prince, to have ruled al with him at his pleafure, and that nothing either great or little should have bin don without him: but feeing it now to fall out far otherwise than he had before expected, and the Prince to be wholly fuled by Catacuz enue, and himfelfe of all others left regarded, & not fo much as called to any counfell; inwardly tormented with griefe and enuy, he began secretly with himselfe to deuise g how he might be reuenged of the vngratefull Prince, which vnmindfull of his former promifes, had fo vin hank fully cast him off. Wherefore he resolued again to revolt to the old Empetor not doubting but fo in short time to ouerthrow all the councels and deuices of the young Prince, together with his state also, by himselfe before raised. For he, as worldly wife, excluding God from his councels, had fuch an opinion of himfelfe, that which way foeuer he went, thither must all things follow also. Wherfore by one of his trustiest friends he secretly made the old Emperor acquainted with his purposed revolt, and how all things stood: for the greater credit thereof alleadging, That he could not abide the fight of him that fought to corrupt his wife, meaning the young Prince. This newes from Syrgiannes was vnto the old Emperour most welcomes for it grieued him (as an old man of a great spirit) to see himself so contemned L and deluded by his nephew, his empire rent, and his old feruitors of all forts, by him spoyled of their lands and possessions in Macedonia and Thracia. So a solemne oath in secret passed from the one to the other, Syrgiannes without longer stay secretly sled to Constantinople: which there bruted abroad, reiovced many, now well hoping the whole government would againe come vnto the old Emperour, and that fo they should againe recouer their possessions wrongfully taken from them by his nephew. But God not feeing it fo good, all this hope was but invaine, as ere long it appeared: for the yong Prince, who of long knew how much he was beloned of the Constantinopolitans, and by them secretly sent for, taking occasion vpon the flight of Syrgiannes, with all the power he could make, marched towards the city: and being come within fight therof, incamped, laying ambushes vpon enery way and passage therabout, M for that intercepted Syrgiannes, who was then at Perinthus, and the third night after, with three hundred felect foldiers, deceiving them that lay in weight for him as if they had bin all afleepe, before the rifing of the Sun came to Constantinople; and if the old Emperor would have given him leave, he had fuddenly charged them that did lie in wait for him, before they were aware of his comming. But as foon as it was day, the Prince hearing of the escape of Syrgiannes, and no such tumult in the city as he had expected, presently without more ado retyred with his army the same way he came, back again into Thracia.

By and by after, Confantine the Despot was by the old Emperor his brother sent by sea to Thessalonica, to take upon him the government of Macedonia, and by the way to apprehend Xene the Empresse, the yong Prince's mother; and after, with all the power he could make, to inuade the yong Prince in Thracia: that so setting on him on the one side out of Macedonia, and Syngiannes with the Turks (for the emperor in this civil discord was glad to vie their help also) and the Bithynian soldiers on the other, they might so shut him up betwist them and take him. According to which resolution, the Despot comming to Thessalonica, there took the Empresse, whom with all her samily he thrust into a gally, and so sent her to Constantinople, where she was in the palace kept close, as too much saucuring the Princes proceedings. And afterward raising all the power he could in Macedonia, inuaded the Prince in Thracia,

The yong Prince feeing himselfe by this means now like to be driven to a great streit, sent Synadenus with his Thracian army to defend the frontiers of his empire toward Constantinople, against syrgiannes with his Turks and Bithynians: in hope himselfe by many subtle deuices and fleights to be able to incounter his vncle the Despot. And first he caused divers Edicts and proferiptions to be written in hast, wherin great rewards and preferments were with great folemnitie of words promifed to whomfoeuer could bring vnto him the Despot either quick or dead: which were of purpose given to the country people passing to and fro, to be dispersed abroad in the highways, and about in the country neer the Despots camp. And after that, he caused the death of the Emperor his grandfather to be enery where proclaimed, and how that he was by the Constantinopolitans in a tumult slain: which the denifers thereof in euery place reported. Yea some there were that swore they were themselves present at his wofull death, and faw it with their eies: other some, more certainely to persuade the matter, shewed long white goats hair, or such like gathered out of white wool, as if they had been by the furious people pluckt from the old Emperors head or beard, at such time as he was slaine. Which things being commonly reported in enery town and village, but especially in the Despots camp, wonderfully filled mens heads with divers strange and doubtfull thoughts. Then divers also of the dispersed edicts being found and brought to the Despot, struck him, and not without cause, into a great fear; insomuch that by the persuasion of his best friends, he without longer stay retyred in hast to Thessalonica: whither shortly after came a gally from Constantinople, with secret letters from the Emperor to the Despot, for the apprehension of twenty five of the chiefe citifens, vehemently suspected for the stirring vp of the people to rebellion, and so to have delivered the city to the Prince. All which persons the Despot should have fent bound in that Galley to Constantinople. But they in good time perceiving the danger they were in, secretly stirring up the people, and by and by after ringing out the bells, (the fignal appointed for the beginning of the rebellion) had in a fhort time raifed a wonderfull tumult within the city, infomuch that all the citifens was vp in armes, who running head-E long vnto the house of the Despot sound not him (for he forewarned of their comming, was fled into the castle) but flew all they met of his or els robbing them, cast them in prison. As for the Despots house, they pillaged it, & afterward pulled it down to the ground. Then comming to the castle they fired the gates : which the Despot seeing, and not able to defend the place, took horse and fled to a monastery not far off, where being taken by them that pursued him, he fore against his will, for the safegard of his life, tooke upon him the habit of a Monk. Neuertheles he was from thence caried prisoner to the yong Prince his nephew, who shewed himself much more curteous to him than all the rest of the Nobilitie and Waiters; for they as if they would have eaten him vp, were even forthwith ready to have torn him in pieces, had not the Prince embracing him in his arms faued his life. Yet the next day after, by perfuafion of his Counsel, he sent him to Didimoticum, where he was cast into a most loth some prison, being very deep and streit in manner of a Well, no body to attend upon him but one boy; where he lay in miferable darkneffe and flink: they which drew vp his ordure from him and the boy oftentimes (either by chance or of purpose) pouring it vpon his head. Where after he had lien a great while in most extreme misery (withing to die, and could not) hee was at length by the Princes commandement, intreated thereunto by certain Religious men, remo. G ued into a more casic prison, where we will for euer leaue him.

Othoman first King of the Turks.

Things falling our croffe with the old Emperor, and although they were neuer fo well de-Things taking out croise with the old Emperor, and atthough they were never to wen dethe strength of truned, that one day in his melancholy minde having a Pfalter in his hand, to refolue his doubtfull mind he opened the fame, as if it were of that heavenly oracle to ask counsel: wherwith pare in the first verte that he light vpon was, Dum calefu diffociat Reges, nive conspergentur in Salmon: with the 11 hearthe Almoghty feattered Kings (for their fakes) then were they as white as fnow in Salmon. The which he applying to himselfe, as if all those troubles and whatsoeuer els had happened.proceeded from the will of God, although for causes to him vnknown; hee by and by sought to reconcile himfelt to his nephew, contrary to the mind of Syrgiannes, who defired nought but H trouble. For (as we have before faid) the yong Prince, although he was desirous of the power and liberty of an empire, yet he left the ornaments and care thereof unto his grandfather : and had he not often times and erneftly bin egged forward by his companions to affect the whole Empire, haply could and would have contented himselfe with the former Pacification. For being now fent for he came first to Rhegium, and there visited his mother (now set at liberty, and fent thinker for the furtherance of the defired pacification) where he with her and by her counted did what focuer was there done. So within few daies the matter was brought into fo good terms that an attonement was made, and he himselfe went and met the Emperour his grandfather before the gates of the city; the old Emperor fitting then youn his horfe, and the Prince alighting from his a good furlong before he came at him. And although his Grand- I father was very vinwilling, and forbad him fo to do, yet he came to him on foot, and kiffed his hand and foot as he fate on horseback; and afterward taking his horse, embraced him, & there killed each other, to the great contentment of the beholders. And so having talked some few words, departed; the old man into the city, and the yong man into his campe, which then lay neer to Pega: where staying certain days, he came divers times into Constantinople, and so went out again; for as then his mother, partly for her health, partly for the loue of her fon, lay at Pega.

But Syrgiannes nothing glad of the agreement made betwixt the Emperor and his nephew. walked up and down fick in mind, with an heavy countenance, especially for that in time of peace his bufy head flood the Commonweal in no flead. Wherfore in all meetings and af- K femblies he willingly converfed with them who most disliked of the present state, & spake hardly as well of the Emperor as of his nephew, wronged (as he thought) by both; wheras in the time of their greatest distresse, he had (as hee said) stood them in good stead. But seeing one Afanes Andronicus walking melancholy vp and down as a man with heavines oppreffed; who having don good feruice to the yong Prince, and not of him regarded, had fled to the old Emperor, and there found no fuch thing as he expected, for the case of his grief, although hee were a man honorably born, and otherwife endued with many good parts: with him Syrgiannes acquainted himselfe, as grieued with the like griese that hee himselfe was, with whome as with his friend, without diffimulation he plainly discoursed of all such things as his grief defired. But Afanes handling him with great wildom, did himself with like words speak hard- L ly both of the Emperor and his nephew; but yet curioufly noted what focuer Syrgiannes fayd, for he had before hated him for his ambition, and as then took it in displeasure, that hee was enemy to CatacuZenau his fon in law, who was all in all with the yong Prince, & did oftentimes comfort him. But the fong being thorowly fet, Afanes came fecretly vnto the old Emperour, and told him the whole matter; and in fine, that except he in time layd hold on Syrgiannes, affeeting the empire, he should in short time be by him brought to his end. Wherupon Syrgiannes was forthwith clapt fast in prison: whose house with all his wealth the common people took the spoil of; and not contented to have rased it downe to the ground, converted the site therof, together with the pleasant Vineyards adjoining vnto the same, into a place to seed goats and theep in: a worthy reward for his manifold treacheries. The yong Prince thortly M aftergoing to Constantinople, was there crowned Emperor, as fellow in the Empire with his grandfather: vnto which folemnitie in the great temple of Sophia, both the Emperors riding, it fortuned the old Emperor by the stumbling of his horse to be overthrowne and fouly berayed in the mire; the streets being then very foul by reason of much rain but a little before

A fallen, which many took as ominous, and portending the cuill fortune which thortly after befell him. During the time of this peace, it fortuned that as the yong Prince was a hunting in Chersonesus, seuenty Turks aduenturers were by force of weather driven on shore: who before they would yeeld themselves prisoners, made a great fight with the Emperors men, and flew divers of them : in which conflict the yong Emperor himfelfe was wounded in the foot. wherwith he was a great while after exceedingly tormented.

Andronicus the late Prince, and now fellow in the empire with his aged Grandfather, held not himselfe long so contented, but after the maner of ambitious men (and continually prickt forward by his afpiring fauorits) longed to have the whole government to himfelfe, which hardly brooketh any partner. And therfore weary to fee his grandfather line fo long, refolued no longer to expect his naturall death (although it could not by course of Nature be far off) but by one deuice or other to thrust him from the government; or if that might not bee effe-Aced, at once to dispatch him both of life & state together. And the surer to lay the plot wheron fo foul and horrible a treason was to be built, he by the counsell of his mother and others, by whom he was most directed, sent for Michael the Prince of Bulgaria his brother in law (although before to him vnknown, as was his wife his fifter alfo) to make with him a firm league, to the intent by him to provide, that if the Prince of Servia (who had but lately maried the old Emperors nigh kinfwoman, and to to him much denoted) thould take part with him, hee should by the Bulgarian his neighbor be intangled. Who so sent for with his wife the old Emperors daughter, came to Didymoticum, where they were many dayes honorably enter-C tained both by the yong Emperor and his mother. For why, this meeting plotted vpon great treason, was finely colored with the desire the yong Emperor had to see his fifter and her hutband as before to him vnknown, and the Empresse her daughter, whom she had not seene in meeting. 23 years before: but the fecret conclusion betwixt them was. That the Bulgarian prince to the vttermost of his power should aid the yong emperor against his grandfather, and he likewise him against the Servian as he should have need. And further, That if his grandfather being deposed, he should recouer the whole empire, then to give him a great summe of mony with certain speciall cities and prouinces confining your him, as it dowry to his kind brother in law and companion in his labors. So Michael, the Bulgarian prince honorable entertained by the yong Emperor and the old Empresse his mother in law, sloded with rewards, and pro-

D mises of greater, returned home into his own country. This matter thus dispatched, the yong emperor therwith incouraged, & knowing also the Constantinopolitans, besides the other cities of Thrace, exceedingly to fauour him and his proceedings (by whom also he was secretly invited to haften his comming thither) as weary of the long life and lazines, as he termed it, of his grandfather, thought it best cunningly to go about the matter, that fo his grandfarher being with as little stir as might be deposed, hee himselfe might alone enjoy the Empire. But needing mony for the effecting of so great matters, he by force took all the mony from the collectors whom the old Emperor had fent into Thracia for the taking up of mony there; telling them, that he was an emperor alfo, & in need of money, and that the common charge was likewife by the common purfe to be difcharged. E After that he took his way toward Constantinople, pretending vision special causes hee had occasion to send Embassadors to the Sultan of Egypt, for the transporting of whom hee was there to take order for the ferring forth of a great thip & other things necessary for the journey. Neither went he flenderly appointed but with a great power, the Cities of Thracia beforewell affured vnto him, fuch as he fuspected being thrust out of office, and others more asfured vnto him being placed in their fleads. But whileft he thus beftired himfelfe, one of those that were most inward with him, detesting so foul a treason, secretly sed from him to his Grandfather, from point to point discourting vnto him all the intended trecheries; and withall, that his nephew had determined to depose him from his empire, or otherwise to bereaue him of his life, if he should stand on his gard; but if in the attempt he should find eafy fuccesse, then to spare his life, and deprining him of the Imperiall dignity, to thrust him as a Monk into a Monastery. And therfore adulted him to beware how he suffered him after his wonted manner to come into the City (for fear of a generall repolt) but rather by force to keep him our. Which the Emperour hearing, and comparing with other things which hee had heard of others, yet founding in his ears, deeming it to be true, flood vp, and in the an-

guith of his foul thus complained vnto God: Renenge my quarrell, ô God, wpon them that do mee C. wrong, and let them be albamed that rife up against me : and preserve thou unto me the Imperial power which by thee given unto me, he commeth to take from me, whom I my felfe begot and advanced. Alter. he began to confider what course to take for the affurance of himself and his state in so great a danger. And first he sent ynto his Nephew (come half way) to forbid him from entring the City; and to tell him, that it was a great folly for him, being so manifest a traitor both vnto his Grandfather and the State, to think his traiterous purposes to be vnknown to the World. And befide, in way of reproofe to rehearfe vnto him, how many occasions he had given for the breaking of the League with his Grandfather; first, in taking away the money from the Collectors, whereof the State neuer flood in more need, by reason of the diufsion of the Empire, which required double charge. Then, in that hee had in the City euery where difolaced H such governors and magistrats as his grandfather had sent thither, and placed others at his pleasure, With many other like facts declaring his treacherous aspiring mind, for which he was, not without cause, by his grandfather forbidden to enter the city. After that, the old emperor by fecret letters craued aid of Charles Prince of Servia, and Demetrius the Despot his ton, who was then Gouernor of Theffalonica and the countries adjoyning, commanding him with Andronicus and Michael his nephews (governors of Macedonia) with all the forces they were able to raife, and such aid as should bee sent them out of Servia with all speed to joine togother, and to go against the yong Emperor. But these letters thus written vnto the Prince of Servia the Despot, and others (as is before faid) were for the most part intercepted, by such as the yong emperor had for that purpose placed upon the streits of Cristopolis and the other I paffages, especially such as were written in paper, yet some others in fine white linnen cloth, and fecretly fowed in the garments of fuch as caried them, escaped for all their streit search, and so were delivered. And in truth nothing was done or about to be don in Constantinople, but that the yong Emperor by one or other was aduertised thereof: Wheras the old Emperor on the other fide understood nothing what his Nephew did abroad, or intended. For all men of their own accord inclined to him, some openly both in body and soul, as they say, and fuch as could not be with him in person, yet in minde and good will were even present with him: and that not only the common fort of the citifens of Constantinople, but the chief Senators, the great Courtiers, yea and many other of the Emperors neerest kinsmen also: Who curioutly observing what focuer was done in the city, forthwith certified him therof. Among K whom there was also Theodorus the Marquis, one of thoold Emperours own sons; who many years before by the Empresse his mother sent into Italy, and there honorably maried, was by his prodigall course of life there grown far indebt; so that leaving his wife and children behind him, he was glad after the decease of his mother, to fly vnto his father at Constantinople and there now lived; who beside that he most honorably maintained him in the Court, and bestowed many great things upon him, paydalso all his debts, which were very great. All which fatherly kindnesse he forgetting, went about most Indas like to have betrayed his aged father. For he also dreaming after the Empire, and for many causes (but especially for that he was in mind, religion, manners and habit become a Latine) by him rejected, thought hee could not do him a greater despight, than by revolting vnto the yong Emperor. So that the L neerer he was in bloud, the more he was his fathers unnaturall enemy. Shortly after, Demetrim the Despot having received the Emperors letters at Thessalonica, called vnto him Andronicus & Michael his Nephews, gouernors of Macedonia; with whom joining all his Forces, and daily expecting more aid out of Servia, he first spoiled the yong Emperors Friends and l'auorits in Macedonia, giuing the spoil of them in all the Cities and towns of Macedonia vnto their foldiers, who made hauock of what foeuer they light vpon : and who foeuer feemed any way to with stand them, or dislike of their proceedings, their goods and lands they conflicated, and draue the men themselues into exile. Neither was the yong Emperor on chenicus in the mean time idle, but secretly sent out his Edicts into all parts of the Empire; yea into the very Cities of Constantinople and Thessalonica; and ouer all Macedonia: wher- M by he proclaimed to the people in generall, a releasment of them from all tributes, impositions and paintents; and franckly promited vnto the Souldiers and men of War, the augmenting of their penfions and pay. Which newes no fooner bruted abroad, but that most men were therwith moved both in word and deed to favour his proceedings, doing what soeuer

A they could to further the same, and by secret letters inuiting him to hasten his comming into the City. Who thereupon comming to Rhegium, by his Embassadours sent from thence The your emperequested the old Emperor, either to giue him leave according to the League made betwixt ror fends Eman them so come into the City, or else to fend him certain of the chiefest of the Nobilitie and grandfaller. Clergy, with fome of the better and more vnderstanding fort of the Bourgers and Citisens alfo.vnto whom hee might franckly speake his minde, for them faithfully to deliuer the same again vnto the Emperor his Grandfather, and the people. Which requests the old Empe. rour perceiving to be full of deceit and treacherie, for a good space answered thereunto nothing at all, but flood all filent, as doubting which to grant. For, to fuffer his Nephew to come into the City, he faw was dangerous, the citifens, as hee well knew, being for the most part inclined to revolt to him fo foon as they should once see him within the gates. And to fend any forth to him(as he defired) might be, as he feared, an occasion of some tumult to be after raifed in the City: for hee knew that his Nephewes drift therein was, openly by faire words, and secretly with great gifts and large promises, first to gain them, & by them the rest of the Citisens. Both which things being dangerous, he made choice of the casier, and seut forth vnto him two of the most noble Senators, two of the most reverend Bishops, two other graue Prelates, and foure of the chiefe Burgesses of the City: vnto whom at their comming vnto him, hee in the open hearing of all there present, delivered this premeditated and crafty speech;

It is not unknowne unto the world, you my Subjects to have alwayes been more deare unto mee than I Theyong empe have been unto my felfe; and how that I have not upon any ambitious conceit, or defire of the fole Go- war feech to nernment against my Grandfathers good will, gon out. For you see that I neither spare myne own life, or these smills attendmy pleasure, for the care I have of you: I come not unto you compassed about with a gard of armed dois men, as is the manner, not of Kings only, for the envy of their High place, but of others also of farre meaner Calling, whom difaster fortune, banished from their Parents and Kindred, bath inforced to wander here and there, with death alwayes before their eyes. Let any mantell me how I came by these wounds which I get beare in my body, but in fight with the Enemies of my Countrey which puffe over out of Afia anto Thracia: as also dwelling neere winto I fter, do with their incursions from thence miserably wast that side of Thracia which is next unto them. For I (to tell you the very truth) seeing the old Emperour by D reason of his great yeares to become float bfull and blockish, and not possible to be awaked out of his drowfie fleepe, neither any whit to grieve, when as the poore Christians his Subjects were both by day and night, some as Sacrifices slaine by the barbarous Enemies, some carried away into most miserable captimitle, and the rest poore and naked to be violently drinen out of their Houses and Cities : not to Speake in the meane time of the greater mischiefes in Alia, and how many Cities have been there loft through the old Emperours floath and negligence. When I faw these things (I say) strucken with a piercing grief which my heart could not endure, I went out for two causes, either by some kinde of honourable death to end my priefetogether with my life, or elfe to the vetermoll of my power to fland my Countrey in some stead. For by no meanes it can come to passe but that a man, and he that hath of long timercinned must at length become loath some waso his Subjects, and incurre their deadly hatred. For why, God hath E made nothing in this life immutable and firme inhereby it commeth to passe, as we see, that all worldly things toy and delight in change. But if a man will as it were force Fortuneto his defire, and striue to binde things unto a certain firm and constant course, be shall but lose his labour, and in vain strue against Nature. But what source is contrary onto Nature, or exceedeth the full bounds thereof, hath in it notther comfort nor delight. This was it that caused the wise men to say, and to leane us as rules, Not to dwell too long upon any thing; and, A measure to be the fairest vertue. For you see how that my grandfather beeing grown unto great yeares, and having reigned to long, I may almost lay, as never did any but be is become hatefull even water all his People : and yet he regardeth not, either how to discharge himself of so great a burthen, or how to relieue the declining state of the Empire, or so much as grieneth to see the Succeffors of the Empire die before him. For my father is dead without any fruit of the Empire, ex-F cept the bare title only and others also neerest to him of bloud, and far yonger than hee, are deadlike-" (e; and haply I my felfe may die also before I shall receive any profit therof: for what can more casily happen especially to a man that shunneth no danger, and regardeth not his life? But some perhaps will suspect me of ambition, for departing from the Emperor my Grandfather, and refusing to be ruled by him: Which thing I neither flatly deny nor altogether confeste for might I fee the Empire encrease, and the touris thereof interzed I would willingly content my felfe, and at my eafe take my reft; cheering my G felle appoint fuch lope as do they that beare with their Cooks, making them to stay long for their dinner, in her there, to fare the better. But feeing the state of the Empire daily to decline from eaill to worse. and ite metrable people carried away Captines or flain by their enemies even at the gates, and under the walls of the Ingeriall City; what deem you me then to thinke? For most meneafe their present grief with the here of future good although the same be but vain. But unto me is not left even such vain hope unto no till contort. And can you maruell at the impotent affection of the great Alexander of Maceand conceed and defleated to fee his Father beap victory upon victory, and to cut off all hope of his fons 123 by leaving him fo few occasions of Warre; and not thinke me (to whom the quite contrary is chanand from whom not only the hope of the Empire is cut off, for the walting thereof, but even the course Caractife to firet and gricue therat? Moved herwith and not able longer to indure it at length 1a- H rul of and requested of the Emperour my Grandfather but a thousand men at Armes, promising him by the fower of God, with them to presente the Cities in Bithynia, and to drine his Enemies farther off. to (or c that (having them) they (hould passe over the Streight and before the Imperial City of Constantime le. Which to (mall a request he not only denied mee, but hatheuer fince taken mee for his mortall Then y. But this and many other things let paffe : I have now another request wnto him by you, which 18, That he would grue me eight thouf and Ducats to content my Souldiers withall, who of long time have from place to place rounced up and down with mee, following myne uncertaine fortune. Which granted, I will no more be anto my Grandfather trouble some, but difmising my Forces hold my felf right wel con-

Having thus faid, he rose out of his seat, and taking them apart one after another, curteoutly diffcourted with them, and to filling them with great hopes, fent them away. Who departing from him, and comming into the City, became as it were the open proclaimers of his practes, inflaming the people with a greater defire of him than before. Which the old Emperor hearing, and perceiving almost all his friends in the City to be in heart revolted from lim, and withall fearing to be of them in fome fudden concourfe flain, was therewith exceeeingly perplexed. Yet he thought it best before any such thing should happen, to proue their mindes, and to heare the counfell of the Patriarch and Afanes, and the other Bishops also: Vintowhom, being by one of the Senators called together, hee declared his minde as fol-

Were I affured, that having depoted my felfe of the Imperiall dignitie, I should my felfe live in fafewe cal me the and see my people well gouerned, I would I should never be of the company of the Faithfull, if I did I seemen and not is much prefer a pleasant quiet contented life before an Empire. For if a man would leeke for the respect the pleasure of the minde what can be more pleasant than to be disburthened of all cares, and free from such hogs also dangers as attenument effaces? But if for my finne and the finnes of my people, as also for the finne of than, commerced mine anceflors, the vengeance of God in manner of a violent tempest raging against vs, subscribed our traction is Empire; and I yet but a youth, by the helps of God reformed and quieted the state of the Empire, grienouth troubled with discord in the Church, and the often invasion of the enemy; and taught by long ex-perions, keep not how in so great hurle and tempost which way to turne my selfe: How can I with safety commit wind my nephew for great a charge, who as yet is both an unstailed youth, and so carelesse of his owne good, as that hee knoweth not how well to gouerne his owne prinate affaires? For giving car his fower to young waskilfull men, and having flung away his imperiall possessions among st them, le benef Heleneth in penury and want ; neither regarding any thing more than his dogges and kites, of when hee keepeth few leffe than a thousand curres, and as many hawkes, and not much fewer men to licke anto them. Wherefore unto such a man, how may I safely commit either my life, or the administration of mine Empire, by God committed unto mee? But I will never witting and willings of away either my subjects or my selse. For my nephew I have loned, not onely more than my me and dalben, but (to say the truth) more than my selse also; as you well know how tenderly that level is him up, how carefully I have instructed and advised hom, as purposing to have left M. bem the here and face four both of my wisedome and mine Empire, that so hee might the better please both Gad and man. But hee, contemning my good counsell, bath frent whole nights in banaucting, and riet, and brothelhouses; wherein hee hath also flaine his owne brother : and to bee tricfe, bee hath refer and lifted up his hand against mee his grandfather, and a grandfather that

A had of him to well deserved, attempting such a willang as the Sun never saw. Wher fore you ought also to hate and detelt his wickednesse, and to rise up to restrain his impudent distoration, and by your Beckeliaficall censure to denounce him wawerthy of the Empire und the communion of the faithfull, as one separated from God , that fo ashamed and corrected, he may louingly thither return, from whence he u shamefully departed, and again bee made heire both of myne Empire and staidnesse : for there is no man aline, whom I had rather have promoted unto the Empire, so that he would hear my precepts, and obey my coun-(ell. As for the conclusion weed in his former freech, it was altogether feigned, crafty and malicious : for you have heard how many reproches hee hath given me in all that freech, wherewith his conclusion agreeth not ; but the more to stirre wo the heaters thereof against mee, did of purpose so conclude his

Vpon this, most of the forestayd graup and learned Bishops agreed, That the yong Emperor should no more be named in the prayers of the Church, vntill he had better conformed himfelf. Howbeit the Patriarch and some others secretly favouring both him and his proceedings, liked not therof, and therfore faying nothing therunto, returned home vato their owne house. But meeting once or twice afterwards in the Patriarchs house, they there conspired The Patriarch against the old Emperor ewith whom also divers of the nobilitie consented, and therupon an mithother Bioath was conceived in writing, wherby they bound themselves to continue constant in that against the emtheir wicked resolution. Wherupon about three days after, the Patriarch causing the bels to be rung, and a great number of the common people flocking together, pronounced the sentence of excommunication against all such as should in their publique prayers omit the name of the yong Emperor, or refuse to:do him all honor due vnto an Emperor. Which thing nor a little grieved the old Emperor, as appeared by his fpeech in faying, If the Doctor of peace be so mad against us, in hope of reward promised by my Wephew, that casting off all shame and granitie, he doubts not to be the author of fedition whathall represse the rash attempts of the vulgar people against us if we respect but mans help? for the Patriarch fo much as in him lieth, is (1 fee) the murtherer of us. So the Bishops of the contrary faction, moved with the notable infolencie of the Patriarch, excommunicated him likewife, as he had done them, with his mad followers, as the authors of sedition and faction, and incited with bribes to the troubling of the States for which cause also he was by the Emperors commandment committed vnto safe, keeping in the Monastery D called Manganium. But about two days after the yong Emperor came to the wals of Conflantinople, to know how his grandfather had accepted the meffengers fent vnto him, erneftly requesting, that it might be lawfull for him alone to enter into the City, to doe his duty to his grandfather. But neither he nor his words were any white all regarded, but was by fuch as frood upon the walls himselfe with stones dritten away: who could not abide to heare him speak, but shamefully railed at him, saying all his talk to be nothing els but deceit & fraud: and so for that time he retyred a little from the walls. But night beeing come certain busie heads amongst the common people, and they not a few, secretly meeting together, gaue him knowledge, that about midnight when as all the citisens were asleep, and the watchmen in securitie, he should come vnto the walls, where they would be ready to draw him vp with ropes, vnto the top of the bulwarks: which done, the matter (as they faid) were as good as dispatched; for that they were persuaded, that the Citisens so soon as they should once see him in the midst of the city among st them, would forthwith all revolt vnto him. So he according to this appointment about midnight approching the wals, found there no fuch matter as he had well hoped, for the receiving of him into the city; but contrariwife, the watchmen carefully watching all along it the wall, and calling one vnto another. Wher fore finding there no hope, he with Catacagenus and Synadenus his chief counsellors, leaving the South fide of the city, in a little boatrowed foftly all along the wall that is toward the sea, if haply they might there find their friends, and so be received in. But there the Watchmen also descrying them from the walls, and calling vnto them, but receiving no answer, began to cast stones at them, and to , F make a noise. So that deceived of their purpose, and out of hope, they were glad to get them farther off, and to depart as they came.

But the euil fucces of this exploit was shortly after with his better fortune recompensed: Thesi alonice for by and by after, secret letters were sent vnto him from Thessalonica, requesting him with yelded to the all speed to come thither; affuring him in the name of the Bishop, with divers of the Nobili- yougemperor.

tic and the good liking of the people in general at his comming to open the gates of the city of vnto him: wherupon he leaving a great part of his army with Synadenus, to keep the Constan. tinopolitans thore, her himselfe with the rest of his power set soward toward Thessalonics where in the habit off a plain country man he entred the city vnfulpe dedibut being got with. in the gate, and there cafting of that simple attyre, wherwith he had coursed his rich & royal garments, and prefently known to be the yong Emperor, the people came flocking about him and with many toyfull acclamations received him as their Lord and Soueraign : yet forme few more favoring the old emperor, fled into the caffle, and there flood your their gard, which after they had for a space notably defended, was at length taken from them.

The flatonica thus yeelded, Demetrius, Andronicus, and Afan Michael, the old Emperors chief captains, then lying with his army not far off and not well trufting one another, fled moft of H whole foldiers prefently went ouer vnto the yong Emperour: who departing from Theffilo. nica, came to Serre, which by composition was delinered vnto him also, but not the castle for that was by Basicion Nicephorus the captain therof foil holden for the old Emperor. This Basic lieu was a man honorably de feended, but of no great capacity or wit, as the finer fort suppo. fed; and therfore not of them much regarded, or thought fit for the taking in hand of any great matter:whom yet the old Emperor for his plain fincerity; more than for any thing elfe. had made captain of that caftle, and governor of the Countrey therabouts, which he ver full held, and in these most troublesome times shewed himselfe wifer than them all that had so thought of him; of whom some died in despair, some fled, some were taken prisoners, and so fuffered a thousand eails; the rest with the losse of their honor traitrously revolting from the old Emperour to the young: wheras he alone, looking but even forward vpon his allegeance with his trust in God, so long as the old Emperor lived, opposed himselfe against these troubles, and frood fast, and was not to be moved with any faire promises or cruell threats of the yong afpiring Emperor, wherof he lacked none. But having strongly fortified the Castle committed to his charge, there kept himselfe, until that hearing of the death of the old Emperor, he then reconciling himself vnto the yong, as vnto his right Soueraign, deliuered up to him the callle ; who in reward of his fidelitie gaue it him again to hold for him, in as ample manner as he had before held it for his grandfather. For wife men honor vertue euen in their encuries, as did King Philip in Demosthenes, when as he faid, If any Athenian living in Athens and tay that he preferreth me before his country, him verily would I buy with much many, but not thinke K him worthy my friendship : but if any for his countries (aka shall hate me, him will I oppugne as a castle, a fireing wall, er a Bulwarke; and yet admire his vertue, and rockon the city happy in having such a man. And so in icw words to conclude a long discourse, the Emperor in short time having romed thorow all Macedonia, and without refistance taken all the strong towns and cities therin, he there took also Demetrins the Despots wife & children, with all his treasure, as also the wives of Andronicus and Asanes, and of all the Senators that followed them: after whom, the great commanders their husbands were also for the most parttaken & cast in prison, some at Thesfalonica, some at Didymoticum, some of the rest afterward most miserably perishing in exile.Wherwith the old Emperor discouraged, was about to have sent Embassadors to his nephew for peace, whilst he was yet thus busied in Macedonia; and had indeed so done, had not another hope arising in the mean time quite altered that his better purpose. It fortuned at the fame time, whilst the old Emperor was thus thinking of peace, that Michael the Bulgarian Prince, in hope of great profit thereof to arife, fecretly offered his aid vnto him against the young Emperour his Nephew. Of which his offer the old Emperour gladly accepted, and Embassadours were sent to and fro about the full conclusion of the matter, no man being acquainted therewith, more than two or three of the Emperor his most secret friends and truthy Counfellors. Yet in the mean time diffaining to be fo coupt up as he was by Synadenus one of the yong Emperor his Nephews chiefe Captaines, euen in the Imperial city of Constant nople; sent out one Constantinus Assau with the greatest part of his strength against him: who incountring him at the river Maurus, was there by him in plain battel overthrown M. and taken prifoner, the rest of his discomfitted army flying headlong back again to Constantinople. All things thus profeeroufly proceeding with the young Emperour, and the countries of Macedonia and Thracia now almost al at his command, hee returned in hast with all his power, vnto Constantinople, to preuent the comming of the Bulgarians thither; as fearing

A lest that they finding the city weakly manned, should trecherously kil the old Emperor, with fuch as were about him, and so seise vpon the city themselves; or at leastwife give him such aid as might keepe him out, and so cut off all his hope for obtaining of the same. At which time also there was great want of victuall in the City, he with his army having thut it yo on the one fide by land, and the Venetians with their gallies on the other fide by fea; who then at ods with the Genoa's dwelling at Pera, kept all that streit sea betwixt Europ and Asia, in such fort as neither victuals nor merchandife could be brought that way, either to Constantinople or Pera. The yong Emperor comming to Constantinople, attempted straitway to enter the city in hope without any great refishance to be received; but being repulfed by the Defendants, he was glad to get him farther off. About this time came also to the city 3000 horsmen, the appointed aid of the Bulgarian Prince, vnto the old Emperour: who although hee wanted men, and was right glad of their comming : yet remembring the harms he had before received by forein aid, & not now daring to trust them too far, suffered them nor to come into the city, more than their Generall and some sew others of the Commanders with him. Now the yong Emperor upon the comming of this aid, left some great harm might betyde either the old Emperor or himself, to the vtter subuersion of their state; secretly sent vnto his grandfather, requesting him to be well adulfed how he trusted those forcein people too far, offering himselse to do what socuer he should command, rather than so great a harme should happen vnto either of them, as was from them to be feared. But the trust the old Emperor had conceiued of this Bulgarian aid, had so confirmed his mind, as that he little listned vnto his Nephewes request: Besides that, how could he well trust him that had so often deceived him. Wherwith the yong Emperor much grieued, and now again almost despairing of his further fuccesse, dislodged, and drew neer vnto the place where these Bulgarian horsemen lay incamped: from whence he fent certaine Embaffadors with great gifts and prefents vnto the Generall and the rest of the chief Commanders, promising them far greater, if they would without further troubling themselves returne home again. Whereunto they willingly granted, and so were of him honourably seasted, and the next day after conducted upon their way homewards. It fortuned that the yong Emperor returning back again from the Bulgarians, and incam- conflantinople

ped in the same place where he before lay; two of the Watchmen of the City, the one called betrayd in the D Camaris, and the other Castellanis, both smiths, fled secretly voto him. Who admitted to his your imperor. presence, and all others commanded to depart, except Catacuzenus, offered to betray the City vnto him, so that he would vnder his hand writing affure them of such a sum of mony, & such possessions as they required. Which he easily granting, and the hour and maner of performing the same being by them declated and agreed vpon, they by and by without longer delay, for fear of suspition, returned again into the city. But the Emperor staying four days in the same place, caused certain ladders to be made of great ropes, such as they vie in great ships, Butthe appointed night beeing come, the two Traitors having before provided great store of good wine, liberally gaue the same by way of curtesie vnto the Watchmen their companions need vnto them : who drank so plentifully therof, that not able any longer to hold up their heads, E they fell into so sound a sleep, as that but for breathing, they differed not much from dead men. About midnight came certain foldiers of the yong Emperors, with the foresaid ladders; which the traitors by and by drawing unto them by a rope cast downe, and making them fast vnto the top of the wall, received by the same 18 armed men: who being got into the City, without more ado brake open the Roman gate, wherby the yong Emperor with his Army presently entred, no man letting him. But it is worth the marking, how things appointed to befall vs, are by no means to be avoided, although we be thereof before never so plainly forewarned: for the same night the city was surprised, immediatly after the setting of the Sun, the gates being thut, a certain countryman came running in al hast from out of a village therby, and knocking hard at the gate called Girolimna, required to speak with some of the soldiers; who beeing come, hee told them that a little before, hee had seen a great number of the yong

Emperours men marching towards the City, by the way that leadeth vnto the Roman gate. Which being told vnto the old Emperor, did not a little trouble him: and therefore thought it good to fend forth certaine Scouts, to fee if all were cleere along the Walls towards the land, from sea to sea. Which his purpose Metochita his chiefe Counsellor letted, saying, it not to beform a couragious mind to be upon fo light an occasion a much moued, for that G either the rumor was falle, or the indeauor of fo few vain, the wals and gates of the city being to filled with armed men: which haply he faid not fo much upon fenorance of martial affairs. as plinded by a certain commanding power, that the supernall decree sinen by God himself againh the old Emperor, might at longth take place. Audagain, the third part of that night yet feant path, divers other countrymen came running vnto the faid gate Gyrolimna, and told the watchmen vpon the walls, that a great number of men were merriogether as the Romane gate. Wherof the Emperor hearing, was therewith much more troubled than before; infomuch that thatply rebuking Meiochita, he faid vnto him, Thou feemft to be strangely metamorpholed into a man of iron, which art become so secure as not to haue any feeling of the danger wherwith we are inclosed: Seeft thou not that the matter requireth, that wee should H not thus fit still and take our rest? For the noise of my nephew soundeth in myne cars as the found of a great drum, and disquieteth my mind: I feel a sea of calamitie broken out against me, which ouerwhelmeth and drowneth my heart and courage. Neuertheles he, firme in his former opinion, made no reckoning of those reports, and therfore rose to go to bed, to shew indeed that he accounted nothing of them but as false alarms. But the Emperor left alone, and no body with him to whom he might breake his griefe, laid him downe vpon a pallet, not putting off his cloaths, but as if he had together with them put on extreame desperation, lay tumbling to and fro, as a man in mind troubled with divers fad and heavy thoughts. In the mean time he heard a great noise at the Court gate, and the report of the entring of the yong Emperor his Nephew, with a great clattering of armour, for there were aboue eight hundred foldiers entred with him; and withall, they of the City on every fide faluted him with most joyfull acclamations. But the old Emperour hearing the great tumult and outcry, rose from his palat, exceedingly troubled; and destitute of all help from his captains and soldiers (for why, his palace was altogether desolate, except of such as were his ordinary waiters) betooke hunfelfe vnto his prayers, befeeching God not to forfake him in fo great a danger, but in his mercy to defend him from the fury of these wicked men. Who presently heard him, & sent him prefent relief; for whilst he was thus praying in the palace, the yong Emperor withour, calling together all his Captains and lieutenants, streitly charged them vpon pain of death, neither by word nor deed to violate the majesty of the old Emperor his grandfather, nor any other about him: for this victory (said he) God hath given vs, and not we our selves: his will ordereth all things, wherunto all things obey; the stars, the air, the sea, the earth, men, slouds, tempetts, plagues, Earthquakes, thours, dearth, and fuch like, fomtime to our blis, & fomtime to our correction and destruction; wherfore vsing vs as the instruments of his chastifement, I e bath given vnto vs this present victory, which peraduenture to morrow hee will give vnto others to vie against vs, and then as we have bin vnto them we have overcome, such will they alto thew themselves vnto vs again, Wherfore if neither nighnesse of bloud, nor that we bee all of one country, will move vs, yet in respect of our selves let vs vse mercy, that we feele not the hand of God voon vs in like case. In the mean time a Courtier opened a wicket vnto the yong Emperor, with this meffage from his grandfather:

For a funch as God this day (my some) hath given unto thee the Imperiall Scepter, taken from mee, I the dien request of thee this one good turne, for many which I have even from thy birth bestowed upon thee, for in this my hardestate 1 let passe, that I next wnto God have been the author of thy nativitie and increase) give me my life, sparethy fathers head, and with violent weapon spil not that bloud from which thouthy felf half taken the fountain of life. Mantruly beholdeth heaven and earth, and heaven and carth behold mens actions: wherefore make not the heavens and the earth beholders of 6 wicked an outrage as rener any maneuer committed. If Brothers bloud long agoe cried out unto the Lord against Cain, how much londer shall the fathers blond cry wato the Lord, and declare to great a wickednesse anto the earth the Sunne, and Starres, and make it abborred of all the Princes of the world? Regard my m. for abic old age, which of it felfe promifeth unto me shortly death, but unto thee a rest after long M cases. Rener encethe hands which have oftentimes most louingly embraced thee, yet crying in thy swathing Clouts. Renevence those lips which have oftentimes most louingly kissed thee, and called thee my other foule : Have pitty upon a bruifed reed, cast downe by fortune, and do not thou againe tread upenit. Anisecing thou art thy filse aman, be not too proud of thy present fortune, but consider the unA certaintie and varietie of worldly things, taking by me example : fee in me the end of long life, and marwell, how one night bauing received me an Emperor of many years, leaveth mee now subject with another mans power for ever.

The yong Emperor Andronicus mooued with this speech, and taking great care of his grandfathers fafety, fearfe abitaining from tears, entred the palace, and comming to his grandfather humbly faluted him, embraced him, and with cheerful words comforted him. Streitway after he went vnto the monattery Manganium, where (as is aforefaid) the Patriark Eleias was by the old Emperors commandement kept fafely; whom the yong Emperor now rooke from thence, and carving him away in one of the Emperours richeft Charlots, restored him again ynto his Patriarchal dignity; wherin he afterwards spared not to reuenge himself to the full and most cruelly to perfecute the old Emperours friends. That day from morning vnto night, a man might haue feen the riches and wealth of fuch noblemen as had taken part with the old Emperor caried away, and their goodly houses overthrowne and made a scorn of the base common people : but especially the house and wealth of Theodorus Metochita, a man but the day before in greatest fauor with his Prince, and of all others next vnto the Emperor himfelf, of greatest authority and credit; whose whole wealth (not that only which was found in his house, but that also which he had put intrust with his friends, discourred by notes found in his study) became most part a prey vinto the common people, and the rest confiscated vinto the Prince. Thus he which erst of all others next vnto the Emperor was accounted most fortunat, was now upon the fudden with his wife and children brought to extream beggery; and after many years felicity, in one day cast into the bottome of despaire and misery. Where a man might have heard many complaining fay, all that wealth and treasure to have beene the bloud and tears of the poor oppressed Subjects, brought to him by them whom hee had made rulers and gouernors of the prouinces and cities of the Empire; to the intent that when they had dealt cruelly with the people, as with their flaues, hee might flop them for comming to complain of their griefs vnto the Emperor: and that the Renengers eye had not always flept, but was now at length awaked, and had of him yet fearfly taken fufficient punishment: which euery where to hear, increased not a little his grief. As for himself, he was confined to Didimoticum, as the place of his exile and banishment; where after he had a certain time poorly liued, hee was fent for backe againe to Constantinople, where having nothing left to relieue himselfe(for his house at the comming of the young Emperour, was in the sury of the people pluckt down to the ground, and the very pauement therof digged vp) he went vnto the Monaflery of Chora there by, which long before built by the Emperour Iustinian, and become ruinous, he in the time of his prosperity had with great charge repaired, and therin now (having made shipwrack of al that he had) quietly shrouded himself, to the great comfort both of his body and afflicted mind, where he not long after died.

But to return again vnto the old Emperor, as yet in doubt what should become of himself: Niphon inten. it fortuned that the same day the city was taken, the young Emperor at night returning to the ceth the young Palace, by the way met with Niphon formetime Patriarch, who asked him how they meant to higgsandier. E deal with his grandfather. Wherunto the yong Emperor answering, that he would deal with him honorable and Emperor like, he was by him therfore blamed and reproued. For this Niphon being of a crafty subtill wit and malicious nature besides that he secretly hated all them vpon whom Fortune greatly either fauned or frowned, bare an especiall grudge against the old Emperor: first, For that at such time as he was right worthily, for his shameful couetous. nesse and extortion, by the rest of the Bishops and Clergy thrust out of the Patriatkship, hee was not by him (as he looked for) defended; and fecondly, For that dreaming again after the Patriarchal dignity, he thought it one good step therunto, to have him, as his greatest enemy, taken out of the way. Wherfore he faid now vnto the yong emperor, If thou defire to reign without fear give not thine honor wato another; but taking all the ornaments of the empire from the old man, F cast hair cloath upon him, and so clap him up fast in prison, or else thrust him out into exile. This mischieuous counfell this wicked man gaue against the poore old distressed Emperour, not remembring how vnworthily hee had by him beene before preferred vnto the highest degrees both of honour and wealth, if he could there have kept himselfe. Vnto which vngracious counfel divers others of the Nobility also consenting, so wrought the matter among it them, that although they could not quite draw the yong Emperors mind from his grandfather, yet & they much changed the fame, fo that he could no longer endure to take him for his companion in the empire. Wherupon after many meetings & confultations had, it was decreed. That the old man thould still retain the name and ornaments of an Emperor, as before, but not to meddle in any matters, nor to come abroad, but to fit still quietly in his chamber, with the yearly maintenance of 10000 ducats, for the maintenance of himselfe and such as tended voon him; to be raifed of the fithing before the city of Constantinople; a poore pension for the maintenance of fo great an Emperor. Of which fo shameful a decree Esaias the Patriark was also a furtherer : who seeing an Emperor that had reigned so long, cast down, and shut vo as it were in prison, was so far from grieuing thereat, that soolishly rejoicing, bee in token thereof absurdly wrested this text of Scripture, saying in his merriment, Latabitur justus cum viderit ul. H tienem; The luft shall rejoice when he seeth the revenge; calling himself juft, and the Emperot Reuenge. But the old Emperor thus shut vp in his chamber (differing in nothing but in name from a prison) not long after the state of his body overthrown with griefe, and corrupt humors distilling out of his head, first lost one of his eies, and shortly after the other also. and to opprefied with eternal l darknes, mingled (as faith the Scriptnre) his drink with teares. and are the bread of forrow, being of tentimes to his great griefe most bitterly mocked & derided not by them only which were by his enemies fet to gard him, but of his owne feruants allo. Not long after the yong Emperor falling ficke, in fuch fort as that it was thought hee would not recouer, Catacuzenus and the rest of his greatest fauorites and followers, carefull of their own estate, & yet doubtfull of the old blind Emperor, denised many things against him, but al tending to one purpose, for the shortning of his daies. But in the end, all other deuises fet apart, they put him to his choice, either to put on the fiabit of a Religious, and fo for ever to bid the world farwel, or els to take what should otherwise ensue, the best wherof was either death, exile, or perpetual imprisonment in the loath some castle of oblinion. For the putting where f in execution Synadenus (of all others to him most hatefull) was appointed. At which hard choice the old emperor, as with a world of woes fuddenly oppreft, lay a great while voon his bed as a man speechles: for what could he do els, except he had had an heart of feed or adamant being then compassed about with many barbarous and merciles foldiers, and his domedicall feruants took from him, and no man left that would vouchfafe to direct him (being blind) whither to go, or where to ftand. But to make the matter fhort, would he would he nor. And configurate they made choice for him themselves, polling & shaving him, & casting a Monks habit vpand I more on him, changed his name after the maner of the religious, and called him by the name of Antheny the Monk. Glad was Esaias the false Patriark of this the hard estate of the old Emperor. constitution for that now that he was professed a religious, there was left no hope for him to recour again the Empire, either cause for himself to fear. Yet hee thought it good to be aduised, in what fort remembrance should be made of him in the Church prayers, if any were at all from thenceforth to be made. Wherof to be by the old Emperor himselfe resolued, he (feeming to be very fory for that which was don, but purposing indeed therin to deride him) fent two Bishops vnto him, to know what his pleasure was to have done therein. Vnto which their demand, he (oppressed with heavinesse, and fetching a deep sigh from the bottom of his heart)

The wantiler. As in poore Lararus appeared a double miracle, that being dead heerofe, and being bound, walk d; I'm of one old enen for was it to be done in mee, though in quite contrary manner. For lo, beeing aline I am dead, as Emperor to the careful out with the waters of calamitie and wo: And beeing loofe, I am bound, not my hands and enclub frond feet only but my tongue also, wherewith unable to do any thing else, I might yet at least bewaite my woes and wrongs anto the aire, and fuch as by chance should heare mee, and anto this most wofull darkenesse wheren I must for over fit. But shame hath closed my mouth; my Brethren abhor me, and my Mothers lons account me as a stranger unto them, and the very light of myne eye is not with him. My Friends and Neighbours flood up against me, and all that saw me laughed mee to scorne. My feet had almost M A pped and my foot-steps were almost ouerthrown: for I fretted against the Wicked, when I saw the peace of the angualy. The Emperors long ago gauegreat priviledges unto the Church, even those which it at this day emoreth: and the Church gaue to them again power to chusewhom they would to be Patriarks. Now concerning him that fent you, I not only nominated him wate the Patriarchall Dignitie, but I my.

A selfe made choice of him, and preferred him before many other right worthy and famous men, being himfelf a man grown old in a poore privat life never before preferred, or for any other thing famous. I will not fay bow often I have holpen him and don him good but now when he should again have relieved me in my calamity be joineth hands with myne enemies against me, more cruell upon me than any other blondy handed executioner ; not ashamed to ask me how I would be remembred in the Church feigning him-Cell to be ignorant and fory for myne eftate, much like unto the Egyptian Crocod k of Nile which hauing killed some liaing beast lieth upon the dead body & washeth the head ther of with her warm tears which the afterwards demoureth together with the dead body. But what to answer him unto this his catchine question I know not : for if I shall say, As an Emperor I shall forthwith be slaine by them which for that purpose baue me inhold : but if I fay, As Anthony the Monke, it shall bee taken as the free confession of B my estate, by them who have craftely contrived myne overthrow; as if I had not by compulsion, but even of mine own free will put on this monasticall habit, which God knowes was never in my thought.

Having thus faid, he fent them away without any other answer; but sitting down you his bed fide faid My foul return again into the rest, for the Lord bath dealt well with thee : and spake no more in declaration of his grief, his tongue there staying by his singular wisedome, or else with the greatnesse of his forrow, and so against his wil in filence passing ouer his beaumesse, his mind with the greatnesse of his woes ouercome, and as it were assonished, before the humors gathered into the brain could be diffolued into tears. For as the Sun fending forth his moderat beams, draweth vnto it many exhalations and vapours, but casting them forth more plentifully, doth with his immoderat heat confume the same before they can be drawne vp: to the moderat affections of the mind may have their griefs by words and tears exprest; but fuch as exceed all meafure, and with their vehemencie as it were overthrow the mind, viually make men to fland fill mute and filent, or if they speak at all, to speak idly and nothing to the purpose, as men beside themselves or in an extasse. But for the resolution of the question by the Bishops demanded, the deuout Patriark decreed, That in the church praiers he should be remembred before the Emperor his Nephew, by the name of the most religious and zealous Monk Anthony: which was done (God wot) for no good zeal to the poor blind man, but the better to colour the matter with the common people, as if he weary of the world, had voluntarily taken upon him that filly profession. Neuertheles within 4 days after, Synadenus underflanding them in enery place to whifper among ft themselves, and secretly to mutter against the hard dealing with the old Emperor, who had long reigned ouer them, and fo was by right again to do if his nephew should chance to die, and that the Ecclesiastical! laws inforced no man against his wil to enter into religious orders; he therwith inraged, fent to him certain of his own confederacie to exact of him an oath in writing. That he should neuer after that time feek after the empire, or yet accept of the same if it were offred him, neither to substitute any other:which if he refused to do, to put him in fear of his life. And the more to terrifie him, fee a gard of infolent barbarous foldiers over him; for fear of whom he yeelded to do what foeuer they required: and fo his oath being folemnly conceined in writing (another man leading his hand because he was blind) he signed the same with a red crosse aboue, and a black crosse beneath, after the maner of the Religious. Having thus lived in darknes diffgraced, thut vp in his chamber as a man forfaken of the world, with a fure gard euer to attend him by the space of two years, it fortuned that the twelfth of February towards night (a day in the Greeke church dedicated to the vigil of S. Anthony, whose name they had given him) certaine of his friends that were fuffered to have acceffe vnto him, going as their maner was once in three or four daies to visit him (among whom was his daughter, fortime the Prince of Servia his wife, but as then a widow, and Nicephorus Gregorus author of this history) he entied with them as with his friends, into a familiar difcourfe of many matters, wherin he fo deceived the time that it was past midnight before they perceived how the time passed. But the cocks crowing he brake off the talk, and bidding them farwell, gaue them leave to depart, pleafantly faying, F that to morrow they would make an end of their discourse. Who all thereupon tooke their leaue and departed, no fign of any ficknes as then appearing upon him : who after they were the old Empegon, called for meat and did eat: the meat he cat was certain fiel fifth, for it was with them a rors death fasting day, & he had not cat any thing. After which when as he should have drunk a cup of wine for the comforting of his cold fromacke, & difgefting that so hard meat he drank cold water, as his maner was when he felt any inward heat, to drink the fame immoderatly: which G hurtfull kind of diet he then vling also, began by and by to feel a great paine in his stomacke. and to pretently after became very fick, falling withall into a great loofnes of body, fo that in the space of one quarter of an hour he was glad oftentimes to arife, and to go vato an homely honse of office in an inner chamber, therby to discharge natures burden : where after many e. micuations, fitting down upon an homely bed fast by, and not able to recouer his own bed, have ung as then none to help him, there before it was day died, after he had reigned 43, years. His death was by many strange signs and accidents as it were foretold; first a great eclipse of the Sun appeared inft fo many daies before his death as he had lived years: and after that, another celipfe of the moone, and with it an earthquake, the day before hee died at night, beeing Saint Authories even, whose name his enemies had thrust vpon him: at which time also the H feawith a great tempest arising about the wonted bounds, madediuers breaches in the walls of the city toward the sea, as if it had bin some violent enemy, & ouerstowed also divers hou. tes in the city. Many croffes and pinacles were then also from the tops of churches and other highbuildings oueithrown; and with them a great pillar, sometime one of the ornaments of the city, standing before the church commonly called the Church of the 40 Martyrs : which being very high, and below burnt & worn away with time, had put many in a fear as they paffed by it, left it should have fallen upon them; infomuch that the Emperor upon a time pafting that way, was requested by some of the nobilitie there present, to ride farther from it. for tear of falling upon him : who fmiling at their vain fear, by chance answered, o would to God I might line follows as this pillar will stand. Which now falling out according to his speech, gaue I many of them that had heard him to fay, occasion to maruell. His dead body was honorably buried in the monastery of Libe, which his mother Theodora the Empres had not long before new built, and his obsequies there (after the maner of that time) yearly solemnly kept by the foace of nine daies.

Thus at length having passed through the troubled state of the Greek empire during the long reign of the old Emperor Andronicus, the confiderat Reader may eafily see the causes of the declining and ruin also of this famous empire; and how that the Greek Emperors, troubled with their tempestuous affairs neerer home in Europe, yea in the very Imperial! City it felf, and in their own palaces, were not at leifure to look ouer the fereit into Asia, but glad to leaue their territories there vnto the weak defence of themselves. At which time, and even in the midft of the forefaid trouble, otheran on the one fide with great industry layd the found dation of his Empire in Phrygia and Bithynia, (now the greatest terror of the World) and then did those things which we now hauewritten of him. The other Princes of the Turkes alto the successors of Sultan Aladin, at the same time on the other side along it the river Meander incrocking as fast: untill that at last amongst them they had thrust the Greeke Emperours quite out of Asia; and in fine became themselves, together with the Greeke Empire, a prey vnto the Othoman Kings; as in the further processe of this history shall more at large ap-

But again to return to Othoman himself, who all this while that Andronicus the Greek Emperorwas thus troubled, had with his fon Orchanes fought by all meanes on every fide to enlarge his kingdom. The garritons by him left in the two late built castles neer to the great eitv of Prula, under the charge of the two valiant Captains Actemur and Balabanzuck (as is before declared) having now continued there certain years, had by shutting up the passages, and spoiling of the country, brought the city into such distres and penury, that many of the Citifens and other the poor Christians fled into the city, died of famin. The rest now out of all hope to be relicued by the Greek Emperor, not then able to relieue himself, came to compofition with Orchanes (for Othoman was then fick of his old difease the gout) covenanting with him, that they might in fafety with life & liberty depart, and so much of their goods as they themsclues could carry; and to yeelded to him the city. Which conditions (as most write) were on the Turks behalf wel and faithfully performed: yet fome there be that report them M to have bin in most part by Orchanes broken. Thus was Prusa, one of the greatest cities of that part of Afia, veelded vnto the Turks, in the year of our Lord 1327; and was afterwards by orchance made the royal feat of the Othoman Kings.

About this time, or very thortly after, Othoman in the eight and twentieth year of his reign

A died at the age of 69, Anno Dom. 1328, and lieth buried at Prusa, where his Tombe is yet at The death of this day to be seen in a certain chappell of an old Monastery, in a castle standing in the midst of hours, but of the city; couered with a mantle of greene Chamlet, and a little tulipant or Turkish hat rudar Prufic (fuch as he yfed to wear) lying ouer his head, differing from those which the Turks now wear, especially the better fort of them, being so great that they can scarse therewith come in at a dore, There is also another monument of him to be seene at Suguta, fast by the sepulchre of his father Ertogral, there made by his fons in remembrance of him, wherof some have reported him to have bin there buried. Howbeit the Turks themselves generally suppose the true monument wherin he is interred, to be at Prusa, as is aforesaid. He was wise, valiant, politick and fortunat, but ful of diffimulation, and ambitious aboue measure; not rash in his attempts, and yet very resolute: what he took in hand he commonly brought to good effect. He was bountifull and liberall to all men, but especially to his men of War, and the poore, whom he would many times feed and cloath with his own hands. Of a poor lord hip he left a great kingdom having subdued a great part of the leffer Asia; and is worthily accounted the first founder of the Turks great kingdom and empire. Of him, the Turkish Kings and Emperors have ever fince bin called the Othoman Kings and Emperors, as lineally of him descended: and the Turks themselves of manida, as the people or subjects of Othoman or Ofman, for so he is of the Turks commonly called.

Ore, that in the reckoning up of certain of the great Christian Princes and Prelats of the same time, at the end of energy the Turkish Kings and Emperors lines, the first and greatest number following their names, showeth the year of our Lord, wherin furch an Emperor, king or Bilhop, began to reign or fit; and the number following, how long he reigned of fate. As for example, Andronius the elder began to reign in the Baft in the year of Grace 1282, and reigned 43 years. And fo of the red. Wherin we feek not the exact computation vnto a moneth or day, (as not much material to our halfory, or any part of cur purpose) but only the reasonable view of the great Princes of the forepassed times, as they lived in ages together

THE LIFE OF ORCHANES, OR VRCHAN, SECOND KING OF THE TVRKES.

MFTER the death of othoman, his two fons, orchanes (whom the Turks call Vrchan) and Aladin his brother, having with great solemnitie interred their father at Prusa, immediatly summoned a Parliament, whereunto both the brethren came, accompanied with the chief of their nobilitie. This parliament was called especially for the establishing of the succession in this new kingdom, and for the division of Othomans treasure & goods betwixt them two his fons. But yoon view taken, there was no money, plate, or jewels found in the Kings coffers, for that he had in his life time most bountifully bestowed it vpon his men of war: fo that all the wealth hee left vnto them his fons, was the honorable remembrance of his life for them to imitate, large dominions for their possessions, store of ready horses & atmor fit for service, The mealth owith great herds of beafts and cattel for houshold prouision. Wherupon Orchancs demanded thomas left to of his brother Aladin; what order he thought was best to be taken with those things by their ordernes and father fo left? To whom Aladin answered, That it was most requisit first to establish a King Mindia. in their fathers Kingdome; which like a good Sheepheard might gouerne and defend his people, rule and maintaine his men of War, and provide all things meete and necessarie for defence of his kingdom: and that vnto him of right belonged all these other things by their father left, as the patrimonie of his fucceffor, for the common good, and maintenance of his estate. As for myne own part (said Aladin) I claime no interest therein, you being my elder brother, and so vnto me in stead of a father; by whom also you have bin these two years as it were already put in possession of the Kingdom, all things being committed to your gouern-E ment during the time of his late ficknes. This modelty of Aladin was greatly commended of all the antient counfellors; by means wherof the kingdom in all peaceable maner descended to Orchanes. In regard of which curtefie, Orchanes would gladly have made Aladin his brother Prefident of his Councell. Which honor hee would in no wife accept, but requested rather that he would give him the lordship of Fodore in Tekences country; which Orchanes freely granted. In which lordship of Fodore Aladin for most part lived a privat and quiet life, and afterwards built two Mahometan churches, and an abby at Prufa, there yet at this day to

Some Latine Historiographers otherwise report this beginning of orchanes his reigne; as that Othoman thould have three fons, and that Orchanes the yongest obtained the kingdom by murthering his other brethren. A practife of late much vied among it the Turkish Princes, but not before the time of Bajazet the first of that name, who first of the Turkish Monarchs when the bay a embrued his hands with his brothers bloud. Where before they vsed all brotherly lone one birour murdiage of their vnto another, as the most probable histories collected out of the Turks own Chronicles do breibren first affirm.

The Christian princes and captains presently upon the death of othoman recoursed the ci. G ty of Nice, with divers other castles and forts, out of the Turks hands: as it commonly chanflurressied ceth, that dominions lately won with great perill, are foon again loft, the conqueror dving before there be a firm gouernment established. Amongst other forts by the Christians repos. icffed, the cattle of Tzuprichifer, scituate vpon the passages of the river Sangarius, most griened the Turkes, for thereby their passage into that part of Bithypia was much impeached. Wherfore Orchanes defirous to recouer this castle disguised himselfe with a few other of his best foldiers, in the apparell of Christian merchants, and came to the castle, crauing leave to patie as merchants. The warders of the castle verily supposing them by their attire to be merchants opened the gates and let them into the castle: who presently drew their swords, slew the warders, and fo by force possessed the castle, to the great benefit of the Turks, and the hurt H of the poor Christians yet left in the country of Bithynia: for they having now opened a way ouer the river Sangarius, and as it were broken down the strongest desence of that side of the Greek empire, at their pleasure forraged the countrey in such fort, as that the great city Nice for want of victuals to relieue fo great a multitude as for fear of the Turks was fled out of the country into it, was brought to great extremitie and want. For the relief wherof, and for the repulting again of the Turks, Androvicus the yong Emperor, who then commanded all, with fuch an army as he was then able to raife, passed himself in person ouer the streit of Constan. tinople, into Afia: the greatest strength of his army consisted in 2000 choice horsemen, the reft, as well horse as foot, being for the most part artificers taken up in the City, men altogether macquainted with arms (who in token of their cowardife, & that they were more mind. full of flight than of fight, caried ouer with them almost as many long boats and such other fmall veffels, as they were men, to be ready to receive them at such time as they should flie) or els abje & rascals taken up here and there, men of whom no great thing was to be expected, and of all others most vnsit for so great a Prince as was the Emperour, to commit the defence of his person and honor vnto. But Orchanes hearing of his comming, sent certain of his most expert Captains to forelay the streit passages of the countrey wherby the Emperour was to paffe; following also himselfe after with his army of purpose to incounter the Emperor: who In three days march after his landing in Asia, being come to Philochrene a little town in Bithy nia, and understonding that Orchanes having before taken the streits, lay not far off incamped with his army; he there at Philochrene pitched his tents, and staid that night also. But the next morning, the Sun as yet scarfely risen, he seeing divers companies of the Turks comming down from the mountains fast by, put his army in order of battell, and so set forward to meet them; where to begin the fight, the Turkes archers freely bestowed their piercing shot among the Christians, still keeping themselves aloof off, so to do the more harm. Which the Emperor mistaking, and supposing that their keeping off to have proceeded of fear, incouraged therwith, commanded certain loofe companies difforderly to march forward, and to skirmish with them. Which his more expert Captains not liking, would have otherwise persuaded him as to have kept his ftrength together against the danger of the battel. Neuertheles fuch was his youthful heat, as that he could by no means be otherwise intreated, but that forward needs they must. But all the forenoon spent in this light and tumultuary kind of skirmithing, and the Sun at the highest now shining very hot, Orchanes from the top of the moun, tains perceiving the Christians well wearied with the heat of the day and long skirmishing, came down from the hils with a world of men following him; who with a most hideous cry charged the Christians on enery side, some afar off with their arrowes, and some hand to hand with their fwords and otherweapons: whose assault the Christians at the first most valiantly received, and a great while right worthily defended themselves, having wounded and slain a number of their enemies. Which hard fight was on both fides couragiously maintained till the approching of the night, with great flaughter on both fides; at which time the Christians weary of the long fight, and oppressed with the multitude of their enemies, disorderly retyring toward their trenches, and hardly pursued by the Turkes, received there a great losse as M weil of their horsmen as of their foot: but by the comming on of the night the battell was at length ended with uncertain victory. Among others there hurt, the Emperour himselfe was wounded in the foot with an arrow. That night hapned a fad mishap, and a manifest token of Gods wrathsfor Orchanes having to his cost made proof of the strength and valor of the Chri-

The Frencher

A flians and doubting they would the next day come on further into the country, left three hundred horsemen as scouts, to attend the enemies removing; and himselfe with his army retired before hand to take advantage of tuch places as the Christians were to passe by. But the Emperor in the euening leaving his campe, and going to Philocrene, a little town fast by, the better to have his wound dreffed; the rest of the army understanding of his departure, and suppofing him to have fled for feare (as if Orchanes with a great army would that night have flaine them all) fled them selves also out of the campe, every mothers son, some to their long boats and other little veffels they had for that purpose brought ouer the streit; some halting toward the town gates, were by the multitude of others running headlong after them, overborne and trodden to death; othersome hanging one at anothers taile, like a chain, got some part of them vp to the top of the rampiers of the towne; othersome drawne backe by them that hung vpon them, falling downe together by heaps, and trod vpon by others, there perithed; fome (as is reported) died there for very feare, no man either chafing or hurting them, so weake is mans courage, when God withdraweth from him his strength. But in the morning the Sun arising, the three hundred Turks left for foouts, perceiving the flight of the Christians, entred the forfaken campe, where they found horces, armor, and empty tents, year the Emperours owne furniture, and his horses ready sadled: of all which, two hundred of these Turks tooke the spoile at their pleafure, and the other hundred purfuing the dispersed Christians, like heartlesse men wandring here and there, flew a great number of them. The Emperor himfell feeing his army thus (as it were by the hand of God) ouerthrown and differred, tooke thipping alfo, and to re-C turned to Constantinople. After whose departure, the Turkes seising upon many sea towness along it the coast of Bythinia, and there seating themselves, layd heavy tributes you the other country townes and villages: for the benefit whereof they spared to destroy them, together with the inhabitants, which they might at their pleasure full easily have done. Now lay the great city of Nice in the fuds, the enemy commanding all the country about it, living as fickemen do by hope, and holding out onely vpon hope of a thousand horsemen which the Emperor (notwithstanding his late discomfiture) had promifed forthwith to fend, there to lie in garrifon for the suppressing of the Turks. Of which aid so promised Orchanes vnderstanding, furnished eight hundred of his horsemen after the manner of the Christians; and fetching a great compaffe about came at length into the high way that leadeth from Conflantinople to Nice, and so trouped directly toward the city, as if they had come from Constantinople. At the same time he sent 300 of his other horsemen in the habit of Turks, to sorrage and spoyle the country as much as they could within the view of the city, now for want of victuals brought into great extremity, which whileft they were a doing, the other eight hundred horsemen in the attire of Christians, following youn them, as if it had bin by chance, charged them, and in the fight of the citizens put them to flight; which done, these counterteit horsemen returned directly againe towards Nice. The citizens which with great pleasure had in the meane time from the wals feen the most part of the skirmish, and how they had put the Turks to flight, supposing them to be the Constantinopolitan horsemen, whom they dayly expected, with great joy opened the gates of the city to receive them as their friends. But The citie of they being entred the gates, presently set upon the Christians, fearing no such matter: & being Nice Jumpiled by the Turks. feconded with the other three hundred, which in diffembling manner had fled before, & were now speedily returned, bringing also with them other companies of Turkes, before laid in secret ambush not far off, they won the great and famous city of Nice, which they have ever fince vntill this day possessed : the spoile whereof was given to the souldiers for a prey, and the citizens all led away into miterable captivity and thraldome. Whilest Orchanes was thus busied, his other captains did with great courage & successe inlarge his dominions on al sides, dayly incroching vpon their weake neighbors the Christians. Cunger-Alpes one of his valiant captains, subdued the country of Mudurn, or Modrin, in Phrygia; and Bolli in Paphlagonia: appointing one Abdurachinan a man of great valour, to gouerne the country. And at the fame time another of his old captains called Accessed, brought Candara in Paphlagonia, and Ermeni,a country neer vnto the mountain Horminius, into the Turkish subjection, placing garrifons in all the Castles and fores which he had won, of whom some part of those Countries was after his name called CoZZa Ilini, that is to fay, The old mans country. So that Orchanes his kingdom grew daily greater & greater, as wel by the industry of his chieftains, as of himselse.

About this time it fortuned, the captains fon of Scamandria (a town not far from the ruins c of the antient city of Troy, and about a daies journy from the renowned castle of Abydus) to depart out of this world:vnto whose funerals, being kept in the country, whilest his wofull father the captaine with his friends out of Scamandria reforted, the old crafty Turke Acceepy 20 lying alwaies in wait, as a fox for his prey, fuddenly fet vpon those heavy Christians, whereof he flew the most part, and tooke the rest prisoners. Amongst whom he also tooke the Captain of Scamandria, with his castle and country; whom he afterwards led prisoner vnto the castle of Abydus, which is one of the most famous castles scituate vpon the sea coast of Asia, over against Schus in Europe; where the sea of Hellespontus by the narrow streit falleth into the fca of Ægeum:two castles much renowned by reason of their nigh scituation, and yet placed in divers parts of the world; eternifed also by the ever-living wits of Poets, for the adventu. H rous paffage of Leander over that fret of the fea, to his love Hero: which castles are now called Dardanella, Access 73 having brought the captine Captaine of Scamandria (lately a man of great account in that countrey) so neere as he could vnto the castle of Abydus, offered to fer him at liberty if they would furrender their Castle, otherwise they should see him cruelly flain before their faces. These Turkish threats nothing moued them of Abydus, more than to fay, That they might if they would cut off his head, feeth him and eathim, but the castle they intended not to deliuer. The same Captaine was afterward by the commandment of Orchanes profered to the Emperor of Constantinople to be redeemed, which he refused : yet at the last he was ranformed by the governor of Nicomedia, and againe fet at liberty. Accepted of long time held the castle of Scamandria; yet so continually molested with the garison of Abydus, 1 and men of war fent from Contiantinople, that he with his followers were glad for the most part to live on horsback, to be alwaies in more readines against the attempts of their enemies, The captain of the castle of Abydus had at that time a faire yong gentlewoman to his daughter, who (as the faid) chanced to dream (what the had happily waking for the most part wished) That being fallen into a deep myry ditch, out of which she could by no means help her felfe, a lufty yong gallant comming by, did not only help her out, but also in friendly manner made her cleane, and afterwards apparelled her in rich and coastly attire. The danger of this dream much troubled the tender gentlewoman, but the image of the young gentleman was fowell phantafied in her brain, that waking, she thought she still faw him, and sleeping longed fore for what the faw not. Thus whilest this yong gentlewoman with great deuotion entertained this K imaginary man, the old gray headed Turke Accepaza came, and with a strong company besie-At Medicared ged her fathers castle of Abydus. During which siege, this gentlewoman oftentimes wentyp into the high turret of the castle, from whence she might at pleasure see the martiall deeds on both fides, and take ful view of all the enemies camp. But fee the chance, as Abdurachman with great courage and no leffe brauery, approched neere to the fiege of the caftle, the thought (voon the first fight of him) that he was the very man whom she had before dreamed of, and whose Idea was in her heart so deepely imprinted : wherefore she fully resolued to performe what the had without witnesse with her selfe determined. And waiting another time when Abdur..chman approched the castle, she cast downe to his seet a letter written in Greeke, and made fast vnto a stone which letter he taking vp, deliuered the same to the general! Access 74. L Wherein after she had discouered her passionate affection, she promised to deliuer the castle into Abdurachmans power, if the Turks would raise their siege, and Abdurachman himselse with fome few would fecretly returne to the castle in the dead time of the night, and then sollow her direction. Accesson like an old foxe, which is feldome taken in the trap, gaue small credit to these louing lines, for searc of treason; yet for so much as you are the man (said hee to Abdurachman) whom she vpon speciall liking hath made choice of for the purpose, wil you aduenture your person > And he armed with a manly courage, a surer desence than any armor of proofe, incited also with hope of honour, riches, and beauty, all worthy prizes for martiall minds; faid, he would undertake the atchieuement of that exployt, if it were his pleasure so. Whereupon Accessza, because nothing should be suspected by his sudden departure, gaue M a sharpe assult to the castle, as if he would have taken it by fine force, yet in the end retyred, and presently brake vp his siege, as despairing of the winning thereof. The desendants of the Castle thinking themselues deliuered of a great danger, greatly rejoyced and as in the like case it oftentimes salleth out, in their great jolity surcharged themselues that night with

A excesseboth of meat and drink. But Abdurachman at the time in the letter appointed, put himfelfe voon the way with certaine felect fouldiers, and about midnight came to the appointed place of the castle, where the yong gentlewoman was attending his comming : and he by her means was conveyed into the caitle, and so by her directed to the porters lodge; where hee flew the porter being fast asleepe, and opening the gates, let in his followers, which went directly to the captains lodging, and there took him prisoner, being before their comming overtaken with wife, and fast asleep. Thus was the castle of Abydus surprised by the Turks, from whence they had a faire prospect out of Asia into Europe. The captaine with his faire daughter, and the greatest part of the rich spoile of the castle, was deliuered to Abdurachman, to be presented to Orchanes at his court, then lying at Neapolis. Who wonderfull glad of so good B news, gaue the faire gentlewoman, with the greatest part of the prey to Abdurachman. The posteritie of this man (as they fay) yet remaine among the Turks. Among st others of the warlike captaines there was also one Cararachman, whose name was so dreadfull to them of Constantinople, that when their children cried, they would terrifie them to make them hold their peace, by faying, Cararachman comes. Not long after, the two valiant aforenamed worthy captaines, Cunger-Alpes, and Accecozza died. After whose death, Orchanes made his sons, Solyman and Amerath, lords and gouernors of those countries and provinces. And intending (by the persuasion of Abdurachman) to be siege Nicomedia, he levied a great army, wherewith he tooke divers small castles and forts as he marched towards the city. Nicomedia was at that time gouerned by an honorable lady, kinfwoman vnto Andronicus the Emperor of Constantinople: but the feeing her city befieged by the Turks, and doubting her own forces not to be able to hold out the fiege, by a trufty messenger offered to yeeld the city vnto Orchanes, vpon condi-Nicomedia tion, That she with so many citisens as would, might in safety depart with their lives, liberty, Orchanes, and goods: which being granted, thee with so many as would follow her, departed out of the city by night, taking thipping for Constantinople.

Orchanes having taken Nicomedia, made his fon Solyman gouernor of the fame. The churches of the Christians he converted vnto Turkish Meschitas or temples. The greatest church (being of wonderfull beauty) he converted into a colledge or schoole, for the learned profesfors and students of Mahamets law, which is yet called in Nicomedia, Orchanes his schoole or colledge. And because the Countrey necrevnto Nicomedia, lying upon the sea, was cuer in danger to be spoiled by the gallies of Constantinople, he placed in those countries divers of his most experienced soldiers to defend the same appointing to every of them possessions and pensions, according to their degrees and merit. After this, Orchanes by the councell of his brother Aladin, commanded all his men of war to we are white caps, thereby to be knowne from others, which commonly wore red. Such manner of caps the Ianizaries vse at this day. The Turks also in Orchanes raigne, and long time after, vsed not to cut or shaue their beards, but did weare them long: fo that if the King would difgrace any man, hee would in his displeasure command his beard to be cur or shauen. The maner of cutting and shauing their beards which they now vie, they learned of the Italians; of whom they have also borrowed many other fathions, not only differing, but quite contrary to their antient manners and customes. Orchanes about this time removed his court to Nice, where he lay a long time after. There he built a Orehants remofumptuous church, appointing a preacher to preach to the people enery Fryday:he crected in to Nice. Nice also two faire abbies, in the one of which, he with his own hands served the strangers and poore the first dinner. He was the first that builded abbies or monasteries among the Turks; whose example most of his successors have imitated, and is amongst them used unto this day. The government of Nicomedia Orchanes committed to his eldest fon Solyman (as is beforefaid) a Prince of great towardlinesse; giving him in great charge to have a vigilant eie to the towns of Taraxa, Gouinuca, and Mudurne, which were nigh vnto Nicomedia, yet in possession of the Christians: all which townes, with the countries adjoyning, Solyman in short time got without force, by composition. This Solyman was of a princely disposition, so tempring justice with elemencie in his gouernment, that many Christians allured with his vertues, became of his religion, and gladly put themselves under his subjection: the politicke lawes of the country he neither abrogated nor changed, but maintained as they had been of antient time accustomed, whereby he greatly woon the hearts of the people. Amurath his younger sonne, orchanes made lord and gouernor of Prusa, after he had removed his court to Nice. And the

There was at this time in Orchanes court a noble yong gentleman called Turson-beg, the son of Dharais King of Charatia, by whose persuasion Orchanes in person himselfe with a strong army, made an expedition into that country: for that his fathers subjects after the death of the Kim his father, denied their obedience to his elder brother, withing rather to have Turfon for then fourraign. In whose behalfe Orchanes taking that journy, surprised by the way many ca. tiles and townes to his owne vie. Orchanes was no fooner entred the country of charafia, but In loss elder brother fled to Pergamum, whither the Turks shortly pursued him: where Turk fee defirous to speake with his brother, viwarily approching the city, was wounded with an arrow that from the wals, and there flaine. With whose death Orchanes was so greatly offen. ded, that he threatned to destroy the whole countrey with fire and sword, if they did not by a day prefixed generally submit themselves to his mercy. The people terrified with this proclamation of 10 great a Prince already in armes, yeelded themselves vnto his subjection. The King's fonne also that was fled into Pergamum, voon reasonable conditions veelded him selfe vnto Orchanes, who fent him to Prufa, where after he had there lived two yeares, he died of the plague: after whose death Orchanes made his son Solyman Prince of Carasina. Neither is this taking in of the country of Carafina to be accounted a small conquest one of the greatest houles of the Turks the successors of the Iconian Sultan Aladin, now therby taking end, and their dominions (which were not small, as containing almost Lydia, with some good parts of Missa. Troas, and the leffer Phrygia) now united unto the Othoman Kingdome. Orehanes upon his re. turne, for the good successe of this journey, built a Church and Monasterieat Prusa, placing therein religious men, with all diligence fought for out of all his kingdome : of which religious the Turks write many fables, better worth the smiling at, than the serious reporting. Hitherto the kingdome of Otheman and Orchanes his fon, was contained within the bounds of the leffer Asia, which the Turks call Anatolia.

Now it resteth to be showed, upon what occasion Orchanes, or rather his son Solyman Bassa, as it were fatally, with a small power first passed ouer Hellespontus into Europe; where they and their fuccessors have by little and little so enlarged their dominions, that they have now long ago quite ouerthrown the Grecian empire, with many other great kingdomes, and are at this present a terror to all Christian Princes bordering upon them: to the perpetuall infamie x of the Greekes, who for want of courage, and busied with civill discord, never sought in time

orchanes having now so augmented his kingdome, that he might from many parts thereof out of A sia take view of the pleasant borders of Europe, from whence he was excluded only by the narrow sea of Hellespontus, and continually incited with the insatiable and restles desire of foueraignty, began to deuise how he might possibly passe that streit sea, and set foot into Europe another part of the world. Which his conceit one day he imparted to his fon Solyman: who prefently answered his father, That if it would please him to give him leave, he would not doubt to passe the streit of Hellespontus, and in time to plant the Mahometan religion in those countries of Europe possessed by the Christians. Which answer of Solyman much plea- L fed his father, who gaue him leaue to depart into his country, & in that matter to proceed further as he thought best, & as occasion should best serve. Solyman taking leave of his father took his journy into Carasina, where riding vp and downe the country, as it had bin for his pleasure onely, he made his way to the place where it is thought the famous city of Troy sometime flood, where yet (as the Turks and some others say) are to be seen the wonderfull ruins of that unfortunate city by the fea fide. In this place Solyman stood still a great while, as it were in a fludy, forecasting (as it seemed) some great matter, without speaking one word to any of his followers. When one of his chieftains called EZes beg, to put him out of his deep thoughts, bold-Iv faid vnto him, My lord and great foueraign, what strange thing is this, that you are so deeply drowned in these your melancholy thoughts vindoubtedly it is some great matter that you M are studying upon. Truth it is (said Solyman) for I was thinking how it were possible to passe ouer this sea of Hellespontus into the borders of Europe, and to take view of that country, and for o returne vndiscouered. If this be the matter, (faid #zes-beg.joyning vnto him one Fazil-leg, a man of no lesse valour than himselse) we two will by the power of God performe

A vnto youthis enterprise. Then was Solyman defirous to know of them, about what place they would paffe ouer: which they well knowing the fea coast, shewed him not far off. Wherefore Solyman giving them leave, they departed : and thortly aftermaking a little boat, or rather as fome suppose a raffe, passed ouer Hellespontus by night, and arrived in Europe side, neer vnto a castle, of the Turks called Zemenic or Zembenic, but of the Greeks Coiridocastron, that is to fay, the hogs castle, not far from Sestus: where going ashore, they tooke prisoner a Greeke in a vineyard neere vnto the castle, whom they finding to be a good sensible sellow, without delay pur him into their boat or raffe, and returning backe againe, presented him to Solyman. This Christian captine Solyman entertained courteously, giving him great gifts, and rich apparell, to discouer vnto him the estate of his country; and in fine, learned of him a means to take the B castle Zembenic, before the Christians should thereof be aware. For atchieument whereof, certaine boats were speedily made ready by Solymans commandement, and he with eighty chosen soldiers casily passed ouer in them by night, with their Christian guide the Greeke: for in that place, the fireit betwixt Asia and Europe, is not past an Italian mile ouer. This guid brought Solyman directly to the aforesaid castle, where was a great dunghill, so high, that from the top thereof Solyman with his foldiers cafily got into the castle, which they won without any great resistance; for it was then haruest time, and most part of the people were in the vineyards, or treading out of their corne all night, as the vie of those countries is. Solyman thus posfessed of the castle of Zembenic, vsed no extremity against the inhabitants thereof, seeking rather by courtesie to gaine their good wils, than by extremity to force them to his: yet such C gentlemen as he tooke, with some others also of the better fort, he sent by shipping into Asia, and by the same ships returned soldiers as fast as he could into Europe : so that he had in one day two hundred fouldiers more brought ouer vnto him: and manning fuch small vessels as he had left about the castle, sent Ezes-beg, along st the coast on Europe side, to burn such shipping orvessels as he could finde, least the Christians should by them hinder his passage upon the streit of Hellespontus. So in a few daies Solyman had transported into Europe two thousand good fouldiers of the Turks, whom he fo gouerned, that they did not in any violent fort injurie the vulgar Christians, by reason whereof the common people began to like reasonable well of the Turks, and to converse with them without searc. This was the first comming over of the Turks into Europe, with purpose there to conquer and inhabit, vnder the fortune of the D Otheran kings. For albeit that some of that nation had at fundry times before come ouer, as men seeking after spoile, or otherwise sent for, yea somtimes by the Greeke Emperors themfelues, yet neuer staid they long, but having done what they came for, or els lost themselves, returned backe againe into Asia, until that now conducted by Solyman, and possessed of the little castle of Zembenic (as is aforesaid) they there tooke so fast footing, as that they and their posterity after them, were neuer thence to be since that time removed, but stil more and more encroching vpon the Christians, haue vnto their Asian Kingdome joyned a great part of Europe also, to the terrour of the rest that yet remaineth, as in the processe of this History shall

· About two miles from Zembenic in Chersonessus another castle called Maito, or more The Castle of E truly Maditus, which Solyman alfo tooke : fo that now he had gotten two castles in Europe, Madina taken both which he strongly manned. After which time, the Turks in great numbers came out of Asia into Europe ouer that narrow streit of Hellespontus, to dwell in Chersonessus and Solyman in Read of them to make roome for his Turks, fent Christians out of Europe to be placed amongst the Turks in Asia. The report of this comming ouer of the Turks into Chersoneffus, and of the taking of the castle of Zembenic, carried in post to Constantinople, was sufficient to haue stirred vp any provident or carefull men, presently to haue taken vp armes for the recouery of the lost castle, and the driving out againe of the barbarous enemies out of Europe, before they had gathered any greater firength, or fetled themselues in those places: but fuch was the careleffe negligence and great fecurity of the proud Greekes, that instead thereof, they to extenuate the greatnesse of the losse, commonly said, that there was but a hog stic loft; alluding vnto the name of the castle: and vainely (as said a graue father of their owne) jeasting at that was not to be jeasted at, and laughing at that was not to be laughed at, but lamented for, as in few yeares it proued; their foolish laughter being not without good cause

Sulymans friength to ftill increasing by the dayly comming ouer of the Turks, he proceed ded further to spoile the country of Cherlonesus, almost as far as Callipolis, distant from the cattle Zembenie about two and twenty miles: after which pleasant city the proud Turk began now to long. Which the gouernor thereof perceiuing by the Turks continuall incroaching voon him, railed what power he was able to make, and fowent out against them; all the rest of the Greeks in the mean time lying still, as if they had bin asleepe, or that the matter had not concerned them:but inceting the Turks, he was by them (after a great confliat) ouerthrown and for falegard of his life glad to fly into his city; after whom the Turks following, spoiled the country round about, and in their returne, by plaine force tooke the city, together with the callle allo, which hapned in the yeare of our Lord 1358. Where the madnesse of the Greeks was againe more than before to be wondred at; for the news of the loffe of Callipolis H being brought to Constantinople, the people there made small account thereof, although it was indeed a right great loffe, and much concerned the state: but to extenuate the matter, when they had any talke thereof, in jeafting wife commonly faid, That the Turks had but ta. ken from them a pottle of wine. But by taking of fuch hog flyues and pottles of wine (as they termed it) the Turks in a few yeres after had gone so far in Thracia, that Amurath (the same Solymans nephew which now tooke from the Greeks the city of Callipolis) even in the heart as it were of the Greeke Empire, placed his royall feat at Hadrianople; and immediately after him. Bajaget his sonne (having subdued all the country even to the wals of Constantinople) for certaine yeres laid hard fiege vnto the Imperiall city it felfe; and had no doubt then carried it had not the great expectation of the mighty Tartar Prince Tamerlane (vnto Bajazet fatal) In the meane time happened: whereby (God so appointing it) the prosperous succeedings of the Turks were for a space well staied, that they should not before the time by him prefined, denoure the reliques of the Greeke Empire. And it were to be wished, that the Christians of our time also (by their example warned) would at length awake out of their dead sleep: who of late hath loft vito the fame enemy, not the castle of Zembenic, or the city of Callipor lis, but whole kingdomes, as Hungary and Cyprus, and are still faire in the way: I say no more for griefe, and foreboding of cuill fortune. But againe to our purpose : Solyman having made this profeerous entrance into Europe, and there got ftrong footing, by speedy messengers certified his father what hee had done, and that it was expedient for him with all speed to fend vnto him a great supply of men of warre, as well for the sure defence and keeping of K those castles and forts by him already gotten, as for the further inuation of the Countrey. This meflage was wonderfull welcome vnto Orchanes, and whereas many families of the Sarafins at that prefent were come into the country of Carafina, to possess the dwelling and places of them, which in hope to better their estate were before gone ouer into Europe, all these Saratius he commanded to passe ouer into Europe likewise: which they did accordingly, feating themselues for a time in the country neere to Callipolis. In the meane time Solyman omitted no opportunity to enter further into the country, winning small forts and holds, and still peopling the same with his Turks. And on the other side, they of Carasina passed oues into Europe, placing themselues as it were in a new world. For which cause, and for the great defire they had to extend the Turkish Dominion and Religion, they refused no paines of li warre: fo that all things at that time prospered with the Turks, and went backeward with the

In the time of these wars, not far from Callipolis was a little castle called Congere, the captain whereof was by a Greeke name called Galo Icannes, a valiant and painfull man: this captain continually molested and troubled the Turks which lay on that side of Callipolis, under the leading of Ears beg, many of whom he flew and tooke prisoners, as he could finde them at any aduantage, solyman much angred herewith, by crafty and secret espials learned a certaine time when he was gone out of his castle to do some exployt vpon the Turks. Whereupon he prefently sobeset the Castlewith souldiers, that he could by no meanes returne thicker, but he must first fall into their hands; and, for more assurance placed others also in by-waies, M lest he should by anyway escape, The Capraine ignorant of all this, prosecuted his enterprife, and having taken a Turke prifoner, thinking to returne to his castle, was hastily pursued by Faritbus; for which cause making the more haste, he suddenly fell into the danger of the Turkes layd in ambush: where his men were all slaine, and himselse taken and brought

A before his own castle, and had there his head prefently strucke off: whereupon the castle was forthwith by them that were therein (having now lost their captaine) furrendred, and Chazi Ili beg, a valiant captaine of the Turks placed therein : who from thence never cealed to trouble the country, even to the wals of Didymotichum, as did Solyman out of Callipolis.

Thus in the space of one yere the Turks got strong footing in Europe, possessing divers cafiles and towns, with the country about them, which Solyman gaue in reward vnto his captains and foldiers, as appeareth by the graves and tombes of Exes-beg and Fa% il-beg, the two which first came ouer into Europe, which are there yet well knowne.

About this time it fortuned, that as this martial Prince Solyman was for his disport hawking The death of in the fields of Bolayre on Europe fide, galloping in to his faulcon, was with his horse outrope fide, galloping in to his faulcon, was with his horse outrope fide, galloping in to his faulcon, was with his horse outrope fide, galloping in to his faulcon, was with his horse outrope fide, galloping in to his faulcon, was with his horse outrope fide, galloping in to his faulcon, was with his horse outrope fide, galloping in the fields of Bolayre on Europe fide, galloping in the fields of Bolayre on Europe fide, galloping in the fields of Bolayre on Europe fide, galloping in the fields of Bolayre on Europe fide, galloping in the fields of Bolayre on Europe fide, galloping in the fields of Bolayre on Europe fide, galloping in the fields of Bolayre on Europe fide, galloping in the fields of Bolayre on Europe fide, galloping in the fields of Bolayre on Europe fide, galloping in the fields of Bolayre on Europe fide, galloping in the fields of Bolayre on Europe fide, galloping fields of Bolayre on Europe fide, galloping files fields of Bolayre on Europe fide, galloping files file throwne in a ditch, of which fall he being fore bruifed, shortly after died. The newes of his eldel fonue. death being brought to Orchanes his father, gaue vnto him (then being ficke) just occasion of great forrow; so that within two moneths after he died also, being sources old, when The death of he had raigned thereof 31 yeres; and died about the yere of our Lord 1359. Some histories Orchants. report otherwise, both of his death, and of the time werein he lived; as that he should be slain in a battell against the Tartars: or as others write, with an arrow at the siege of Prusa, in the yere of our Lord 1349. But Ioannes Leunelauius in his history collected out of the Turks owne chronicles (whom we follow as most probable) reporteth it as before.

This orchanes was wife, curteous, and bountifull, more ingenious than his father in denifing warlike engines. He built diuers princely Churches, Abbies, Colledges, and Cels, and was in his superstitious religion very zealous: in so much that he appointed pensions to all such as could in the Church fay the book of Mahomets law by heart; and appointed competent maintenance for all Judges of his Courts, because they should not take any thing in reward of his subjects, for the peruerting of justice. He greatly inlarged his kingdome in Asia, and not content to be inclosed with the seas of Euxinum and Hellespontus, set fast sooting in Europe, which some attribute to his sonne Amurath. He was to the Christians alwaies a most mortall Whilest Amurath in his deepe thoughts, of greatnesse plots the ground: The wrangling Greekes by force of armes he feekes how to confound. And wholly bent for to extend his Kingdome with his power. Piercing the confines of Europe, doth what he meets devoure. As men difmaid, the Thracians quake, to fee their foule difgrace: Amiddest whom, the tyrant stout his scepter proud doth place. The fierce Bulgarians he did meet, and in the field subdue: And in Cossoua's fatal plaines, the wofull Despot flue. But long is not the wickeds joy, which they in mischiefe take: Stab'd by a flaue, the wretch his end in that fame place did make.

1 47 AT MA Defot of

AMVRATH, THE OFLIFE FIRST OF THAT NAME, THIRD KING OF THE TVRKS, AND THE GREAT AVGMEN-TOR OF THEIR KINGDOME:

Murath the younger some of orchanes succeeded his father in the Torkish Amurath suckingdome, his elder brother Solyman being dead a little before his father. etede h bis fa-This Amurath with greater zeale than any one of the Turkish Kings, ad in the Turk sh uanced the Mahometan religion, and had therein wonderfull fuccesse. In winedome. the beginning of his reigne, he gathered a great army out of all parts of his kingdome, to Prusa; purposing to passe ouer Hellespontus, io inuade the Christians in Thracia, But understanding that the other Mahometan

Ptinces in Asia had combined themselues against him, he was thereby inforced to leave his former determination for Europe, and to turne his forces vpon them. In which wars he mightily preuailed against them, and returned with victory to Prusa. But having so subdued those confederate Princes, he the next yeare after profecuted his wars before intended against the Christians in Europe. For which purpose hauing leuied a strong army in Asia, he passed ouer to Callipolis, accompanied with his tutor, whom the Turks call Lala Schahin: whose grave aduice and counsell he most followed in all his weighty affaires, being at that time one of his chiefe counsellors. From Callipolis he marched to the castle of Benurum, which was by composition yeelded vnto him. From thence he went to Tzurulus, where the Christians gaue him a sharpe encounter: but in the end he woon the towne, and carried away the victory. And fo proceeding farther, tooke divers other small castles and townes in that part of Thracia, which of the antient Romane colonies was then called Romania, and now of the Turks Rumilia, namely, Mefine, Burgos, and others; whereof fome he vtterly rafed, and into the rest pur strong garrisons. At this time also, Chasi-Ilbeg and Eurenoses, two of his most valiant captains, tooke certaine forts standing voon the river Meritza, in antient time called Hebrus: whereby they much troubled the inhabitants of the country thereabouts. Wherewith the captaine of Didymotichum offended, gathered his souldiers together, intending to have intercepted E the great captaine Chasi-Ilbeg: in which attempt he lost most of his followers, and was himfelfe there taken prisoner. For whose ransome and certaine other conditions, the citizens of Didymotichum yeelded the city vnto the Turks. Shortly after, Amurath sent his tutor Lala Schahin to besiege Hadrianople, now called An. yelded valo drianople, but in antient time Orestias: of whose comming the Christians hearing, encountred him vpon the way, and fought with him a great battell, wherein many were on both fides lost: but in the end the Christians being put to the worst, retired agains to the city. Of this victory Schabin sent newes unto Amurath, with certaine of the heads of the flaine Christians: who therupon fending Chasis and Eurenoses before, he himselse with a great army followed aster to the siege of Hadrianople of whose comming the governor of Hadrianople vnderstanding, fled secretly out of the city by night to Ænus. The citizens seeing themselves so torsanding, fled secretly out of the city by night to Ænus. ken of their gouernour, yeelded their city vnto Amurath, in the yeare of our Lord, 1362.

The taking of these strong cities in Thracia, especially of Didymotichum and Hadrianople, is (by some of the Turks own Histories) otherwise reported : which, because it is neither improbable nor disagreeing from the subtill dealings of the Turks, and of themselues also receiued. I have thought good to fet downe as their owne Historiographers report the same. G The Turkith King Amurath had (as they fay, and as truth was) in the beginning of his reigne concluded a peace with the Christians of Thracia: during which peace, the gouernor of Didemoticum intending to fortifie his city with new and stronger fortifications against the affaults of the Turks, entertained all the masons, carpenters, and other workemen he could by any meanes get: which Amurath understanding, secretly caused two hundred good and lusty workemen and labourers to come out of Afia, to offer their feruice vnto the governour a who gladly entertained them, ving their help in that his great and hafty work. Which thing fome of the wifer fort of the citifens difliking, wished the gouernor to be aware of those Asian work. men, as by them suspected. But he presuming vpon the peace made with Amurath, and confidering they were but base workmen and no soldiers, had the lesse care of them: neuerthelesse H (ving their worke all day) he commanded them to lodge without the wals of the city energy night. Amurath understanding that these workemen were thus by the governor entertained. tent for the valiant captaine Chasis. Ilbeg, and requested him with thirty other good souldiers dif uited as poore labourers, to go to Didymotichum to seeke for worke, and in doing there. of to fpy if any opportunitie might be found for the surprising of the city. Chasis with these thirty according to Amurath his direction, comming as poore men lacking worke, found entertainment at Didymotichum, where they carried stones, morter, and such like things, ever fliewing themselves very diligent in their worke: Chasis with vigilant eie still awaiting what might best serue his turne for the surprising of the city. When night was come, the Turkish workemen and labourers after their accustomed manner, and as they were by the gouernour I appointed, went out of the city into the fuburbs to their lodgings: from whence Chafis feeret. ly departing in the night, came to Amurath and shewed him how one of the gates of the city might you the sudden be taken, if it would please him to place a sufficient number of Turks in ambuth neere vnto the city, to joyne with him and the other Turkish labourers when occafron thould ferue. Which being refolued vpon, Amurath fent him backe againe to put this his deuice in execution: So Chasis returning to Didymotichum, brake the matter to so many of the Afian workemen as he thought convenient, fully instructing them what was to be done. I he next day (according to his appointment) the Christians being then at dinner, these Turkith workemen and labourers fell at words among themselues, and from words to faigned blowes: in which counterfeit brawle and tumult, they fuddenly ran to one of the gates of the K city fast by (as was before appointed) and there laying hands upon the warders weapons, as if it had been to defend themselues against their fellowes, suddenly set vpon those warders, being in number but few, and then at dinner also, and so presently slew them: which done, they opened the gate of the city, and let in the other Turks which lay in wait not far off: who with great celerity entring the city, presently tooke the same, and there put the chiefest of their citizens to the fword, sparing therest of the meaner fort.

The city of Rhodestum (of the old writers called Rhoedestum) was by Amurath his commandement in this time of peace, by sudden assault given in the night by the Lord Eurenoses,

> With this foule dealing and breach of league, yet in force, the Christians hardly charged 4. I murath, who turned it ouer to the vnrulines of his captains and men of war, whom he threatned with great feuerity to punish: and to give the better color that it was done without his privitv, he had taigned himself sick all the while these things were in doing: but being requested to reftore those cities so wrongfully taken from the Christians, he veterly refused so to do, saying That it was against the law of his great Prophet Mahomet, to deliver agains to the Christians, any towns or city wherein the Mahometan religion had bin once openly taught. Whereupon wars began again to artie on fresh betwixt the Christians and him, wherein sometime the one prenailed, and fometime the other: in such fort, as that those warres at length became vnto them both very tedious. Wherefore Amurath made peace againe with the Christians of Hadrianople, Selybria, and Constantinople: yet desiring nothing more in heart, than to take the M city of Hadrianople: which the better to bring to passe, he caused Chass-Ilbeg as a discontented captaine to fly to Hadrianople, pretending himselfe to haue been hardly vsed by the tyrant his mafter:where having in his company other fuch diffembling fugitives as was himfelfe, he oftentimes issued out of the city and valiantly skirmished with the Turks; which so

A greatly pleased the governour of Hadrianople, that he thereby grew into his great sauour. Many other Turks also vnder pretence of like discontentment, resorted vnto Chasis: wherewith finding himselfe well firengthned, he writ letters secretly vnto Amurath. That he would deliner one of the gates of Hadrianople vnto him at a certaine appointed time, if he would against the same time be ready to send him present succors. All things being agreed vpon, Chafis at the time appointed came in the dawning of the day to one of the gates of the city, accompanied but with ten of his followers, as if he would have gone forth to hunt, as he had before accustomed. But so soone as the gates were opened, he with the other ten well appointed for the purpose, furiously set vpon the warders, whom they slew; and being aided by the rest of the fugitiue Turks (which with all (peed by appointment before made, reforted vnto them) B they possessed the gate; untill a great power of the Turks, whom Amurath the night before had placed in ambush neere ento the city, having knowledge what was done, and licaring the alarme, speedily came on, and by that gate entred the city: where was fought a citell fight all that day, euen from morning vntill night. But in the end the Turks prenailing, tooke the city, which they have ever fince possessed vnto this day.

These great cities of Thracia thus taken, or otherwise as aforesaid (for that I leave for the Hadrianople Reader to thinke of as he pleaseth) Amurath appointed the seat of his royall court at Hadria the Turkish nople as a place of all others most fit for the further invasion of the Christians, and inlarging kings in Europe of his kingdome in Europe: from whence such a world of mischieses and woe hath since that time ouerflowed a great part of Christendome, & drowned so many goodly kingdoms in Eu-C rope, as that both they, and most part of the rest that yet remain (daily in dread of like destruction) might justly accurse and detest the woefull carelesses and degenerate cowardise of the Greekes, were not they themselues together with the glory of their church and empire, swallowed up in the same gulfe of calamity and wo, and so become of all others most miserable: but what auail vain complaints, but to increase old griefs? wherfore again to that we have in hand

The proud Sultan Amurath (having to his great content thus feated himselfe at Hadrianople, in the middest of Thracia) presently sent out his tutor Lala Schahin with a great power to inuade the countrey about Philippopolis, with the country of Zagora, which lyeth towards the great mountain Hoemus, where the best Turkish Scimitars were made; giving like charge vnto Eurenoses, for the subduing of the territory of Ipsala; who both notably performed what D he had commanded, and in short time brought al those countries vnder his subjection, wherein he shortly after placed divers sanzacks or governours, for the better assurance thereof, being so lately gained. About this time (by the fuggestion of Gara Rustemes a doctor of the Mahometan law) Zinderlu Chelil, then Cadelether or chiefe Iustice among the Turks, but afterwards better knowne by the name of Catradin Baffa, by the commandement of Amurath, took order, that every fifth captine of the Christians, being aboue fifteen yeres old, should be taken up for the King, as by law due vnto him : and if the number were vnder fiue, then to pay to the King for every head 25 afpers, by way of tribute: appointing officers for collecting both of fuch captives and tribute mony, of whom the aforesaid Cara Rustemes himselse was chief, as first deuiser of the matter. By which means great numbers of Christian youths were brought to the court as the kings captiues, which by the counsell of the same Zinderlu Chelil, were distributed among the Turkish husbandmen in Asia, there to learn the Turkish language, religion, & maners, where after they had bin brought vp in all painfull labour and trauell by the space of two or three yeares, they were called vnto the court, and choice made of the better fort of them to attend vpon the person of the Prince, or to serue him in his wars: where they daily practifing al seats of activity, are called by the name of Ianizars (that is to fay, new foldiers.) This was the first beginning of the Ianizars under this Sultan Amurath the first, but had great increase under Amurath the fecond, infomuch as louiss, with fome other Historiographers, attribute the beginning of this order to him: which neuertheles (as appeareth by the Turks own Histories) had the beginning as is aforesaid; and hath euer fince bin continued by the Turkish Kings and Emperors, by the fame and some other greater means; so that in processe of time they be grown to that greatnes as that they are oftentimes right dreadful to the great Turke himfelfe:after whose death they haue fomtime preferred to the Empire such of the Emperors sons as they best liked, without respect of prerogative of age, contrary to the wil of the great Sultan himself; & are at this day the greatest strength of the Turkish empire, and not valike in time to be the greatest cause of G the ruine thereof; the finger of the Highest oftentimes (as we have before faid) turning even those helps which were by mans wisedome prouided for the establishing of kingdomes, vino their more speedy destruction: and especially these continuall garrisons of martiall men ho leffe to be feared than trufted, as in the course of this History may appeare.

When Amurath had thus a great while continued at Hadrianople, determining now to returns vuto Afia, he made Schahin his tutor Beb-Lerbeg or viceroy of Romania and Eurenoles ford governor of the marches, Zinderlu Chelit he made Vezir Azemes or lord prefident of his counfell, and changing his name, called him Carradin Baffa, that is to fay, The Baffa that had well determed, his name witnesting his good defert. After this he returned into Asia, where he spent that winter at Prusa. These two great men Cairadin Bassa and Cara Rustantes before na. H med, fometimes two doctors of the Mahometan law, were (as the Turkish Histories report) the first that corrupted the Turkish court with conctousnesse and bribery, and are therefore of them even yet much blamed.

Whileft Amurath thus wintred in Asia, newes was brought vnto him, That the Christians of Seruia and Bulgaria had gathered a great army for the befieging of Hadrianople 4 which caused him to prepare great forces in Asia, to aid his captaines in Europe. But in returning Bord rates by out of Afia, he by the way tooke the towne of Boga; wherehe put to fword all the Christians that were thereinable to beare armes, leading the rest into captinity, and with the spoilers. and the warded his fouldiers. This ftrong towne was not long after againe recoursed by the Christithe constant ans, who requited the Turkes with like measure, and doubting the keeping thereof, rased it downe to the ground: yet was it afterwards reedified by the Turks, as it is at this prefent to be reserve to the feene; which was done in the yeare of our Lord, 1 265.

In the meane time, the Christian army of Seruia and Bulgaria, in number betwixt forty and fifty thousand, marching towards Hadrianople, and now come very neere the same fell in muting among themselves. Whereof the Turks by their espials having intelligence, suddenly in the night fet upon them: who blinded with inward hatred, and no leffe fearing one another, than their enemies, neglected to jovne their forces against them, but were ready to turne their weapons one vpon another; and fo by their owne diffcord, more than by the enemies force, were made a prey to the Turkes, by whom they were put to flight, and flaine with fo great a flaughter that the place wherein they fell, not far from Germia, is thereof at this day K called Zirf-Zindugi, that is to fay, the place wherein the Seruians were overthrown. The news of this to notable a victory, with a fifth part of the spoile, and a great number of the heads of the flaine Christians, were (after the barbarous manner of the Turks) fent to Amurath into Atia, being now ready with a great power to have come over to Callipolis: who joyfull thereof, and glad to see such a present, the assured witnesse of the victory, returned agains to Prusa. This was done in the yeare 1366. In which yeare also Amurath with wonderfull triumph circumcifed his two fons, BajaZet, & Iacup. At which time he also built a temple, with a monastery & a colledge, at Bilezuga: and another faire church at Neapolis: at Prufa he alfo built a flately palace in the castle, with a great church at the gates thereof: in which city he also founded an abbey and a colledge. Germean Ogli, a great Mahometan Prince in Asia (whose territory for L the most part lay in the greater Phrygia, and the countries thereabout, bordering upon the Othoman kingdom) having alwaies enuied at the rifing of the Othoman kings (as did all the rell of the Mahometan Princes of the SelZuccian family) & fearing that their greatnes might after his death grow dangerous to his fon tacup, being now himselfe very aged, thought good for the more fafety of his state to joyne in alliance with Amurath. And for that purpose fent Isaac (a learned doctor of the Mahometan law) embaffador to him, with many rich prefents, & to offer his daughter, the Lady Hatun, in marriage vnto his fon BajaZet: promifing with her in dowry divers great cities and townes, with their territories in Phrygia and Bythinia, adjoyning vpon the Others kingdom; namely, Cutaie, Simau, Egregios, Taufanle, & others. Neither was this a small dowry, but well beforming so great a Prince: the city of Cutaic being at that day the M place whereat the Turkish emperors great lieutenant or viceroy in Asia is alwaies resiant, as in the heart of his kingdome in the leffer Afia. Of which match so offered, Amurath liking well contracted his fon Bajazet unto the faid lady: and for folemniation of the martiage, prepared all things with great magnificence, fending his Embassadors to most of the MahomeA tankings and princes both far and necre, to invite them therunto: commanding also most of the nobilitie of his kingdom to honor the same with their presence. The time of this marriage drawing neer, Embassadors came to Amuraths court from all the Princes before inuited: among (twhom the Embassador from the Egyptian Sultan had the highest place. These embaffadours brought with them many great and rich Gifts, such as well beteemed the great Princes their matters, which they with all reuerence presented vnto Amurath. At length among ft the reft of his own nobility came the Lord Eurenofes, whom he had before left gonernor of the frontiers of his kingdom in Europ: who belides many other rich gifts not eafily to be valued presented vnto Amurath a hundred goodly boys, with as many beautiful yong matdens, all Christian captines, surably attired in garments richly embroidered with goid & siluer enery one of them carying a cup of gold in the one hand, and a cup of filter in the other . the cups of gold having in them divers pretions stones of great value, and the cups of silver being filled with gold. The richnes of this present was so great, that all the forcein Embassadots wondred therat: all which rich gift Amurath most bountifully bestowed on the strange Embaffadors; and the prefents which were fent vnto him from other Princes, hee liberally gaue to Eurenoses. The learned and religious which came to that mariage hee so bountifully rewarded alforthat none came to the fame poor, but he went away rich. He had before fent diuers of his nobility, with an hundred ladies and gentlewomen, and a gard of three thousand horsmen, to attend the comming of the bride. On the other side, the old prince German Oeli meeting this honorable company upon the way, falured every man of account according to his degree, and bringing them to one of his cities, in most royal maner feasted them, bestowing vpon them many rich and princely gifts. All which things with great folemnity performed, he deliuered his daughter the bride to two of the most antient Ladies, whereof one had bin Bajazets nurse; and so taking leave of his daughter, sent her away, accompanied with his wife lenles, and other of his courtiers; who conveying her to Prufa, the was there in most roial maner maried to BajaZet. The cities and towns promifed in dowry were accordingly deliuered vnto Amurath, who (hortly after took possession of the same, and surnishing them with his own garrisons.

At this mariage, Chusun Beg Prince of Amisum in Galaria, by his Embassador sold his territory of Amilum vnto Amurath, with many fair cities and towns, doubting (as was thought) now to be able to keep them, leeing Amurath was come to neet him, whom be faw not to let flip any occasion offered vnto him for the inlarging of his kingdom. When Amurath had in this sport spent great time in Asia, he gathered a strong army to return into Europ: but before his departure, he committed the government of his kingdom in Afia (which the Turkes call Anatolia) vnto his fon Bajazet, joining with him Temurtafet a valiant man of great experience. And having fet all things in order in Afia, paffed over Hellespontus to Callipolis, from whence he marched toward Hadrianople; and because he would take something in his way, he belieged Magalgara, which he in short time won. Where Lala Schahin and Eurenoses with all their forces came to him; which two captains he fent to befiege the city Pherce and was by them after a few daies fiege taken. But he himselfe to be reuenged upon Lazarus the Amurathin. Despot, led his army into Servia, where after he had without resistance forraged the country "adeit Servia. fourteendaies, understanding by his captains. That the strong city of Nissa, being the metro-political city of Servia, was as it were the key of that kingdom, he prefently marched thirlier, and laid fiege vnto the fame; and by the adulce of Jaxis Beg the sonne of Temurtafes, in short time won it. Which thing to daunted LaZarss Defpot or Lord of Servia, that he dispairing niffaraken by in his own forces, having fo foon loft one of his strongest cities, forthwith fent Embassadours the Tarke to Amurath to intreat a peace; offering to pay him a yearly tribute of fifty rhousand pound, and to aid him with a thousand men in his wars, when soener he should require. Voon which conditions Amurath granted him peace, and so departed out of Servia. In this expedition

he also with much ado won the great City of Appolonia, neere vnto the mount Athos, and Applionia went gaue leave vnto most of the Christian inhabitants with their wives and children to depart, with fuch part of their goods as was not in the taking thereof spoiled by the soldiers. This done, he returned back to Hadrianople, leaving Eurenoses upon the marches, who shortly after took Berrhea, with divers other Townes. At the which time also Lala Schahin won Zichne and Seres, in the confines of Macedonia, with many other strong Townes upon the Frontiers of Thessaly and Thrace. In the City Seres Eurenoses made his abode, as in a chiefe frontier G town: and because the Christians for fear of the Turks were all fled out of the country about Seres, great numbers of people were sent for out of Asia, to inhabit that country by the Chri. stians for faken in the confines of Macedonia. Amurath had not long continued at Hadriano. ple, but that he was aduertised out of Asia, that Aladin his son in law King of Caramania, did with fire and fword inuade his dominions in Asia. With which newes hee was exceedingly troubled; and for that cause sending for his counsellors and nobility to the court, told them. how that Aladin forgetting all the bonds of religion, faith, peace, and allyance, with all hosti. litie inuaded his provinces in Asia, whilst he with great danger of his person, and greater terror of his enemies, fought with honor to increas the Mahometan sincere religion (as hee termed it) in Europ: from which godly War (faid he) I am inforced against my wil to turne my H tword, in iust defence of my self, against men joined with vs both in religion & allyance. And having thus declared his mind, he appointed Chairadin Bassa his lieutenant general in Europ. and also made his some Alis Baffa one of his Counsel, although he were by some thought too yong for fo great a place. And so having set all things in order according to his mind in Eu. rop, took passage from Callipolis into Asia, and so to his court at Prusa, where he spent that Winter. In which time Embassadors came vnto him from the Sultan of Egypt, for the renuing of their former amity and friendship. Which Amerath took very thankfully, & sent them back again loden with kind letters and princely rewards.

When the Spring was come, in the year 1387, he leuied a mighty army to make war vpon Aladin prepare the Caramanian king his fon in law. Whereof Aladin certainly informed, prepared no leffe power to meet him, affociating vnto him all the leffe Mahometan princes of Afia, who were not under Amurath's obeifance to whom the Othoman Kings were now grown terrible. Which princes brought with them great supplies to join with Aladin. Aladin thus aided by his friends, thinking himfelf now strong enough for Amurath his father in law, sent an Embassador vnto him, certifying him. That he was nothing in power infetior to him, and therfore nothing feared him: yet if it pleased him to have peace, he could for his part be content to hearken vinto the same vpon reasonable conditions: but if he had rather have war, he should find him ready to dare him battel in the field, when soeuer he came. For answer of which embassage, Amurath willed the Embassador to tell the perjured King his master, that he had of late, contrary to his faith before given, in most cruel maner invaded his dominions, whilft he was bufied in most godly wars (as he termed it) against the mis-beleeuing Christians: from prosecuting wherof he was (as he said) by his violence withdrawn, contrary to the law of their great Prophet. For which outrages and wrongs he would shortly come and take of him that preuenge: and that therfore hee was to expect nothing at his hands but war, for which he willed him to to prouide, as that at his comming he might not find him wanting to himself. Aladin by his Embassador having received this answer from Amurath, assembled all the confederat princes his allyes, with great perfuafions and greater promifes encouraging them to this war. And they again kiffing the ground at his feet, as the maner of that nation is before great Princes, promised with solemn oaths neuer to forsake him, but to doe all things which Princes desirous of honor or fame, ought by their oath to do for their Soueraign vnto whom they owed homage and fealty.

In this great preparation for wars in Asia, Chairadin Bassa general gouernor in Europ died: which Amurath vnderstanding, appointed Alu Bassa his son to go into Europe, there to be Gouernor in his fathers flead. But being flayd in his journey by vrgent occasions, Amurath sent for him back again in post.

Aladin forecasting the great dangers like to ensue of this war, sent another Embassadour to Amurath, with reasonable conditions of peace. To whom Amurath answered, That if Aladin had made that offer one month before, he would perhaps have accepted of it: but for somuch as he had don him great wrong, and that he had now to his infinit charge drawn him into the field fo far from home, hee would not make any other end than fuch as the chance of Warre M should appoint. And wheras he in difgrace had called him a heardsman or shepheard (sayd he) if he be not such a one himself as he saith me to be, let him meet me in the field and there try his valour. Hercunto the Embassadour replied, That the King his master made this offer of peace not for any fear, but to faue the effusion of innocent bloud: which consideration set apart,

A apart, he should find him not inferior to himselfe either in number of most expert soldiers, or other warlike provision; and that therfore if he rejected this offer of peace, he needed not to doubt bun confeer with men of courage, who would bear themselves so valiantly in the field against his Turkes as that hee should have no great cause to rejoice of his comming thither. Which words of the Embassador to netled Amurath, that in great rage hee commanded him to depart and to wil his mafter, if he were a man of fuch courage and valour as he faid to thew himself in the field with all his forces, there to make an end of all quarrels where he doubted not but in thort time to chaftife him according to his due deferts. So after the Embaffador was departed, marching forward three dayes, Alu Beg came vnto him: of whose comming he not a little rejoiced, for why he loued him dearly, and although he was yet of years but yong. B relied much yoon his counsell.

The Embassador returning, recounted vnto Aladin all that Amurath had faid, not omitting his hard speeches and proud threats, and how that hee hoped shortly to take from him Iconium and Larenda (the principal cities of Caramania) with many things more, leaving nothing vntold. Which Aladin hearing, faid vnto the other confederat princes that were with him. Verily Amerath threatneth to take from vs the cities of Iconium and Larenda; but let him take need that we take not from him his fair city of Prufa. Then demanding of the Embaffador, of what strength Amurath might be; it was answered by him, that hee deemed him to be about feuenty thousand strong. Wherat Aladin not a little rejoicing, said, Assuredly when he shall see our army, he will not dare to give vs battell; or if he do, he shall fight upon great disaduantage, his men being both fewer in number than wee, and fore wearied with long and painfull trauell.

In the meantime Amurath held on his way towards Caramania, daily encouraging his foldiers with perfuations & gifts bountifully bestowed upon them, filling their heads with promiles of greaten the wars once happily ended. At length he came to the great plains in Caramania, called the French plains because in former times the Christians (whom the Turkes for most particall Frankes) in those plaines incamped their great armies as they went to the winning of Ierusalem, as in the former part of this historie is declared. Into these plaines also came Aladin with his army and was now incamped within one daies march of Amurath. and forested that night.

The next morning Amurath put his army in order of battell, appointing the leading of the sight wing to his yongest fon Iacup, with whom he joined CutluXes Beg, Ein Beg Subbassa, Feridum Subbaffa, Seraze and Custendit two Christian Princes, all captains of great experience. The left wing was led by Baja et his cldeft fon, with Ferize and Hozze, both valiant captaines : in which wings were also placed the Christian foldiers fent by Lazarus out of Servia, according to the late convention of peace; in the mainbattell he food himself: the vantgard was conducted by Temurtales and the rereward by the Subbassa of Oxyllithus (called alfo Temurtales) and Achmetes. Aladin on the other fide with no leffe care and diligence fet his men likewife in order of battell, placing himfelf in the main battel, as did Amurath; and the Princes his allyes, with his other expert captains, some in the right wing, and some in the left, as he thought E it most convenient: in such fort that in all mens judgment he was in force nothing inferior to

These great enemies thus ranged, with ensignes displaid came on couragiously, one directly The great butvpan the other:where approching together, the confused noise of trumpets, drums, fifes, with telinite caraother inftruments of war, the neighing of horses and clattering of armour was so great, that manian player whilft warlike minds therat rejoiced, cowards thought heaven fell. But the fign of battell on rath and disboth fides ginen, Samagazes one of the confederat Princes, with exceeding courage first char. 414. ged Temurtafes in the vantgard, and broke his ranks: at which time Teberrufes a Tartar prince. and Varfacides another of the confederats, delivered their arrowes also upon the vantgard as if it had bin a shour of hail. Which Bajazet seeing, and how hardly Temattases was charged; F having before obtained leave of his father, brake in vpon the enemy with such violence as if it had bin the lightning; whereof hee was over after fyrnamed Gilderun, which is to fay, The lightning. Ferile and Holze, with the other valiant Captaines in that wing, following Baiazet, with inuincible courage entred the battell, where for a great space was made a most terrible and dreadfull fight. A man would have thought two rough feas had met together, fivaying one against another, doubting which way the current would at length fall. In this c conflict were many thousands on both sides slain, so that the field lay couered with the dead bodies of worthy men and valiant foldiers : yet at length these confederate Princes, finding themselves overmatched by Bajazet and his soldiers, referving themselves to their better fortunes turned their backs and fied; when Aladin feeing a great part of his arthy thus over thrown, and himself now ready to be charged with Amuraths whole power, despairing of victo. rie, foed himselfe in all hast to I conium his strong city. The spoil which Amutath got in this battell was great, most part wherof he gaue in reward to Temurtales and his foldiers, who had endured the greatest fury of the battell. Amurath after this victoric with all speed marched to Iconium, and there befreged Aladin the Caramanian King, in his strongest city, giving out proclamation in the mean time, That none of his foldiers vpon pain of death should vie any H violence to any of the country people, or take any thing from them; to the intent it might appear vnto the world, that he made that war against that Mahometan King, rather to repulse injury and wrong than for defire of fourraignty or spoil. Which his so streit a proclamation the Christians fent by Lazarus (amongst others) transgressed, and therfore by his commanded ment suffered many of them exemplary punishment: which was the cause of the Servian was which not long after enfued, fatall both vnto Amurath and Lazarus the Despot, as hereastes shall appear.

Aladin now on every fide befreged in Iconium, and without all hope of escape, sent to the Oncen his wife Amuraths daughter, bewailing vnto her his despetat estate, and requesting her by all the loue that so honorable a minded Lady might bear vnto her miserable husband, to aduenture her felfe to go to her angry father, and to craue pardon for his great trespasse and offence. The Queen forthwith attyring her felf as was fittelt for her husbands prefent estate, came to her father: where falling down at his feet upon her knees, with words wifely placed. and tears distilling down her fair cheeks from her fairer eies, as if it had bin from two fountains, in most forrowfull maner craued ber husbands pardon, imputing to the heat of youth what focuer he had done; and would not be comforted or taken vp untill thee had obtained grace. Amurath most intirely loued this his daughter, and therfore for her sake not only granred her husbands life (which in short time was like to have bin in his power to have spilt) but also his kingdom, which he as a victorious conqueror might by law of arms have of right detained. She now affured of her fathers promife, fent vnto her husband Aladin, withing him K the next day without fear to come out of the City, and in humble fort to acknowledge his tault before her father. Who the next morning accordingly came out, and profitating himtelfe before Amurath, acknowledged his viducifulnes; of whom (for his wives fake) hee obtained pardon, and restitution to his kingdom, with many other gifts, contrary to his euil defert. The Latine histories mistaking the man, report this Caramanian War to have beene tought against the King of Caramania, Amuraths own grandfather by the mothers side; and that he was then by Amurath spoiled of a great part of his kingdom. But it agreeth not with the Turkish histories, which make Amuraib to be the son of Orchanes and Lulufer, the daughter of the Gouernour of the Castle of Iarchisar, as is before declared in the life of Othoman; which Lulufer lieth buried by her husband Orchanes in Prusa.

This great victory got by Amurath against the Caramanian King and the other confederat Princes, was the true beginning of the greatnesse of the Othoman kingdom in Asia:wherwith the other Mahometan Princes of the Selquecian Family were fo discouraged, that they were glad to submit themselves thus first vnto Amurath, and after that, vnto his son Baiazet: untill that Tamerlane the great Tartarian prince, some few years after taking Baialet prisoner in a great battell at mount Stella, abated the Othoman pride, and restored the other oppressed Mahometan Princes to their old possessions and kingdoms.

Amurath returning homewards, by the way took the city of Despotopolis; and comming to Cutaie brake up his army, and so in triumph returned to his court at Prusa.

Lazarus Despot of Servia (inold time called Mysia) had sent a thousand armed men to A. M. murath in this the late Caramanian War, according to the convention of the peace not long before made betwixt them: fome of which fouldiers were with great feueritie (to the terror of others) executed in Caramania, for transgressing Amuraths commandement. This great war thus ended, and the army broken up at Curaie, they with others were licensed to depart

A into their own country. Whose General (whom they cal the Vayuod) returning home, reported vnto Lafarus the Despot, the succes of that war, and withall, in what cruel and tyrannicall maner the men he had fent were in that fertice vsed by the commandment of amurath: with whom(faid this General) you without cause haue made a most dithonorable peace; first, by giving your faith to fuch a milcreant; and then in fending your loyal subjects, in recompence of their good feruice, to be so butchered at his pleasure : beside the shamefull tribute which you yearly pay vnto him. Wheras if it would please you in the depth of your wildome but to know your own strength, you thould find your self in warlike force and power nothing inferior to the Tyrant. For we your feruants being in number but an handfull were in the fe his late wars a terror vnto his enemics, and by our valor, and not his own, hee got the victory ouer B them. What cause is there then, that you should subject your felf vnto your inferior > I know he canot of himself bring into the field aboue fifty thousand fighting menbut admit he were able to bring an hundred thousand; are not you (if you so please) able to levy a far greater power and for all other warlike prouision you are ten times better prouided than he. Besides that the mighty Christian Princes wil fend you such aid against this hatefull and Common Enemy, that being united with yours, his Barbarian forces will be nothing in comparison of those which you shall then be able to bring into the field against him. Which no doubt the Christian princes wil the rather do, as men desirous to quench this deuouring fire in another mans house rather than in their own.

These words of the Vayuod so much moued Lasarus, that he determined with himselfe to Lazarus the C break that seruile league which he before had made with Amurath: and for that cause sent of the king his Embassador with secret instructions to the King of Bosna (in time past called Illyria) his of Bosna. neighbor, wherof the chief point was, to craue his aid against the Turk their common Enemy. By whom the King of Bosna returned this answer, That it had bin much better such confideration had bin thought vpon before the foul contract (ful of difgrace both to him felf and all other Christian Princes) was voon a vain fear by him rashly made with the Turkish tyran. Yet for fomuch as things don could not be undon, letting that passe which was remediles, hee promifed to join with him his whole forces against to dangerous an Enemy. And therupon appointing a place for an interview, met accordingly, and there fully concluded all the Articles of their confederation. There was in the confines of Bosina a castle called Alexandria, the captain wherof being a Christian, was yet tributary to the Turk; wishing voto him such good, as men oppressed vice to do to them by whom they are fo wronged. This captain under color of friend thip went to Amurath, and in great fecrecie opened to him the whole state of the kingdome of Bosna, and withall, that the King therof intended fome great mater against him: for the preuenting of which he offered his own fernice, and shewed some probable means how that kingdom might be brought into his subjection, if hee would but send some worthy Generall with a conucnient power for the undertaking therof. This wonderfully pleafed the ambitious old Tyrant, who therfore commanded a rich garment to be cast vpour the Captain (which among st the Turks is taken for a fure token of the Kings great (auor) and forthwith appointed his Totor Lala Schabin, according to this captains direction, to inuade the kingdom of Bosna. Who joining himselfe with this deceitfull Captaine of Alexandria, with an army of twenty thousand men entred into Bofna, where ouerrunning a fide of the countrey, he without refishance tooke great booties; and feeing no apparant cause of sear, to do the more harm, by aduice of the said captain divided his army, which he fent into divers parts of the Countrey, the more to burne and spoile the same. Of all whose proceedings the King of Bosna by secret letters from the

but a thousand men, suddenly appeared in his way thirty thousand Christians well armed: which Schabin feeing, thinking it folly to oppose so few against so many, would have present-F ly fled; but the rest of the gallants which were with him, presuming of their good fortune, and both to lose their rich prey would needs first skirmish with the Christians: in which desperat conflict they were almost all slain, and the whole spoile they had taken recoursed by the Christians. As for Schahin hee was glad by shamefull slight to saue himselfe. The like mishap besel the other Turks in the other parts of Bosia, who for the most part were like-captain advertised, had in convenient places laid strong ambushes for the intercepting of his enemies. So that as Schabin was returning homeward with a rich booty, having then with him wife intercepted and flain: fo that of twenty thousand scarse five thousand returned home. G Whilst these things were doing in Europ, Amurath in great triumph at Neapolis maried the Emperor of Constantinople his daughter : whose two sisters were also given in mariage rereseases to his two fons: at which time he with great folemnity circumcifed three of Baiazets fons. At this time also returned Inzigi Ogli, whom he had before fent Embassador to the Sultan of E. gypt, in requital of the honorable embassage before to him sent from the said Sultan. Now Immenth understanding of the losse of his men in Bosna, with the revolt of Lasarus Despotos Servia, was therwith much disquieted. Wherfore he commanded Alis Bassa his chief counsel. lor, with all treed to fend forth commissions into all parts of his kingdom, for the levying of a royal army: which was done in such post hast, that it was thought he would have taken the field before the beginning of the spring. At which time also the other Mahometan kings and H Princes of Asia, Caraman Ogli, Teke Ogli, and the rest bound vnto him by homage, with divers others of smaller power, were sent for to aid him in this war: who partly for feare, and partly moued with the zeal of their Mahometan superstition, brought their forces with great deug. tion. To this war against the Christians, came also great numbers of the Mahometans from far countries, as voluntary foldiers. Baiazet his fon alfo, then governor of Cutaie with a great part of Galatia gathring all his forces, came to aid his father in this Religious war, as it was by them termed. The Christian tributary princes were not then forgotten, of whom two came, namely Cuffendil & Scratfil. Other two forfaking Amurath, came not, which was Sefames Prince of Bulgaria, and the Prince of Varna and Dobritza: with whom Amurath was highly offended. In the time of this fo great preparation, old Lala Schahin, Amuraths tutor and faith. 1 tull Scruitor died, beeing a man of great yeares; and Temurtafes was appointed Gouernor in

The revolting of the two Christian Princes, Sasmenos and the Prince of Varna, much grieued Amurath. Wherfore he commanded Alis Baffa with an army of thirty thousand to inuade and spoil Sifmenes his country, now called Bulgaria, and in antient time the lower Mysia. Alie Baffa according to that was given him in charge, calling vnto him Iaxis Beg the fon of Temurtafes, Viu Beg, SuratZe Baffa, with other Captains and Commanders of the Turks provinces in Europ, affembled an army of thirty thousand for the inuasion of Bulgaria. With this Army the Balla took many strong towns and castles in Bulgaria, as Pirauade, Venuzina, Madra, Suni

In the mean time, whilf Alis Baffa had thus begun the wars against the Christians in Bulgaria, Amurath having gathered a great Army in Asia, determined in the beginning of the Spring to pate ouer with the fame into Europ: commending the government of his Countries in Afia, to Temurtafes Buffa, Ferifes Beg, Temurtafes Subbaffa, Cutlu Beg, and Hafa Beg, and fo all things fee in order in Afia, he drew down his Afian forces toward Hellespontus, where he was a while flayd with contrary winds, but was afterwards transported to Callipolis, by Ienitto Beg Sanzack there. This was the third time that Amurath brought his army out of Afia into Europ. But whilft he stayd at Callipolis, BaiaZet his son with a great power came to him thither. Alis Baffa also understanding of Amuraths arrival in Europe, retyred out of Bulgatia, an! came to him at Aleide, recounting vnto him the whole fucces of his expedition into Sassinenes Prince of Bulgaria seeing his country spoiled, his strong cities and castles taken by the Turks, and withall hearing of their great preparations for war, by the aduice of his nobilitie thought it best betimes again to submit himselfevnto Amurath. Wherfore tying a winding thee tabout his neck, in token that he had descrued death (after the manner of the Barbarians) he came to Amurath at Calcide; where falling flat upon the ground at the horses feetwheron Amurath fate, he in most humble wife craued pardon, offering at a certain day to deliuer Silistria the chief city of his dominion, into Amurath his possession, as a pledge of his fidelitie:who therupon granted him pardon; and to affure him of his fauor, commanded a rich garment to be cast upon him, after the maner of the Turks, sending will Bassaat the time ap- M pointed to take possession of Silistria. But Sasmenos repenting himself of what he had so largely promifed would not deliuer his city, but in strongest manner he could presently fortified the same. Wherwith Amurath more offended than before, commanded the Baffa with fire and fword again to spoile and wast his Countrey. Who according to his commaundement

A entred againe into Bulgaria, and strook such a terrour of his comming into the hearts of the people, that many strong places were voluntarily yeelded into his power; namely Diritze. Coffora, with the city Ternova the feat of the Princes Court, Tzerneui, Novakestri, Zistoua, with divers others; and proceeding further, he laid fiege to Nicopolis the strongest City of Bulgaria, vpon the fide of the great river Danubius, whither Salmenos was himselfe for searce fled. Who finding himfelfe vnable to hold out the flege, once again (with shame enough) tying a winding theet about his neck, as he had done before, and taking his fon with him, went ont of the City, and in most abject manner falling downe at the Bassa's feet, crassed pardon: which the fayd Baffa, mooued with compassion to see the misery of so great a man, and hauing already taken from him the greatest part of his dominion, and now out of fear of further B refittance, eafily granted. And having thus ended the Bulgarian war, returned to Amurath, of whom he was right joyfully received.

Amurath had now made great preparation for the inuading of Servia; for the which purpose hee had drawn ouer into Europe the greatest forces he could possibly out of Asia; sending also for his yongest fon Iacup, Governor of Carasia, who understanding his fathers pleafure, repaired vnto him with all the power hee could make. This Army by Amurath thus affembled, was the greatest that ever was before that brought by the Turks into Europ. Lafarms not ignorant of this great preparation made by Amurath, had drawn into the fociety of this War, the King of Bosna (as is before said) with Vulcus Prince of Macedonia his son in law, who both brought vnto him great aid. He had also by his Embassadors procured great supplies from other Christian Kings and princes, out of Valachia, Hungaria, Croatia, Schuonia, Albania, Bulgaria, and Italy; besides great numbers of other voluntary deuout Christians: which all affembled and met together, did in number far exceed the great Army of the Turks.

With this army Lafarus the Despot Incamped upon the side of the river Moravia the greater, not far from which stood the strong Castle of Sarkiue, which Alis Bassahad of late taken Sarkiue mits from Sasmenos the Bulgarian Prince, standing as it were betwitt Bulgaria and Servia. This is the sity solition. castle being now possessed of the Turks, was thought by Lasarus dangerous to his Countrey; the civilians who therfore fent one Demetrius a right valiant captain, with certain companies of fele & men and rafed, to take in the fame. The name of this captain Demetrius was a general terror vnto the Turks, for the harm he had done them : fo that they in the castle hearing that he was come, without further refistance yeelded the fame unto him. Wherof Amurath understanding, sent Eine and Sarutse Bassa to recouer the same. But Lasarus doubting that the castle would hardly bee kept in that dangerous war, fent Villeus his fon in law with 20000 men to bring away all that was therin, and in the city neer vnto it, left it should become a prey vnto the greedy Turks : which he accordingly did, and at the same time rased both the castle and the City, before the comming of Iaxi Beg, fent from Amurath to have done the fame exploit, which he comming this ther found already done to his hand by Vulcus.

As Amurath was marching towards Servia, Scratfe and Cuffendyl two Christian Princes his Tributaries, met him with their forces, whom he caused to march before him as his guides: and paffing thorow Custendyl his countrey, was there refreshed with plenty of all things necesfarie, vntillat length passing the river of Morava the lesse, hee drew so neere to the plaines of Coffova, where the Christian army lay, that he with his son Baiaset from a little hill took full view of the Christian campe, which was so great, that it couered all those large plaines from fide to fide, and fo daunted Amurath, as that returning to his army, hee presently entred into a great consultation with his greatest captains and commanders, what course to take against fuch a puissant enemy.

There two great armies being now come so night together, as that they might the one well descry the other, Amurath had purposed the same day to have given the Christians battell; but being diffuaded by Eurenoses, both for that it was extream hot, and his fouldiers wearied F with travel, he rested that night. The next morning as soon as it was day hee put his army in order of battel; placing his fon Baiafet with Eurenofes and Eine Beg Subbaffa, in the right wing; his yongest son Lacup with Sarutse Bassa in the left wing; the main battel he led himselse. Lasarius in the mean time had also set his Army in good order; giving the charge of the right wing to Vulcus his fon in law; the left wing was led by the King of Bosna, and his sons; in the main battel flood Lazarus himlelfe; the Italians, Valachians, Hungarians, Bohemians, and G Bulgarians, he placed in both wings. It is thought, greater Armies than those two had seldom before met in Europ: La Zarna (as the Turkish histories report, but how truly I know not) having in his army five hundred thousand men, and Amurath scarse halfe so many.

To begin the Dattel, Amurath had drawn a thousand of his best archers, vnder the leading of Malos zeus, out of the right wing of his army, & the like number of archers out of the left. under the conduct of Mastapha: which so placed on both sides of the army as he thought best Eurenofes a man of great experience told Amurath, That the Christians were for the most part well and frongly armed, and sholdring close together in their charge would be like a rock of non, vnable to be pierced; but if in joining the battell he would a little retyre, the Christians following vpon good hope, would lose their close standing (the chief part of their strength) H and so leave an entrance for his men. Vpon which resolution, Amurath commanded the Ar. chers to give the first charge, which they couragiously performed. At which time the Turks army gaue ground a little; which the Christians perceiving, with great force affailed the left wing of their army, and with a hard and cruell fight put the fame to flight. Which Bafafet foe. ing, with such sury renued the battel, that the Turks who before as men discouraged fled in the left wing, began now to turn again upon their enemies; and the Christians having as they thought already got the victory, were to begin a great battell. In which bloudy, fight many lel on both fides: the brightnes of the armor and weapons was as it had bin the lightning: the multitude of the launces and other horimens states shadowed the light of the Sun rarrowes and dares fel to faft, that a man would have thought they had poured down from heaven: the notic of the inftruments of war, with the nighing of horses and outeries of men was so terris ble and great, that the wild beafts in the mountains stood astonied therwith and the Turkish histories to expres the terror of the day, vainely say, that the Angels in heaven amased with that hideous noises for that time forgot the hauenly hymns wherewith they alwaies glorisie God. About noon time of the day, the fortune of the Turks prevailing the Christians began to give ground, and at length betooke themselves to plain flight, whom the Turkes with all their force pursued, and slew them down right without number or mercy. In which battel Lafarm the Despot himself was also slain. How beit some histories report otherwise; as that hee with his fon were taken prisoners, and by and by afterward, in reuenge of Amuraths death cruelly flain. Other some also reporting that he died in prison. Amurath after this great victory, with some of his chief captaines taking view of the dead bodies, which without number lay on heaps in the fields like mountains; a Christian foldier fore wounded and all bloudy, seeing him, in staggering maner rose, as if it had bin from death, out of an heap of slain men, and making towards him, for want of strength fel down divers times by the way as he came, as if hee had bin a drunken man; at length drawing nigh vnto him, when they who guarded the Kings person would have stayd him, he was by Amurath himselfe commanded to come neerer, suppoting that he would have craved his life of him. Thus the half dead Christian pressing neer Amusit firm vnto him, as if he would for honors fake have kiffed his feet, fuddenly ftabd him in the bottom of his belly, with a short dagger which he had under his soldiers coat: of which wound that great King and conqueror presently died. The name of this man (for his courage worthy of eternal memory) was Miles Cobelits; who before fore wounded, was shortly after in the presence of Bajaset cut into small pieces. The Turks in their Annals somewhat otherwise report of the death of Amurath: as that this Cobelits, one of the Despots servants, in time of the battel comming to Amurath as a fugitiue, offring him his feruice; and admitted to his prefence, in humbling himselse to have kissed his feet (as the barbarous maner of the Turks is) stabbed him into the belly and to flew him; being himfelfe thortly after therefore (as is a foresaid) in the prefence of Bright most cruelly hewn into smal pieces. Wherupon ever fince that time, the maner of the Turks hath bin, and yet is, that when any Embaffador or stranger is to come to kiffe the Sultans hand, or otherwise to approch his person, he is as it were for honors sake led by the arms unto his prefence by two of the great courtiers : but indeed by fo intangling M him, to be fure hee shall not offer him the like violence that did this Cobelits formerly to

The dead body of Amurath was presently with all secrecie conveyed into his Tent by the Baffa's and Captains prefent at his death: whither Baiafet was also brought with an Enfigne A before him, as the successor in his fathers kingdom. His yonger brother Lucup, syrnamed Zelebi(or the noble) yet ignorant of that had hapned, was by the great Baffa's fent for, as from his father : who casting no perill, but comming into his fathers tent, was there presently by them Prangled, by the commandement of Bajager, as most histories report : howbeit the Turks annals charge him not therwith. This was the beginning of the most vnnaturall and inhumane custom, euer fince holden as a most wholsom and good policic among the Turkish kings and Emperors, in the beginning of their reign most cruelly to massicre their brethren and neerest kinimen, lost once to rid themselves of all fear of their competitors.

This Amurath was in his superstition more zealous than any other of the Turkish Kings, a man of great valor, and in all his attempts fortunat. Hee made greater flaughter of his Ene-B mies than both his father and grandfather. His kingdom in Asia hee greatly inlarged by the fword, mariage and purchase, and vsing the discord and cowardise of the Grecian Princes to his profit, subdued a great part of Thracia, called Romania, with the territories thereo adjov. ning, leaving to the Emperor of Constantinople, little or nothing more in Thracia than the Imperiall city of Constantinople, with the barename of an Emperor, almost without an empire. He won a great part of Bulgaria, and entred into Servia, Boina, and Macedonia. He was liberall, and withall feuere; of his subjects both beloued and feared: a man of very few words and one that could diffemble deeply. He was flain when he was 68 years old, and had thereof reigned 31, Anno Dom. 1390. His dead body was by Bajanet conveyed into Afia, and there Amurath buroyally buried at Prusa, in a fair chappell at the West end of the city, neer to the Baths there, vied at Prusa. wherevoon his tomb lieth his foldiers cloake, with a little Turkish Tulipant, much different from those great turbants which the Turks now weare. Neer vnto the same tomb are placed three lances, with three horse nails festined at the upper end of them, which he used as guidons in his wars : a thing in antient time not strange. There standeth a castle, with a tomb made in remembrance of him, in the plaines of Coslova, where hee was slaine, and his intrals buried. Which gives occasion for some to report that he was there also himselfe interred.

Fulminis in morem celeri rapit aomina motu Bajazethes, fidei pacis & impatiens. Regni Hadrianopolim sedes sibi legit at esset, Posset ut Europa jungere regnasuis. Constantinopolim gemina obsidione fatigat : Iam Gracas vana fe sibi fondet opes. Cum Tamerlano prabet sua terga, catenis Vinetus, & in cavea probra pudenda subit.

Proud BajaZet, most false of faith, and loathing blessed peace, His warlike troups like lightning to shake he doth not cease. Of Hadrianople he makes choice for his Imperiall feat, That Europes Kingdom he might join vnto his Empire great. Constantinople he distrest twice with streit siege and long; And vainly thought to have possess the Grecians wealth by wrong. But ouercome by Tamerlane, fast bound in fetters sure, Trod vnder foot, and clos'd in Cage, great shame did there endure.

THE LIFE OF BAIAZET, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, THE FOURTH AND MOST VNFORTVNAT KING OF THE TVRKES.

AjaZet (or as the Turks cal him Bajasit) of his violent and sierce nature fyrnamed Gilderun, or lightning, fucceeded his father Amurath in the Turkish kingdom; his yonger brother lacup beeing strangled immediatly after his fathers death, as is before declared. He in the first year of his reign inuaded Servia, and there be- Bajaret inuafieged Cratoua, a city of the Despots, whereunto the filuer mines delh Servia. of Servia (not the least cause of that war) belonged. Which city was yeelded vnto him vpon condition. That the Christian inhabitants might with life and liberty depart. Who were no fooner gone out of the City, but that by his commandement they were all most cruelly slain by his men of war, for that purpose sent out after them. At this time he also won Vicupia, with divers other castles in the country neer vinto Cratoua.

Sigismund at the same time King of Hungary (a yong Prince of great hope, and brother to Winceslaw then Emperor of the West) advertised from the Servians his allyes and Confederats, of these proud proceedings of Bajazet; by his Embassadours sent of purpose, requested him, that as he was a just Prince, and wished to line in quiet with his owne, to defist from doing such open wrong, and from inuading of such countries of his friends & confederats, as he had no right in. Which Embassadors so sent, Bajazet detained without answer, til such time as he had ouerrun a great part of the Despots country, and therin don what he thought good. Then calling the said Embassadors vnto him into one of the strong towns which hee had in euery corner filled with his own fouldiers, told them that they might there see, that his right both vnto that town and the rest by him taken was good enough, for as much as the very Walls acknowledged the same. And so giving them leave to depart, willed them so to tel their ma. ster. Which his proud answer by the same Embassadours reported vnto the young King, no lesse troubled him than if open war had by them bin denounced vnto him, seeing the Tyrant, as it should seem, pretended right vnto what soeuer he could by force get. Neuertheles, being himself as yet not wel setled in his kingdom, and in doubt of the contrary faction (that altogether liked not of his election into Hungary for their King) he was glad at that time to put it vp, and so to hold himself content.

The next yeare BajaZet by Ferifes Beg tooke the City of Vidina, with many other strong servia the se-Townes and Castles in Servia, and afterwards returned unto Hadrianople. But whilest that cond time inhe thus raged in Europ, the Caramanian King invaded and spoiled the frontiers of his coun-F tries in Afia. At the same time Eurenoses, Lord Gouernour of the marches of his Dominions in Europe towards Grecia, departing from Serres (where hee then lay) tooke the Citie of Sitros in Thessalia. And Ferises Beg, not content to have taken Vidina (as is before said) passed ouer the great River of Danubius, and grieuously spoyled Valachia: from whence he returned loden with a great prey. This is the first time that I read of that the Turks ever pas-fed ouer the river Danubius. At this time also legides Baffa entered the kingdome of Bosna. G from whence he carried a great number of Captines to Hadrianople, where Bajazet spent that

In the beginning of the next Spring BajaZet passed ouer Hellespontus to Prusa, where hee built a fair Mahometan temple with a colledge and an almf-house: which works finished, he returned again into Europ, and built a monaftery at Hadrianople, and so returned again into Analcaving Temurtales Beglerbeg or Viceroy in Hadrianople. After he was come into Afia. he laid fiege vnto the strong city of Philadelphia in Lydia, which was at that time the onely city in the leffer Asia yet holden by the Christians in the midst of the Mahometan Princes. For now was the Greek emperor by the Othoman Kings and the other Turks, quite driven our of the leffer Afia. In the beginning of this fiege, Bajazet gaue streit commandment to his fol. H diers, That they should not spoil or hurt any thing in the country belonging to the citisens: hoping by this seigned curtesie to make them the more willing to yeeld themselues vnto his obedience. But disappointed of his expectation, and finding them resolved to hold it out to the last, he forthwith gaue out contrary commandment, not to spare any thing they could wast or deftroy: which was accordingly by his greedy foldiers performed. After a long fiege, the citisens seeing the countrey about them veterly wasted, and themselues vnable any longer to endure, and out of all hope of relief, yeelded their city to the pleasure of Bajazet. Some write, That this famous city was not be fieged without the consent of the Emperor of Constantino rle: and that the Greeks themselves, moved with enuy to see that City so long hold out, did help the Turks in the winning therof.

During this fiege, Alidin Ogli Prince of Caria, a Mahometan, came to Bajazet, & yeelded himself into his power as his vassal : vnto whom Bajazet restored certain places which he had in this expedition a little before taken from him; yet vpon fuch condition, as that he should not from that time coin any money in his own name, either be remembred in their publique praiers as a prince in their Mahometan temples, as he had before bin: but that al fuch things should be don in the name of Bajazet, as his dread Lord & Soueraign. With which diffgrate the poor prince was glad to content himself, and to live as his vassal. From Philadelphia hee led his army into the country of Saruchania, in antient time called Ionia Maritima, which he fubdued to himfelf you like conditions. After that he passed further to Mentesia, or Mentz, fomtime called Myndos, in Caria: the prince wherof for fear fled to Cutrun Bajazet Prince of K Castamona and part of Pontus, leaving his country to the pleasure of the tyrant. And forasmuch as the yong King of Caramania had inuaded his countries whilft he was busied in Europ, Bajazet in reuenge therof entred with his army into Caramania, and took Cæfarea, with divers other places there: fo that the yong King discouraged with the losse of his towns, and fearing Bajazets greatnes, was glad to hold himfelfe content with his loffe, and to make peace with him as it pleafed him to grant it. As BajaZet was making this expedition into Caramania, another yong Mahometan Prince the fon of Prince Germian, came vnto him with one of his chief counfellors, and were both by him fent prifoners over the street to the castle of Ipsala where they lay in durance many years after. Thus BajaZet having oppressed and wronged most of the Mahometan princes, the successors of Sultan Aladin in the lesser Asia, at last returned again himselfe in triumph to Prusa.

The Prince of Mentesia, who for sear of BajaZet was fled out of his Countrey (as is aforefaid, had now infenced Cutrun Baja et prince of Castamona, with a great power to inuade that fide of BajaZet his Kingdome which bordered vpon him. Which Bajazet understanding, gathered together a great Army to go against this Mahometan Prince. At which very time the Vayuod of Valachia, hearing of Bajazet his troubles in Asia, with a strong Army passed ouer Danubius, into those parts of Servia and Bulgaria that were by the Turks as then possessed; where he spoiled the Countrey, and slew great numbers of the Turks, making Mahometan Saints and Martyrs by heaps: for fo the Turks account all them whom the Christians kil in their wars. Which don, he retyred back again into Valachia, carrying with him also many M of the Turks prisoners. Bajazet thus at once inuaded both in Asia and Europe, deferred his Warres purposed against the Prince of Pontus, vntill a more convenient time, converting his Forces against the Valachians. Wherefore passing over the Streight to Hadrianople, he fent his Army from thence to Nicopolis, and there passing the River of Danubius, entered

Bajazet fourth King of the Turks.

A into Valachia, burning and spoiling the countrey before him as he went. Where the Vayuod to represse his fury, met him in the field and gaue'him battell, but was therin ouerthrown, and many of his people flaine; fo that at last he was glad to sue for peace, which he obtained, by submitting himselfe to Baja (et, and yeelding to pay him a yeerely tribute.

Whilest Bajazet was thus busied in Valachia, newes was brought unto him, That the Chri. Thessalia innuftians of the West with a fleet of gallies did great harm along st the coasts of his dominions did by Bajages in Afia. In reuenge whereof, he entred with his army into Theffaly, destroying all the countrey unto Theffalonicain which expedicion he tooke the city of Neapolis in Greece, and Io-annina in Ætolia, and after that returned into Asia, where he spent that Winter.

In the beginning of the next Spring, he with a great power passed the streit of Callipolis to Hadrianople, intending to have invaded Hungary. But as he was vpon the way, it chanced that a Constantinopolitan spie was by the Turks intercepted, with letters from the Greeke Emperour to the King of Hungary, giving him warning both of the Turks preparation and comming. By which spie Baja et also vnderstood of another messenger before sent into Hungary for like purpose. Whereupon Temurtases (then his great lieutenant in Europe) persuaded him to defift from his intended warres in Hungary, and to be fiege the imperial city of Constantinople, as a thing of more honour, and lesse danger; the city being already (as he said, and as in truth it was) furrounded with the Turkish provinces : bringing in Philadelphia (but a few yeres before woon) for example of the like exploit. Of whose counsel Bajazet liking wel, returned with his army, and shortly after came and sate down therewith before Constantinople, laying hard fiege thereunto, first by land, and then by sea, with his gallies sent from Callipolis, Which hard fiege continued (as most histories report) the space of eight yeres in which constantinopte polis, vy nich hard nege continued (as more interness report that special regard to leave eight year the long time he draue the Emperour Emanuel Palaologies to that streit, that he was glad to leave first by 8834. his city, and himselse in person to crave aid of Wencestaus the Germane Emperour, and Charles 300, the fixth the French King, and other Christian Princes also. At which time the citilens were at length brought to fuch extremity, that they were euen at the point to have yeelded up the city, and haply had so done, had not sigifmund King of Hungary (assisted with a great army of the French, and other voluntary Christians almost out of enery part of Christendome, to the number of an hundred and thirty thousand, under the leading of Iohn County of Niuers, and after Duke of Burgondy) for the reliefe of the befreged Emperour, passed ouer Danubius into the Turkish dominions; and there having recovered Vidina, with certains other strong Holds in Bulgaria, layd fiege to Nicopolis: out of which city the Turks oftentimes fallyed, and gaue him many an hot skirmish. It is reported, That the yong King Sigismund beholding the greatnes of his great army, in his great jollity hearing of the comming of the Turks army, should proudly say What need we to fearethe Turk, who need not at all to feare the falling of the heauens, which if they [hould fall, yet were we able with our spears and halberts to hold them up for falling vpon vs. But Bajazet understanding what spoyle the Hungarian King had made in his late gained countries, and of the siege of Nicopolis; commanded the ladders and other great prouision now in readinesse for the scaling and assaulting of the City of Constantinople, to be burnt, because they should not come into the hands of the Christians, and so raising his siege, marched with a right puissant army to Nicopolis, sending Eurenoses before, of purpose to intercept some of the Christians, thereby to learne the state of their camp and army. But they hearing of his comming, so wel looked to themselves, that he with shame returned to his Mafter as he came, without any one prisoner taken. Which thing much troubled BajaZet, as searing he should have to do with a wary enemy. Sigismund understanding of the approach of Bajazet, leaving a sufficient power for the continuing of the siege, rose himselse, and with the rest of his army went to meet his proud enemy. Of whose comming and approach Bajazet vnderstanding, divided his Army into two parts; and being now come wiehin the fight of the Christian army, made shew but of the one halfe, keeping himselse close in secret ambush not farre off with the other. The Christians deeming themselues (as they were) far more in num-F ber than the Turks which they faw, divided their army also into two parts, purposing betwixt them to have inclosed the Turks. Of all the Christians that were there present, the French defired to haue the honour of the first charge to be given vpon the Turks, and in their heat vpon good hope fet forward (the Hungarians, with a great part of the army, not yet fet in order) and so began the battell: where betwixt them and the Turks was fought a right cruell fight, and in a little time many thousands stain. But this fight had not long endured, when B ajaZet with G the other halfe of his army fuddenly arising, came on with such violence, as well became his fyrname of Gilderun or lightning; and so hardly charged the French, that they amased at the fuddennesse of the danger, and oppressed with the fury and multitude of the vnex pected ene. my food at the first as men dismaid; but seeing no remedy, encouraging one another, valiant. ly lought it out vntill they were almost all either slain or taken prisoners; stil in hope to have been relieued by the Hungarians and the rest. In this hard conflict divers of the French horf. men having fortaken their horses, fought on foot, as their manner was : which horses running backe without their riders, upon the Hungarians, caused them to doubt that the French were quite ouerthrowne; wherewith difmayed, they without further comming on, all turned their backs and fled, in to great haft, as that it booted not the king or any other great commander to roabout to flay their flight. The French thus by their too much haft ouerthrowne, the Turks purfying the Hungarians and the rest of the Christians, made of them a great slaughter; of whom also many were drowned in the great river Danubius. At which time also the Turks tooke so many prisoners, that it was thought enery seuerall Turke had his prisoner. King si. gifmund himfelt, who but a little before had despised even the falling of the heavens, had then also yndoubtedly fallen into his enemies hands, had he not in a little boat by good hap got ouer Danubius: not vnlike another Xerxes, who having covered the feas with his shippes, and with a world of men passed ouer into Grecia, was afterward by the strange change of fortune. himselfe alone in a small fisher boat glad to get backe again into Asia. Sigismund being thus got ouer Danubius, and fearing the violence of the Hungarians for the losse of the battel, fled I by sea into Thracia to Constantinople, from whence he sailed vnto the Island of the Rhodes. and from thence failing through the Ægean and Ionian fea, landed at length at Dalmatia and fo having wandred from place to place, tofled with many fortunes, after eighteene moneths long and painefull trauell returned againe into Hungary. Where he found the flate of his kingdome in his absence much troubled the contrary faction in the mean time having made choice of Ladiflams King of Naples for their King, who was even then with a great army go. ing to have taken possession of the kingdome, had not Sigismund in good time by the helpe of certaine of the chiefe of the Hungarian nobility preuented him. In this battel, called the battell of Nicopolis, were of the Christians twenty thousand slain, and of the Turks threefeere thousand. The County of Niusers the French Kings neere kinsman was there taken prisoner, K with three hundred great commanders more: where after he had indured great contumely and reproach in the presence of Baja (et, he was commanded to make choice of fine other of the captaines, such as he liked best, all the rest being cut in pieces before his face, and he with the other fine lest aline, sent prisoners to Prusa, from whence they were afterwards ransomed for two hundred thousand Duckats. This bloudy battell of Nicopolis was fought in the yere of Bajazet after this great victory, having worthily relieved his befieged city, returned againe to the fiege of Constantinople, laying more hardly vnto it than before, building forts and bulwarks against it on the one side towards the land; and passing ouer the streit of Bosphorus, built a strong castle vpon that streit ouer against Constantinople, to impeach so much as was L possible all passage therunto by sea. This streit siege (as most write) continued also two yeres, which I suppose by the circumstance of the history, to have been part of the aforesaid eight yeres. Emanuel the besieged Emperor wearied with these long wars, sent an embassador to Bajazer to intreat with him a peace: which BajaZet was the more willing to hearken unto, for that he heard news, that Tamerlane the great Tartarian Prince intended shortly to warre voon him. Yet could this peace not be obtained, but upon condition, that the Emperor should grant free liberty for the Turks to dwell together in one freet of Constantinople, with free exercise of their owne religion and lawes, under a judge of their owne nation; and further, to pay unto the Turkish King a yerely tribute of ten thousand duckats. Which dishonorable conditions the diffressed Emperour was glad to accept of. So was this long siege broken up, and presently a M great fort of Turks with their families were sent out of Bithynia, to dwel in Constantinople, and a Church there built for them which not long after was by the Emperor pulled down to the ground, and the Turks againe driven out of the city, at fuch time as Bajazet was by the mighty Tamerlane ouerthrowne and taken prisoner.

Bajazet in the beginning of his reign, presently after the death of Lagarus the Desporassian in the battell of Cossoua, woon part of Seruia (as is a foresaid) the other part beeing still holden by Lazarus his fon, called Stephen the Despot; who about this time sent an honorable embaffador to Bajazet, with louing letters, and royall Prefents: by which embaffador also the old Princesse Latarus his widow, offred her faire daughter Despina, Stephens sister, a lady of incomparable beauty, in marriage to him, if it should please him to vouch safe his handmaid (as she termed her) so high a place. This lady was long before promised him, whilst his father Amurath yet lived. Of this Embassador Bajazet was very glad, but especially for the faire Ladies fake: which being known to the Princes her mother, & the Despot her brother, the was forthwith honorably sent to BajaZet, and so to him with great solemnity and triumph shortly after Bajazet marrimaried, Of all his wives he held her decreft, and for her fake reflored to her brother Stephen the the faire city and castle of Semendre (otherwise called S. Andrew) and Columbarium in Servia: she al-daughter of lured him to drink wine, forbidden by the Turks law; and caused him to delight in sumptuous Delpor. banquets, which his predecessors Othoman, Orchanes, and Amurath, neuer vsed.

As the Turkish kingdome grew in greatnesse, so corruption, the canker of great states and common-weales, increased likewise; but specially in the men of law, and judges of his courts. Wherewith Baja 7et grieuoully offended, commanded divers of the same judges to be apprehended determining (to the terror of others) to have executed them, whose dangerous estate was much pitied, and also fauoured of Alis Bassa, and other the Kings great Councellors: yet for fo much as Bajazet was of a furious nature, and in his anger dangerous to be spoken vnto, none of them durst adventure to intreat him in their behalfe, no not Alis Bassa, Charydin Bassa his fonne, formetime judge of Prufa, although he were a man in such special fauour with him, that he was therefore of the common people not onely reuerenced, but as the King himfelfe

There was at that time in the court an Æthyopian jeaster, who under some couert pleasant jeast would many times bolt out that to the king in his greatest heat, which his grauest councellors durst not once speak to him of in secret: this jester, Alis Baffa requested to deuise some means to intreat with the angry King in the behalfe of these Iudges; promising to give him whathe would reasonably desire, if he could appease the Kings displeasure. The Æthyopian without feare undertook the matter, & presently putting upon his head a rich hat all wrought ouer with gold, after the maner of the Turks embassadors, and sitting himselsewith other apparrell better befeeming an embassador then a jeaster; thus attired presented himselse before the King, with a great counterfeit grauity. Whereat Bajazet maruelling, asked him the cause why he was to gay. I have a request vnto your Majesty (said he) and wish to find fauor in your fight, BajaZet more delitous than before to know the matter asked what his request was. If it ftand with your pleafure (faid the jeaster) I would faine go as your embassador to the emperor of Constantinople, in hope whereof I have put my selfe in this readinesse. To what purpose would thou go? (faid Baja et) To craue of the Emperour (faid he) some forty or fifty of his old grave Monks and Friers to bring with me hither to the court. And what should they doe here? (faid Baja7et) I would have them placed (faid the feafter) in the rooms of the old doting judges, whom you intend (as I heare) to put to death. Why (faid Bajazet) I can place others of my owne people in their rooms. True (faid the Æthyopian) for grauity of look and countenance, and so would the old Monks and Friers serue as well, but not so learned in your laws & customs of your kingdom, as are those in your displeasure. If they be learned (said Bajazet) why do they then contrary to their learning peruert justice, and take bribes? There is a good reason for that too (said the jeaster.) What reason? (said the king.) That can be that there stanby tel better than I, (faid the jefter, pointing to Alis Baffa:) who forthwith commanded by Baidee to give the reason, with great reverence before done, shewed, That those ludges so in difpleasure, were not conveniently provided for, & were therefore inforced many times for their necessary maintenance to take rewards to the staying of the due course of justice. Which Ba-E jeses under franding to be true, commanded Alis Baffa to appoint them convenient stipends for their maintenance, and forthwith granted their pardon. Whereupon the Baffa fet down order, That of edery matter in fuir exceeding one thousand Aspers, the ludge shall have twenty aspers fee for judgement and for every writing and infirument out of the court, twelve Afpers: which fees they yet take in those courts at this day.

Not long after, Bajazet in his fury fent for certain of his captaines and commanders of his G men of war, with whom he was for some small occasion grieuously offended, intending in his rage to haue put them all to death, which was with him no great matter. These captaines be. ing brought before him, the councellors feeing him all in choler, fate looking on the ground hanging down their heads, as the manner of the Turks is, not daring to looke him in the face. nor to speak a good word for them: when suddenly the aforesaid Æthyopian jester stept forth. earneftly requesting the King, not to shew them any fauor, but to execute them presently, as villaines and traitors; railing vpon them, as if he had known some great fault by them. Bajazet thinking he could have accused them of some great crime, because of his earnestnesse, asked what reason he had so to exclaime against them. Reason, (quoth the jester) because the knaues be good for nothing; and they say that Tamerlane is with a great army comming against vs : if u you will but take vo an enfigne in your hand, and I go before you with a drum, I will strike vo fuch a terrible march, & you make fuch a dreadfull shew, that we shall need none of these bad fellowes or their foldiers in the field to get the victory ouer our enemies. This conceit of the jeaster strucke such a melancholy imagination into Bajazet his head, that he stood musing a great while as it were in a deepe study; at last having well considered the drift of the jeasters speech, and his fury now somwhat assuaged granted them pardon, which they looked not for:

This Æthyopian jester, Bajazer vpon a time sent unto the old Queene his mother, to bring her newes of the good successe of his wars against the Christians, for that she had so defired: who comming vnto her, & by her commanded to fit down, the began to demand of him, how the King her fonne did, and of the successe of his wars. Whereunto he answered, That hedid 1 very well, and had woon from the Christians a great countrey, and greatly inriched his foldiers. But after a little more talke, the Queene mother desirous to heare againe the good newes, (or elfe after the manner of fome, which thinke nothing sufficiently told, except it be told an hundred times lasked him againe, how the King her fonne did, and how he sped in his warres. Whereunto he answered enery word as before: but asking him the third time the very same question, how her fon did? Do'st thou aske me so often (said the Æthyopian) how he doth? Bre Caphre (o whore faid he) thou hast brought forth a fonne like a diuell, who roaming vo and down doth nothing but burn and destroy the world where he commeth. VV hereat the Ouesne crying out, vp ftart the Æthyopian, and betaking himselfe to his heeles, was neuer more after-

In the wars which Bajazet had against Sigismund, the Vayuod of Valachia had ginen aid to the Hungarian king; wherwith Bajazet being offended, determined now at length to be reuenged:and therefore intending to make war upon the Valachian prince, left Temurtales his great lieutenant at Ancyra in Asia, and so passed ouer Hellespontus himself against the Valachian. Vpon whose departure, Aladin his sisters son the yong king of Caramania, with a great power came fuddenly in the night to Ancyra, and took Temurtales prisoner: who then feared nothing leffe, than in time of peace to be fo surprised, and carried away in bonds into Caramania. But when he understood that Bajazer had ended his wars in Valachia, and was with victory returned to Prula, he fearing his heavy indignation for fo great an outrage, presently released Tea muriales out of prison, apparrelled him richly after the maner of that nation, craued pardon for L the wrong he had done him, and fet him at liberty to go whither he would, and withal fent one of his noblemen with great gifts and prefents to Bajazet, to make his excuse in best maner be could : vnto which embassador BajaZet (yet in choler) would not giue audience, or suffer him to come in his fight: but at the same time leuied a great army to invade Caramania. 'Which Aladis understanding, and now out of all hope to appeale this mighty enemy, lettied all the forces he could in his owne kingdome, and withall entertained all the mercinary foldiers he could get, intending to try his fortune in the field, as a man of valour, rather than to be thruft out of his kingdome like a coward: and fo in readines, hearing of the comming of Bajaget, met him vpon the way, and at a place called Aczac gaue him battell but beeing too weak, he was ouercome and put to flight, in which flight his horse stumbling, and he falling to the ground, M was there before he could recouer himselfe, taken by his enemies which had him in chase, and so brought hound to Bajazet: his two sons Muhamet Beg & Alis Beg, being taken in that battell alfo, were fent prisoners to Prusa. Aladin himselse was by Bajazets command delivered to his enemy Temertafes: who in revenge of the wrong hee had before done him, prefently caused him to be hanged which when Bajaces understood, he seom'd very fory that he had so put him to death, for that he was his own fifters fon. Bajazet following the course of his victory, woon Iconium, Larenda, Nigde, with all the rest of Aladin his kingdome. About this time also, Amasia the great metropoliticall city of Capadocia, was by the prince thereof deliuered to Amasia yielded Bajales, beeing too weake himselfe to defend the same against the force of Casi-Burchanidin, was Bajages, prince of the great and strong city of Sebassia, his enemy; now growne to be a man of great power in that part of Asia, and had solicited the Sultan of Ægypt to and him against Bajazet. Whereupon Bajazet returning from the conquest of Caramania, led his army towards Seba-Ria where the citifens had a little before depriued Cass-Burchanidin of his government, for his cruelty, and placed his fon in his stead but in short time no lesse weary of the son, than before of the father, they with like inconstancy sent word to BajaZet, that if he would come that way, they would yeeld vnto him the city woon whose approch, Casis (his sonne) for seare fled out of the city, to Prince Nafradin his brother in law. After whose departure, the citisens according to their promife, delivered the city vnto BajaZet at his comming, wherein he left Solyman his SebaBia deliver eldest some governor. And so having in this notable expedition conquered the kingdome of red to Baja cita Caramania, and taken the great cities of Amalia and Schaftia, with most part of Capadocia, and all that part of Asia, which the Turks call Rumilia Asiatica, he returned to Prusa, and

The next Spring, BajaZet hearing that his old enemy Cutrum Bajazet Prince of Castamona and Pontus, was dead, came to Castamona with a great army: which Isfendiar (Cutrun BajaZets Bajazetinus fon, and then Prince of that countrey) hearing, fled out of the city of Synope, a little city wpon Prince of Can. the coast of the Euxin: from whence he sent an embassador to Bajazet, humbly requesting him, Bamone. to suffer him to have that little city, as his servant to live in, (which he was sure he would otherwise bestow upon some other of his seruants) and not to seeke the innocent bloud of the fon for the fathers offence. Which his request, Bajazet moued with pity easily granted: yet neuertheles took from him Castamona, with the greatest part of his dominion in Pontus, which he gaue to his fonne Solyman. At the fame time hee violently oppressed the Prince German; and tooke from him the cities of Despotopolis and Hierapolis, with all the rest of his domi-

The Prince of Mentelia long before driven out of his country by Bajaket, (as is before declared) and having all this while made his abode at Castamona, doubting now of his owne fafety, after the death of his good friend Cutrun Bajazet, in the habit of an hermit fled to the great Tartarian Prince Tamerlane.

Bajazet returning to Prusa, there built a magnificent Mahometane Temple; during which worke he with great superstition forbore drinking of wine, reposing himselse with the company of grave and learned men, and the administration of justice: whereby hee greatly woon the hearts of his subjects, and had now so inlarged his kingdome, that all Kings and Princes bordering voon him stood in great scare of him.

It fortuned about this time, that Achmetes King of Bagdat (or new Babylon) and Eiracum, with Iosephus Niger King of Colchis, inforced with the violent incursions of Tamerlane & his Tartars, for fafegard of their liues were glad to fly into Syria : where they being discourred, were both cast in prison by the commandement of the Ægyptian Sultan, who then commanded ouer Syria: from whence they afterwards hardly escaping, fled to Bajazets court. Where after Achmetes had stayd two months, he by the aid of Bajakes recoursed the possession of Eiracum part of his owne inheritance. I of ephus the other Mahometan King having tarried in Bajazets court eight moneths, at length procured him to inuade the dominions of the Ægyptian Sultan: in which expedition he mightily preuailed, and having slaine the Ægyptlin Sultans Generall, and discomfitted his forces, tooke the city of Malatie or Meletine in Armenia, with Diorige. Derende, and Bexene, taken from the Turcomans, and spoyled all the countryt hereabouts. From thence marching with his army towards Erznitzane, the Prince thereof called F Tachretin met him vpon the way, yeelding his city and country into his power; which Bajazet presently gaue to Islephus Niger: who after he had fix daies enjoyed this new government, finding the people vnwilling to be gouerned by him a stranger, surrendred the same againe into the hands of him that gaue it. Whereupon the Citifens of Erznitzane humbly requested of Bajazer, That they might be againe gouerned by their old Prince Tachretin, now his vassall.

Which thing he at their earnest request granted but taking his wife and children as a plodge G of his loyalty, fent them away to Prusa, where they were all not long after made away.

When Bajazet had now many yeres thus mightily preuailed against the Christian Princes in Romania, Bulgaria, Bosna, Thessalia, Valachia, and other places of Europe, as is before dea clared, and inflamed with infatiable ambition, had in worfe manner oppressed the Mahome. ten Kings & Princes of Afia(of whom somewere by him slain, some driven into exile some imprisoned, and othersome brought into such subjection, that they lived as it were but athis denotion) and was now growne to that greatnes, that in the pride of his heart he food in feare of no man, but was (as he thought) a terrour vnto the world, having vnder his obeyfance great and large dominions in Europe, but far greater in Asia: it fortuned that diversof these miss rable & discontented Mahometan princes, by great fortune, as if it had bin by appointment to H meet together at the court of the great Tartatian Prince Tamerlan, whether they were fled for reliefe and fuccor. The Prince Germian Ogli, after long imprisonment in the castle of Infala in Europe, brake prison, and with Hiffar-Beg his great counsellor and prison fellow, consorted themselves with a company of loitring companions, roaming from place to place, delighting the countrey people with their apish toyes: in which company he passed Hellespontus, as a Beareward, and at length with much adoe came to Tamerlane his court: whither the Prince of Mentefia was come before in the habit of an hermit (as is aforefaid) with his head and beard shauen: Aidin Ogli passing through the countrey as a pedlar, with a packe at his backe came thither also the Prince Tachretin as a seruing-man, came attending upon the Prince Isfendian; who came alfo, but in some better fashion than the rest, as an Embassadour from some other I Prince, All these poore Princes, with divers others in like misery, in short time arrived at Samarcand (great Tamerlane his court;) every one particularly complaining of his owne private griefe. & all together earneftly requesting that mighty prince, to take upon him their defence. and to reuenge the wrong done vnto them by the Turkish tyrant Bajazet. Whose pittifull complaints much moved the noble Tarrarian, but especially the long & wrongfull imprison ment of German Ogli; and the pittifull complaint and mone of Tachretin, who had of late loft his wife and children by the cruelty of Bajazer. Yet in this matter of so great and important confequence, Tamerlane made no great shew of his forwardnes, (although he was by nature in nothing more delighted, than in the relieuing of the diffressed, and chastising of the proud) but coldly answered these Princes, That he could not tell whether all were so as they had re- g ported of Bajazet, or not, but that he well knew him to be a very zealous King in fetting forth of the Mahometan religion, and that he had therfore made great wars upon the Christians, in which goodly cause (he said) perhaps they had refused to affish him, or els had given him some other greater occasion of offence, to him vnknowne: For I can hardly beleeve (said he) that so great and religious a Prince as he, would without just and sufficient cause, offer such violence as you may complaine of especially vnto you his neighbor Princes and of the same religion with himselfe: neuerthelesse, whatsoever I intend toward your request (said Tampelane) I will fend first an Embassadour vntohim, to vnderstand more of him and his proceedings, before I resolue upon any thing with which answer he willed them until then to hold themselves contented. But as Tamerlane was about to haue dispatched his Embassador to Bajazes; he was ad- I uertifed, that Achmetes late King of new Babylon, and Infehrus King of Colchis, both by him driven out of their kingdomes, having broken out of prison from the Sultan of Ægypt, were now come to Bajazet his court, to craue his aid and affiftance: wherefore he deferd to fend bis Embassidour, suspecting that BajaZet incited by these two exiled Kings, would first in their quarrell begin to make war vpon him. But not long after, understanding that they were both again departed from his court, as is before declared; he then disparched his Embassadous to Bajazet, with many rich gifts and presents; courteously requesting him the rather for his sake; to deale kindly with these Mahometan Princes, his friends, as also with the Greeke Emperor Emanuel his aliye, for whom he was now become an interceffor vnto him. Some report alfo, that he besides this, requested to have the two aforesaid Mahometan Kings of Bagdat & Col- M chis deliucred vnto him; and withall feemed not a little to diflike of Bajazet his proceedings against the Turcomans his friends. But Bajazet being a Prince of a great and haughty spirit, and vnaecustomed to heare of any thing which fitted not his humor, highly offended with this embassage, in great scorn reiected the Presents by Tamerlane sent to him, and specially certain garments which Tamerlane after the manner of those Eastern nations, had in kindnes among st other things fent him: willing the embaffador to bid his mafter to meddle with his own marters; and to prescribe lawes to his owne subjects, and not vnto him, with whom he had nought to do and to fend his rags for prefents vnto his inferiours, and nor vnto princes of greater power and state than himselfe. Adding thereunto many other words full despight and disdain asfourding him no better file than the plain name of Tamerlane: calling him the husband of a whore if he met him not in the field; and wishing vnto him selfe againe, to take vnto him his thrice divorced wife, after the had bin polluted by another man (as the greatest dishonor that might be) if he failed to meet him wherfour he durft dare him battel which proud answer of the Turke, by the Embassador reported to Tamerlane, and aggrauated by Axalla(a Christian of the race of the Genowales, borne at Capha, and then one of his greatest counfellors about him, and the Greek emperors great friend) was fo cuill taken by him, that all other things fet apart, he resolued to go against the Turke, and to take in hand that war, as of all other the firtest for the increase of his honor and glory. Besides that, he thought it not in reason sit for the greatnes of the Tartarian empire, to fuffer such an unquiet neighbor to grow great: as still encroaching upon other the weak Princes confining to him, and adding conquelts to conquelts. and yet neuer the more contented, might in the end proue dangerous to his own estate and so. ueraignty:a common care to fuch as be themselves great, and mounted up vnto the highest degrees of worldly honour, to have in jealousse and distrust the sudden rising of others neere or farther off, as perillous or difgracefull to themfelues, or their effate: whose growing greatnes they therefore feek by all means to hinder; as did now the mighty Tamerlane the proceedings and increasing of the great Othoman king, BajaZet: and the rather being continually prickt forward to rodo, by the folicitation of the Greeke Emperor Emanuel, the other oppressed Mahometan Princes, and by the great captain Axalla(as is a forefaid) a Christian : of whom for all that Tamerlane himselse, a Mahometan, for the great sidelity, valor and vertue he found in him, made no finall reckoning, but was contented even in his greatest and most waighty affairs to be by him aduised; disliking of no man for his religion what focuer, so as he did worship but one only God, Creator of heaven and earth, and of all that therein is being himfelfe of opinion. That God in Effence one, and in himself immutable, without change or diversity, yet for the manifesting of his omnipotency and power, as he had created in the world fundry kinds Tamerlane his of people, trutch differing both in nature, manners, and condition, and yet all framed to the opinion concerimage of himselfe: sowas he also contented to be of them dinersly served, according to the fity of religions. diversity of their natures and manners: so that they worshipt none other strange gods, but him alone, the maker and Creator of all things: which was the cause that he suffered the vie of all religions within the countries subject to his obedience, were they not meere Atheists, Idola. ters or worthippers of strange and vaine gods.

Neither was proud Bajazet as one ignorant of the power or purpose of Tamerlane, in the meane time idle, but fill profecuted his good fortune for the inlarging of his empire, and increating of his ftrength: wifely deeming (as the truthwas) what focuer mediages were fent to him from Tamerlane, to be no other than meere threatnings and forewarnings of his more dangerous purposes and designes against him and his state: which he was so farre from searing, as that to prouoke him the more, he spared no intemperate speech, which might mooue him to wrath withing (as thould feeme) for nothing more, than to meet him in the field, there to try the fortune of a battell with him. So weake is our forefight of our fortunes to come, and the reach of our understanding for the apprehension or declining of the fatal doom even presently hanging ouer our heads; as that we oftentimes through ignorance most desirously wish for those things which are vnto vs the chiefe occasions of our vtter ruine and ouerthrow.

But here before we enter into farther discourse of the mortall war betwixt these two so puiffant Princes, it shall not be much from our purpose to step a little out of the way, to see what this mighty Tamerlane (of whom fo many Princes craued aid) was, who living held the East in such awe, as that he was commonly called, The wrath of God, and Terror of the world, which he then filled with the glory of his name. Most Historiographers report him to have bin poorly The Base apiniborne, of base and obscure parents: and so himselfe also in his youth to have lived as a poore on some have flepheard or heardsman in the mountains; where conforting himselfewith other flurdy companions of like quality and disposition, such as there lived by tobbing of Merchants & other of Tamer Bunt. passengers,

passengers, he became a masterfull theese amongst them : vnto whom other such lewd mates G dayly still more and more reforting, he in short time grew (as they say) to that greatnes, that he is reported to haue bin of fuch power, as neuer man but he euer yet came vnto. A matter almost incredible: for albeit that the Romane empire, yea and this great empire of the Turksalfo, with fome others, had their beginnings not much better or greater, the one vnder Romulus. and the other under Othoman; yet grew they not as on the fudden, in their times to any great lustre (neither was it possible for them of so small beginnings so to do) but by many degrees, and that in long time; every of the succeeding Princes, according to their fortunes, adding fomthing to their state, before it could be made great: whereas he (by their report) contrary to the courie of things both naturall & civil (which from their fmall beginnings grow to no no. table perfection or greatnes, but by degrees, and that in the long revolution of time) taking H his beginning of nothing, grew upon the fudden to be a burthen and terrour unto the world. Wherein our late Historiographers seem too much to have followed the report of the Turks. who by him brought low, and their kingdome almost in one battel subverted, report nothing fumply of him; but in what they may, detracting from his worthy praises, wrongfully charge him with many vntruths, not concerning his parentage onely, but epen in the course of his whole life alfo; making him (as they would have the world to beleeve) first to have beene a very abic & among men; and then for his inhumane cruelty a very monster in nature, (or as it was long before, but more truly faid of another great one much like himselfe) a lump of earth tempred with bloud. Which incredible reports concerning so great a Monarch, I list not to follow, as too full of dishonor: especially whereas others of no lesse credit than they, with far more modelty & greater probability report of him the greatest honor that may be. He was (as they & the others also say) born at Samarcand, the chiefe city of the Zag at aian Tartars, plea. fantly scituated upon the river laxartes: his father was called Zain-Cham, or as some others wil Og, Prince of the Zagataian Tattars, and of the countrey of Sachetay (sometime part of the famous kingdome of Parthia) third in descent from Zingis the great and fortunat leader of the Tartars, before in the former part of this history remembred which Og, as a Prince of a peace, able nature (accounting it no leffe honor quietly to keep the countries left him by his father. than with much trouble and no leffe danger to feeke how to inlarge the fame) long lived in most happy rest with his subjects no lesse happy than himselfe: not so much seeking after the hoording up of gold & filuer (things of that nation not regarded) as contenting himselfe with r the increase and profit of his flocks of sheep, and heards of cattell; then, and yet also, the prin. The could make cipall revenues of the Tartar Kings and Princes: which haply gave occasion to fome, ignorant of the manner and custome of those Northern nations and countries, to account them all for shepherds & heardsmen, and so also to have reported of this mighty Prince, as of a shepherds fon, or herdfman himfelfe vainly measuring his nobility by the homely manner of his people and subjects, and not by the honor of his house, and heroical vertues, such as were hardly to be found greater in any Prince of that or other former ages. His peaceable father now well stricken in yeres, and weary of the world, delivered up unto him (not yet past 25 yeres old) the gouernment of his kingdom, joyning vnto him two of his most faithfull counsellors, Odmar and Aly, to affift him in the gouernment of his flate (retiring himfelf vnto a folitary life, the more L at quiet to serue God, and so to end his dayes in peace:) which two his trusty servants & grave councellors he dearely loued whilst they lived, and much honored the remembrance of them being dead. The first proofe of his fortune & valor, was against the Muscouit, for spoyling of a city which had put it felfe under his protection, and for entring of his country, and for proclaiming of war against him: whom he in a great battel ouerthrew, having slain five and twent ty thousand of the Muscouites footmen, and between fifteen and sixteen thousand horsemen, with the losse of scarce eight thousand horsmen and foure thousand footmen of his owne. After which battell he beholding so many thousands of men there dead upon the ground, was so far from reioyeing thereat, that turning himselfe to one of his familiars, he lamented the condition of fuch as commanded ouer great armies, commending his fathers quiet course of life, M acounting him happy in feeking for rest, and the other most whappy, which by the destruction on of their owne kind, fought to procure their owne glory, protesting himselfe even from his heart to be grieued to see such sad tokens of his victory. With this ouerthrow the Muscouit discouraged, sent Embassadors to him for peace, which vpon such honourable conditions as pleased

A pleased him to set downe, was by him granted, and so the peace concluded. Now the great Cham of Tartaia (his fathers brother) being grown old, and out of hope of any mo children, mooued with the fame of his nephew, after this victory fent him divers prefents, and withall offering him his onely daughter in mariage, and with her to proclaime him heire apparant vnto his empire as in right he was, being his brothers fonne, and the daughters not at all succeeding in those empires. Which so great an offer Tamerlane gladly accepted, and so the mariage Tamerlane mawas afterwards with great triumph at the old Emperors court folemnized and he proclaimed Tile the daughheire apparant vnto that great empire. Thus was Tamerlane indeed made great, being euer af. the great cham ter this mariage by the old Emperour his vncle, and now his father in law, so long as he lived. of Tariary. notably supported, and after his death succeeding him also in that so mighty an empire. Yet in the mean time wanted not this worthy prince the enuious competitors of these his so great honors:infomuch that whilft by the aduice and perfuation of the old Emperor, be was taking in hand to make warre against the great King of China (who had as then gone far beyond his bounds) and fo was now well onwards on his way, he was by the confpiracy of Calix (a man of greatest power & authority in the great Cham his court) almost thrust out of his new empire: Calix with a right puiffant army having already seized upon the great city of Cambalu, and the citizens also generally fauouring those his traiterous proceedings, as disdaining to be gouerned by the Zagatian Tartar. For redresse whereos, Tamerlan was enforced with the greatest part of his army to returne, and meeting with the rebell (who then had in his army four efforce thousand horse, and an hundred thousand foot) in a great and mortall battell (wherein of the one fide and of the other were more than fifty thousand men slain) overthrew him (though nor without the great danger of his own person, as being ther himself beaten down to the ground) tooke him prifoner, and afterwards beheaded him. Which to dangerous a rebellion, with the death of the traytor, and the chiefe of the conspirators repressed, and his state in the newnesse therof by this victory well confirmed he proceeded in his intended war against the great king of China; brake down the strong wall, which the Chinoies had made foure hundred leagues long betwixt the mountaines, for the repressing of the incursions of the Tartars, entred their country, and meeting with the King, leading after him three hundred and fifty thousand men (whereof there were an hundred and fifty thousand horsemen, and the rest on foot) in a great and dreadful battell, with the flaughter of fixty thousand of his men, ouercame him, and took him prisoner: whom for all that he (in the course of so great a victory wisely moderating his fortune) (hortly after fet again at liberty, yet fo, as that having before taken from him the one halfe of his kingdome, and therein left Odmar his trusty lieutenant, with a sufficient power for the restraining of the proud king, if he should again begin to raise any new stire; and withall imposed such other conditions as pleased himselfe, with the yearly tribute of three hundred thousand crownes, he well prouided for the assuring of those his new conquests; and so in triumph returned with victory vnto the old Emperor his father in law at Cambalu, not a little glad to fee both him and his daughter, who had in all those wars still accompanied him. But leauing him, now thus by birth great, by his fortune greater, but by his vertue greatest of all, (as able now to draw after him almost the whole power of the East) let vs again return thither from whence we have for the better knowledge of him, thus with him digreffed.

The war against the Turkish Sultan Bajazet (as is aforefaid) by Tamerlane resoluted upon, he fent Axalla the great captain to his countrey of Sachetay (called of some Zagaty) to give beginning to the affembling of his forces from all parts ; to the end; that with the first of the spring he might set forward for the reliefe of so many distressed Princes, and the abating of the pride of forgreat and mighty a tyrant as was BajaZet. Now had Tamerlane procured from the great Tartarian Emperour, his yucle and father in law, an hundred thousand footmen, and fourescore thousand horsmen, hoping to have as many mo from Sachetay his owne countrey, befides the lords that for his honors fake would accompany him in that his fo honourable an expedition from whom he made account alfo of 50000 men more which they would bring to P him, and divers other great supplies which he expected from other places also, wherewith he doubted not well to performe what he had so honorably determined to take in hand, for the abating of the Othernan pride: for which and other fuch like, he was (as he would oftentimes fay) by God himselfe appointed to taking his leave of the old Emperor his father in law, and of the princes his wife (then left behind him for the comfort of her aged father) he departed from Cambalu towards Samarcand, the place of his birth and feat of his empire; leauing be. G hind him the forces brought from the great Emperour his vncle, to come after him to Ozare. where he had appointed the generall meeting of his army. At which time among other Princ ces that thither brought or lent their supplies, the great Muscouite being requested so to do promited to fend him fifteen thousand horse, with a certain sum of mony, and leave for his atmy to passe through so much of his territories as should be necessary; all which he afterwards performed vnto Tamerlane, being glad that he did fet vpon others, rather than on himfelfe and that fo great a preparation should fall vpon them, whose greatnes was as dreadfull and dange. rous vnto him as to any other. All the earth almost at that time being astonished at the sud den greatnes of this Othoman King, and the happy successe he had in all his wars : not the least cause that moved Tamerlane to oppose himself against him, deeming it much better to go and H fet vpon him in his new conquests, than to stay vntill he therein setled, were come neerer to him, and so should debate the quarrell within his owne empire, to his damage. A good and found resolution: first in that it tended to the destruction of the enemies country; & then, that if any thing should fall out with him otherwise than well, his countrey should not thereby receiue any such astonishment, as if the daunger were neerer or within the bowels of the same. Now in the mean time that Tamerlan lay at Samarcand, Axalla the great captaine & Tamerlan his licutenant general, had affembled all the army at Ozara. Wherof Tamerlan understanding. fent for him to Samarcand, to confer with him about the fetting forward of his army. For although he were stil acompanied with great renowned Princes, yet were they no body in comparison of Axalla, whose sound counsell had woon him such credit with his Lord & master, as I by his aduice he did all things, and without him nothing : which his fo great authority & fauor with his Prince, wanted not the enuy of the court, but that his great vertues, and rare found courtefie (in fo great fortune) together with fo many worthy feruices as he had done supported him against the malice of the same. He by the commandement of Tamerlane, leaving the charge of the army at Ozara, with the prince of Thanais, another of Tamerlanes great captains, came himselse to Samarcand, and there at large discoursed with him, about the estate and order of his army. And shortly after, departing with Axalla and the rest from Samarcand, for to go to Ozara the place where all his army met, being come thither, entred into a great confultation with his most expert captains, about the taking of his journy, and conducting of his army:as whether it were better to lead the same by the coasts of the Muscouit directly towards & Capha, or els on the other fide of the Caspian sea, by the skirts of Persia: where after long difcourfe, and fundry opinions with their reasons delivered, it was resolved (although the way were the longer) to passe by the Muscouit, so to come to the Georgians, 8t to Trebizonda, and from thence to enter into the Othoman King his countrey. And fo letting forward from Ozara, he came at length to Maranis, where he stayed three days looking for the forces which Printe Odmar (hould fend him from China, not long before by him conquered; whereof he therere ceited newes, and there caused his army to be paid, and a general muster thereof to be taken He had also there news of the aid the Muscouit did fend him; and caused an infinite quantity of viduals, & most part of his furniture to be conneied by the Caspian sea, being agreed only modity and eafe to his army, which marching by land, was of necessity to passe some twenty L leagues through places deflitute both of victuals and water. Tamerline all the way coaffing along the fea shore, passed the time in hunting, his army not comming neer him by so leagues which was fo great, that it extended it felfe full twenty leagues. Comming to the ther units del, he flayed at Zarazich whilest his army passed the riner at Mechet, and two other bridge which he had caused to be made for that purpose. Now the Circassans & Georgians, bearing of the approch of Tamerlane with his huge army, by their embaffadors offred trias all the before and affistance they could, in his journey as he passed that way. These Georgians were and yet are Christians, a great and warlike people, of long time tributaries vnto the Greek dasposite and afterwards somtimes tributaries, & sometimes confederats unto the Persiane but alwaits enemies vnto the Turks, by whom of late (and in our remembrance) but effecially by stampad !! the third, they together with some part of the Persian kingdome, have bin grieuous brought led, as in the processe of this history may appeare. Of these warlike people was and the processe of the processes of the proceses of the processes of the processes of the processes of the proc his comming for the repressing of the Turk, Axalla drew great numbers which thinke of the Prince:who not a little offeemed of them, being all tall men, very beautifulliof according to

and courage, and withall most expert soldiers; as having oftentimes resisted the power of the Othoman Kings, by reason of the advantage their countrey affordeth them, being very rough and hard to come into. By these kind people, Tamerlane was in cuery place honorably entertained and his great army with all necessaries plentifully relieved. In passing through which country, and the rest as he marched, he took such order with his soldiers, that none of the prople whereby he passed, were any thing by them injuried; insomuch that if a soldier had taken but an apple, or other thing of like value from any man, he died therefore, fo scuere were his commands. It is reported that one of his foldiers, having taken a little milke from a country woman, and the thereof complaining, he caused the said soldier to be presently killed, and his flomacke to be ript, where the milke that he had of late drunk being found, he contented the woman, and so sent heraway; who had otherwise vndoubtedly died for her false accusation, had it not so appeared. Which his so great seuerity, and in other like cases, was of many accounted for extream cruelty: yet was it indeed the wholfom preservation of his army, being fo great as that it was thought almost impossible to have found sufficient victuals for the reliefe thereof: whereof for all that, there was no want, either of any thing elfe necessary for the vicof man, his camp being still as a most populous and well governed city, stored with all maner of things: whereunto both artificers and merchants, from far countries reforted with their commodities & merchandife, as to some famous mart; and the country people, without feare. from every place brought in their country commodities, for which they received present money, and foin fafety again departed. So marching on, he at length came to Bachichich where he staid to refresh his army eight daies, and there again took a generall muster therof, wherein were found(as most write) foure hundred thousand horse, and six hundred thousand foot, or as The number of fome others that were there present affirme, three hundred thousand horsemen, and fine hun-great ermy. dred thousand foot of all nations. Vnto whom he there gaue a generall pay, and as his manner was.made vnto them an oration, informing them of fuch orders as he would have kept, to the end they might the better observe the same: with much other military discipline, whereof he was very curious with his captaines. At which time also, it was lawfull for enery common foldier to behold him with more boldnes than on other daies, forasmuch as he did for that time. and such like lay aside his imperial maiesty, and shew himselfe more familiar vnto them.

Now could he hardly be perfuaded, that Bajazet having fubdued the most part of Grecia. n distreffed the Greeke Emperour, and so great means to recouer what source he should lote in Asia, would be so aduenturous as to come ouer the streits out of Europe, to try the fortune of a battell with him ; but warily rather protract the time, to weary him at length with wants. that in a strange country drew such a world a people after him. Wherein he found himselse much deceiued: for having passed the Georgian country, and being come to Buysabuich, dxalla (whom he had not seene in eight dayes before because he led the head of the army) came vnto him with fuch news as he knew would be right welcome vnto him: which was, that Baja-Res had raised his siege of Constantinople (as indeed he had) for to come and desend his new conquests in Assaud that he was certainly resoluted, to come to a day of battell, not so much trusting vnto the multitude of his army, as to the valour and experience of his foldiers, being men of long well trained up in the wars. At which vnexpected newes, Tamerlane greatly rejoyced: yet without infolency or vaunting, but rather with the countenance of such a one as iudged the euents of battell to be (as they are) alwayes doubtfull: faying fometimes, that a fmall number well conducted, did oftentimes carry away the victory from the confused multitude. Three dayes he stayed at Buysabuich, and caused his souldiers continually to march forward, which at Garga and Chiuserig passed ouer the river Euphrates: which he did the rather to maintaine his army vpon the spoyle of the enemy, in attending his comming, than vpon himselfe, or his allies. All the cities that yeelded unto him by the way as he marched, he fauourably received the other that refused to submit themselves to his obedience, he vied with all extremity: specially the great and strong city of Sebastia, where certain of the forerunners of his army were by the Turks there in garrison cut off and slaine, and the gates of the city as it were in contempt of him, set wide open : wherewith Tamerlane offended, sent out certaine of his Tarrarian horsemen, commanding them on paine of his displeasure, so to beare themsclues against their enemies, as that he might at his comming either find the city taken, or the gates thereof thut against him: for he had his men at logreat command, that no danger was

Now the Turks in garrifon at Sebastia, seeing these Tartarian horsemen marching towards the City, making little account of them, for that they were not in number many, islued out for to meet them; where they were fo furiously charged by these few horsemen, that they were glad to retire, and for haft to thut part of their owne men out of the city, leaft the enemy following them at their heeles, should have entred the gates together with them, Which Turkes so shut out. were by the Tartarians flaincat the gates of the city. But about the eight day, the walls and towers of the city in many places vadermined, were fuddenly overthrowne, leaving large breaches for the enemy to enter. Wherewith the Turkes in the city difmayed, forthwith yeelded the city to Tamerlane, in hope to to have faued their lives : but hee (as the Turks report) being entred the City, commanded a great number of deepe pits to be digged, and all the people of the City, without refpect of age, fex, or condition, to be throwne into the fame, and there buried quick. Which done, the City was by his dommandement etterly rafed also. After that, calling vnto him Midden (int, the Gouernour of the City, whom he had for that purpose only spared, he com. I manded him togo and tell his Master what was happened to his strong City of Sebastia, and what he had there himselfe seene. Of which tragicall action, Malcozzim having made true relation vnto Bajasa, was by him demanded, whether of the two armies he thought bigger or fironger: for now Baja7et had affembled a mighty army of three hundred thouland men, or as some report of three hundred thousand horsmen, and two hundred thousand foot. Whereunto Males 7 im having before craved pardon, answered, That it could not be, but that Tameriane might in reason have the greater number, for that he was a Commander of farre greater countries. Wherewith proud Bajazer offended, in great choller replyed, Out of doubt, the fight of the Tarrarian hath made this coward to afraid, that he thinketh every enemy to be two.

As also that Baja (er there loft his eldeft fon Erthogral (of some called Orthobales) whose death with the loss of the city, so much grieved him (as it is reported) that marching with his great army against Tamentane, and by the way hearing a country shepheard merrity reposing himfelfewith his homely pipe, as he face upon the fide of a mountaine feeding his poore flocke; flanding ftill a great while liftning vnto him, to the great admiration of many, at last fetching a deep figh, brake forth into these words : O happy the pheard, which haddest neither orthebules not Sebassia to lose: bewraving therein his owned is contentment a and yet with. Howbeit the Turkes themselves reporting the taking of Sebastia, speake not of Orshebides at all, but give him loft fix yeares before, in the warres against Casi Barcanides, and Iyeth buried by his father at Prufa. In this City of Schaftia was loft twelve thouland Turkes, mon, weinen and children, at their Histories report. The reft of the Cities all the way as Tamerlane marched, warned by the definition of Sebaffia, veelded themselves for feare of like danger: the citifens whereof he courteoutly vied, specially the Christians, whom he fet at liberty, in respect of Smennel the Greeke Emperour, whom he formed wholly therein to gratifie. But hee had not done farre into the Turk's dominion, but that he was certainly advertised, how that M Beimer with a great army was comming against himsend now within thirty leagues of him: which caused him after that time, to march with his army more closely. Analla leading the Vantgard, sent forth Chianfin Prince of Ciarchan, with four thousand Parthian borsemen, to get knowledge of the Turks army, and where Bajaset lay, as also what country that

Wherfore he pretent-Ir fent for dralla, with him to view the faid place, and to have his opinion, Whether it would be for his advantage or not, there to flay, who not milliking of the choice of the place, yet admiled him also to keepe Sennas so long as he possibly could and so fent word vnto them that were therein vpon the approch of the enemy to fet fire vpon the fame, and fo to withdraw themistings from thence, to the end that the enemy should not have any desire to incampe there but come ftil farward neere to those plains where Tamerlane defired to fight, especially forthit howas stronger in horse than BajaZet. Thus the Turks still marching on, thought to have interifed some of their enemies in Sennas, who as soon as they drew neere, retired all, excepting fome hundred left of purpose to fire the town : who having performed the same, retired of purpole in great diforder. Now the Prince of Ciarcan had divided his forces into two The Prince of partials given commandment to the first, that as soon as they perceived the enemies to pursue Circumstaleis the hundred horse that so disorderly of purpose fled, they should receive them, and so retyre the fortuners. all coceehers He in the mean time with the reft of his power flood close in a valley, neere to a of the Turkes wood fide vales all Where having suffered 2000 of the enemies horse (the vantourriers of the Turks army) to passe by him, he following them in the taile, charg'd them home, the other which before retired, now turning upon them alfo: fo that the Turk's feeing themselues thus befersed hardly laid vnto both before and behind, as men discouraged fled in which flight most of them were flain, and the rest taken prisoners. This was the first encounter betwixt the Turks and the Parthians; all the prifoners there taken, were by the Prince as a prefent fent to Tameramong the rest the Bassa of Natolia who led these troups: of whom Tamerlane carnestly demanded, what caused Bujaget so little to esteeme of him, as to shew so great contempt of his army, which he should find strong enough to abate his pride. Wherunto the Bassa answeand That his lord was the Sun vpon earth, which could not endure any equall; and that he rather was allowed to fee, how he from fo far had enterprifed fo dangerous a journy, to hinder the loring of his lord in whose fauor the heavens (as he said) did bend themselves to further his greatnes, and varow hom all the world subjected it selfe, and that he committed great sol-Ingoing about to telift the same. Vnto which so proud a speech Tamerlane replied, That he with fent from heaten to punish his rashnesse, & to teach him, that the proud are hated of God, whole promise is coplucke downe the mighty and raise up the lowly. ferue against himselfe. Whereunto Bajazet answered no more, but that he would shortly make triall of him, and that he well hoped before the march were ended, to make him acknowledge his owne folly. The next day the two armies drew necre together, and incamped within a league the one of the other:where all the night long you might have heard fuch noyfe of horfes. as that it feemed the heavens were full of voyces, the aire did fo refound, and every man thought the night long to come to the triall of his valor, and the gaining of his defires. The Scythians (a people no leffe greedy than needy) talked of nothing but the fpoile, the proud Parthians of their honor, and the poore Christians of their deliverance, all to be gained by the next days victorvieuery man during the night time speaking according to his owne humour All which Tamerlane walking this night up and down in the camp heard, and much rejoiced to fee the hope that his foldiers had already in generall conceived of thevictory. Who after the fecond watch returning vnto his paulion, & there casting himself vpon a carpet, had thought to have flept a while but his cares not fuffring him fo to do, he then, as his manner was, called for a booke, wherein was contained the lines of his fathers and ancestors, and of other valiant worthies, the which he yied ordinarily to read, as he then did:not as therwith vainly to deceive the time but to make vie thereof, by the imitation of that which was by them worthily done. & declining of fuch dangers as they by their rathnes or overfight fell into. And afterwards hauing a little flumbred, he commanded Analla to be fent for, who forthwith came to him, with diners other great lords and captains the chiefe commanders of his army: with whom after he had a while confulted of the order of the battell, he mounted on horsebacke himselfe, & fent cuery one of them to their own charges, to put the same in readines. At which very instant he received news, that the enemy marched forward, and came to take his ground for the battell: whose order of march Tamerlane was desirous to see, that so accordingly he might marshal his own. And having caused 3000 horsemen to advance forward, with charge to begin the skirmith, himselfe followed after to lodge enery part of his forces in such places as he had force feen to be fittest for his advantage. Now feeing the Janizaries march in a square battell in the midst, and voon the two fronts two great squadrons of horsemen, which seemed to be thirty thousand horse; and another which advanced and covered the battalion of the Ianizaries; he thought this their order to be very good, and hard to be broken; and thereupon turning himfelie to Axalla, who was neere vnto him, faid, I had thought this day to have fought on foot, but I fee that it behoueth menow to fight on horsebacke, to give courage vntomy souldiers, k to open the great battalion of our enemies. And my will is, that my men come forward vnro me as foon as they may, for I will advance forward with an hundred thousand footmen, fifty thousand upon each of my two wings, and in the middest of them forty thousand of my best horsemen. My pleasure is, that after they have tried the force of these men, that they come vn. to my avaunt gard, of whom I will dispose, & fifty thousand horse more in three bodies, whom thou shalt command: which I will assist with 80000 horse, wherein shall be mine own person: having 100000 footmen behind me, who shall march in two squadrons; and for my are reward I appoint 40000 horse, and 50000 footmen, who shall not march but to my aid. And I will make choice of 10000 of my best horse, whom I will send into every place where I shall thinke needfull within my army, for to impart my commands. Over the first forty thousand I horse the Prince Ciarcan commanded ouer the formost footmen was the Lord Synopes a Ge. nouois.kinfman to Analla and his lieutenant ouer the footmen, a captain of great estimation: The great and the Prince Analla his owne charge confifted of five foundrons of horfemen. Bajazet his army merial batter being also both faire and great, came brauely still on forwards towards their enemies, who re and ramer firred not one whit from the place they had taken for the battell : except certain light horfemon, Scythians, Parthians, and Muscouits, who sent out as loose men, hotly skirmished betwist the two armies. Now was Tamerlane by an efpic aductifed, that Bajazet having before given order for the disposing of his army, was on foot in the midst of thirty thousand lanizaries, his principall men of war, and greatest strength, wherein he meant that day to fight, and in whom he had reposed his greatest hope. His battell of horse was very faire, amounting to M the number of a hundred and forty thousand, all old fouldiers. The Sultan of Agypt hauing also sent vnto his aid thirty thousand Mamalukes, all very good horsemen, with thirty thousand foot. So that his army marching all in one front, in former of an halfe-Moone (but nor to well knie together as was Tamerlanes, whose squadrons directly followed one another)

This hard fight continued one hower, and yet you could not have feene any fersteted, but the one still resolutely fighting against the other. You might there have feene the horsemen like mountaines rush together, and infinite numbers of men die, cry. language and threaten allagone instant. Tamerlane had patience all this while, to fee the event of this for morrell a fightabut perceiving his men at length to give ground, he fent ten thousand of his horseto joyne againe with the ten thousand appointed for the arcreward, and commaned them to affile him at fuch time as he should have need of them, and at the very same time charged himself, and made them to give him roome; causing the footmen to charge also, ones hom the Reince of Thanais commanded, who gauge furious onfet you the battalion of the Lanizacies, wherein was yet the person of Bajazes, who had sustained a great burden. Now Rejecte hadita his authy a great number of mercenary Tartars, called Deftenfes, with many thousads of other sould iers taken up in the countries of the poore exiled Mahometane Prinowin who feiuft quarrell, and the Greeke Emperours, Tamerlane had chiefly undertaken that warniefe Tartarians and other foldiers, feeing fome their friends, and other fome their naturall and lowing Princes in the army of Tamerlane; fitticken with the terror of difloyaltie, and sphorting the cruelty of the proud tyrant, in the heat of the battell revolted from BajaZet to their owne Princes which their revolt much weakned Bajagets forces. Who neuertheleffe, D withhis owne men of warre, especially the Ianizaries, and the helpe of the Christian foldiers brought comis aid from Seruia & other places of Europe, with great courage maintained the fightbut the multitude, and not true valor, prevailed, for, as much as might be done by valiant and couragious men, was by the Ianizaries and the rest performed, both for the preservation of the person of their Prince, and the gaining of the victory. But in the end the horsemen with whom Tamerlane himselfe was, giving a fresh charge, and his avauntgard wholly knit again vnto him, tesinforcing the charge, he with much adoe obtained the victory. Bajac et himselfe the Turker wounded and now mounted on horsebacke, thinking to have escaped by flight, sell into the outsilinous at hands of analla: votes whom he yeelded him felfe, thinking it had bin Tamerlane: who for a space know him not but took him for some other great commander of the Turks. Musa (firma Bajaget and but med Zelebi, on the Noble) one of Bajazet his fons, with divers others of Bajazet his great cap- John Mafa taker taines, were there taken alforand among it the reft, George the Despot of Seruia, who notwith. fraiding this misfortune, had that day gained vnto himfelf the reputation of a great and worthy captaing in somuch that Tamerlane cuen in the very heat of the battell maruelled to see him and the Serbians, with the other Christians which he had brought to the aid of Bajazet, fo valiantly to fight, faid unto some of the captaines that were necre unto him, See how couragionly youder Religious fight : supposing them by their strange attire to have beene some of the Tutia Superstitious votaries. But being now taken, and afterwards brought to Tamerlane, he was by him courteoully welcommed but yet withall reproued, for that he had fought for against him, who was come in fauor of the Christian Emperour, and the other poore oppressed Princes, fisch as the Despot himselse was. Who thereunto boldly answered, That idead is was not according to his duty, but according to the prosperity of Rajazet, vnto whom is feemed that all the world did bend : and that his own fafety had caufed him, though Mainst his will, to take pare with him. Whereupon Tamerlane held him excused; and so without more ado gaue him leane at his owne pleasure to depart.

BajaZet alfo himfelf being afterwards brought vnto Tamerlane as a priffoner and by him cur. G teoutly entertained, neuer thewed any token of fubmiffion at all, but according to his proud nature, without respect of his present state, presumptuouslyanswered him vitto whatsoever he demanded. Wherewith Tamerlane mound, told him, Thank was now in his power to make him to lose his life. Whereunto he answered no more but, Doe is forthat that loffe should be his greatest happines. Tamerlane afterwards demanding of him What made him fo proud. as to enterprise to bring into his subjection so moble a Prince as was the Grecke Emperour he answered, Euen the same thing that hath moued thee to inuade me; namely the defite of glory and foueraignty. But wherefore then (faid Tamerlane) doft thou vie fo great crueltie towards them thou haft ouercome, without respect of age or fex? That did I (faid he) to give the greater terror vnto my enemies, And what wouldft thou have done with me flaid Tamer. H lane) had it bin my fortune to have fallen into thy handa as thou are now in mine? I would (faid Bajanet) have inclosed thee in a cage of yron, and so in triumph have carried thee up & down my kingdome. Euen fo(faid Tamerlane) thate thou be felued. And fo causing him to be taken out of his presence, turning vnto his followers; said, Behold a proud and cruell man, be deferueth to be chastisfed accordingly, and to be made an example to all the proud and cruell of the world of the just wrath of God against them. I acknowledge, that God hath this day deliuered into my hands a great enemy, to whom we must therefore give thanks. Which he performed the same days for the battell was won as fourcof the clocke, and there was yet five houres of day light. The next day Tamerlane commanded the dead to be buried, where among the rest they found the body of the Prince of Ciarcan, dead in the middest of the Janizaries; I where he lay inclosed with their dead bodies, in token he died not vnreuenged whose vntimely death Tamerlane for all that greatly lamented, for he was his kinfman, and like enough one day to have done great service. Whose dead body Tamerlane caused to be imbalmed, and with two thouland horse (and divers of the Turks prisoners chained and tied together) to be conneyed to Samercand, untill his comming thicker. All the other dead bodies were with all honour that might be, buried at Sennas.

This great bloudy battell fought in the yaere of our Lord 1397, not far from the Mount Stella, (where fometime the great King Mithradates was by Pompey the great in a great battell ouerthrown) was fought from feuen a clocke in the morning, vntill foure in the afternoone: vi-Gory all that while as it were with doubtfull wings, houering ouer both armies, as uncertaine K where to light, vntill at length the fortune of Tamerlane prevailed. Whose wisedome, next vn. to God, gaue that daies victory vnto his fouldiers : for that the politicke tyring of the strong forces of BajaZet, was the fafegard of his own; whereas if he had gone unto the battell in one front, assuredly the multitude finding such strong resistance, had put it selfe into consusion: whereas this fuccessing manner of aiding of his men, made them all vnto him profitable. The number of them that were in this battel slaine, is of divers diversly reported the Turks themfelues reporting, That Bajazet there loft the noble Muflapha his fon, with two hundred thoufand of his men, and Tamerlane not many fewer : and fome other speaking of a far leffe number, as that there should be staine of the Turks about threescore thousand, and of Tamerlane his army not past twenty thousand. But leaving the certainty of the number vnto the credit L of the reporters, like enough it is, that the flaughter was exceeding great in fo long a fight, betwixt two fuch armies as neuer before (as I suppose) met in field together.

By this one days event is plainly to be seen the uncertainty of worldly things, & what small assurance even the greatest have in them. Behold, Bajaxet the terrour of the world, and as he thought, superior to fortune, in an instant with his state in one battell overthrown into the bottom of mifery & despaire; and that at such time as he thought least, even in the middest of his greatest strength. It was three days (as some report) before he could be pacified, but as a desperat man stil sceking after death, & calling for it:neither did Tamerlane after he had once spoken with him, at all afterwards curteously vie him, but as of a proud man caused small account to be made of him: And to manifest that he knew how to punish the haughty, made him to be M adequille a shackled in fetters and chains of gold, and so to be shut up in an yron cage made like a grate, in fuch fort as that he might on every fide be feen; and fo carried him vp and downe as he paffed thorow Asia; to be of his own people scorned and derided. And to his further disgrace, vpon festivall daies vsed him for a footstoole to tread upon, when he mounted to horse; and at other times (tentifelly fed him like a dog, with crums fallen from his table. A rare example of the the character worldly honour, that he vnto whose ambitious mind Asia and Europe, two in a and Europe, two lesewith the like tome perillous wild beatt. All which Tamerlane did not fo much for the hand to the many as to manifelt the just judgement of God against the arrogant folly of the provide Measured That Tamerlane being requested by one of the Noblemen that might be bold to felicie batch him, to remit fome part of his feuerity against the person of so great a Prince: allowed, That he did not we that rigor against him as a King, but rather did punish him significant ambitions tyrent, polluted with the bloud of his owne brother.

Now the logreat an overthrow brought fuch a feare vpon all the Countries possessed by Balate liberta, that Analia fent before by Tamerlane with 40000 horfe, and 100000 foot, transfer carriages, to prolecute the victory, came without refistance to Prufa, whither all the remainder of Bejacet his army was retired, with the Bassa Mustapha: the country as he went fill weelding who hier Yea, the great Baffa with the reft hearing of his comming, and thinhing the tale wes not now in any fafety in Afia, fled ouer the fireit of Hellespontus to Callipolis and free Hadrianople; carrying with them out of the battell, Solyman, Bajazet his eldeft solyman fer up toping short they fer sp in his fathers place: Mahome his younger brother prefently upon the fit fathers merilace being fled to Amasia; of whom, and the rest of Bajazet his children, more shall be fall bees fire. And a comming to Prufa, had the city without refiftance yeelded vnto him, Prufa talen by sich berified; and there with other of Baja (et his wives and concubins, tooke prifoner the

For intelligibled a most populous and well gouerned city, for the order that was therin, which broughs with it pleney of all kind of victuals and other merchandife, as well for pleafure as for vier By the Embaffadors the Greeke Emperor fubmitted all his empire, together with his person part land the great conqueror, as his most faithfull subject and vasfall : which he wasbound the he faid) sodo, for that he was by him deliucred from the most cruell tyrant of D the worldme also for that the long journy he had passed, and the discommodities he had induand with the loffe of his people and the danger of his person, could cot be recompensed but by the offer of his own tife and his subjects; which he did for ever dedicate vnto his service, with all the adelity and loyalty that fo great a benefit might deserue : besides that, his so ma. by vertues & rare accomplishments, which made him famous thorow the world, did bind him forodo Andrhar the fore he would attend him in his chiefe city, to deliuer it into his hands as his own with all the Binpire of Greece. Now the Greeke Embassadors looked for no lesse then to fall into boddige to Tamerlane; thinking that which they offered to be fogreat and delicare a molfell, is that it would not be refused, especially of such a conquering Prince as was Therefile jand that the acceptance thereof in kindnesse and friendship, was the best bargaine B they could make therein. But they received answer from this worthy Prince, farre beyond their repectations for he with a mild countenance beholding them, answered them, That he warnog come from fo fir a country, or undertaken fo much paines, for the inlargement of his deminions already large enough, (too base a thing for him to put himselfe into so great danger and transell for) but rather to win honour, and thereby to make his name famous vnto all polarity for ever! And that therefore it should well appeare vnto the world, that he was come waid hate being requested as his friend and allie : and that his vpright meaning therein was the greatest cause, thise God from aboue had beheld his power, and thereby bruised the head of the greatest and sercest enemy of mankind that was under heaven; and now to get him an antionall name, would make free fo great and flourishing a City as was Constantinople, go-B nemed by to noble and antient an House as the Emperors : That unto his courage he had al-Ways falth joyned fuch as should never suffer him to make so great a breach in his reputation, the is should be reported of him, That in the colour of a friend he came to inuade the Dohistorical his allies. That he delited no more, but that the feruice he had done for the Greeke Ripperer, might for ever be ingraven in the memory of his posterity, to the end they might

for euer wish well vnto him and his successors, by remembring the good he had done them; G That long might the noble Emperour live, happily to governe his estate; and that before his returne he would so well consider for the establishing of the same, as that he should not light. ly fall againe into the like jeopardy, alwaies affuring himfelfe of his good will and fauour towards him. Easie it is to judgewhat joy these Greeke Embassadors received, so heare this so kinde an answer from the mouth of Tamerlane, himselfe; who rather than be would seeme to breake his faith, refused an empire offered vinto him, with one of the most stately and magnificent cities of the word. Few Princes (I suppose) would performe such a part : but so there be likewise but sew Tamerlanes in the world. These Embassadors by the command of Tamer. tane, were by Axalla royally feafted, and all the honour done them that might be. One of them being sent backe to carry these vnexpected news unto the Greeke Emperor, filled both H him and all the city of Constantinople with exceeding joy and gladnesse, which both he and his subjects in general spared nor with bonfires and all other signes of joy and pleasure to manifest. And the more to shew his thankfulnesse, shortly after by the advice of his grave Coun. cellon, paffed ouer the ftreit into Afia, to fee Tamerlane at Brula, and in person himselfe to give him thanks : who hearing of his comming, and very glad thereof, prefently vpon the first daies journy fent the Prince Axalla to meet him, and to certific him of the joy that he conceiued to haue the good hap for so fee him, as also to conduct him to Prusawhere those two great princes, with the greatest magnificence that might be, met, and so spent one whole day together. The Greeke Emperor the next day taking his leaue, was by Tamerlane with much honor conducted out of the city. Now had Tamerlane himfelfe conceiued a fecret defire to fee this fo famous a city as was Constantinople, from which he was not now farre, yet would he not goe thicher as a conqueror, but as a privat person which by the meanes of Axalla was accomplified, and he thereinto by the Greeke Emperor prinarly received, and with all familiarity pollible, entertained; the Emperor flewing vnto him all the rare and excellent things that were therein to be seemand the other Greeke Princes denising all the means they could to do him pleasure, and them which did accompany him , who were in a manner all apparelled after the Greeke fashion. At which time the Greeke Emperour himselfe was curious to shew voto him all the faire gardens along ft. the fea coaft, a league or two from Goaftantinople, and to priuatly conducting him, fpent fine or fix daies with all the mirth that might be possible, Tamer. Imerians much lame by the way oftentimes faying, That he had never (een a fairer city; and that it was indeed K dilighted with the city (confidering the faire and rich scituation thereof) of right, worthy to command at the the product of companies of the wondred at the costly buildings of the temples, the faire ingraven pillers, the high piramides, & the making of the faire gardens, and oftentimes afterwards faid, That he nothing repented him of his fo long, and dangerous a voyage, if it had bin only but to have preserved from five & fword fo notable a city as that was. In the Greeke Emperor he commended greatly his mild nature and curtofie who knowing him about althings to take pleafure in faire feruiceable horfes, gaue voto him thirty of the faireft, firongest, and readiest, that were possible so be gotten, all most richly furnished, and sent likewise faire Presents unto all the Princes and great Commanders of the army, and bountifully caused to be delinered varo them all things which he shought to be necessary for the army. So after many great kindenesses in short time L paffed, and a fireit bond of friendship made, and by solemne oath confirmed by these two great Princes, Tamerlane with great contentment tooke his leave of the Emperor, and returned againe to his army at Prufa. Wherewith he now at his pleasure without resistance wasted and spoyled all Bajazet his dominion in Asia, no man daring to make head against him.

The yere being now well spent, and Winter drawing on, Tamerlane dispersed his army into divers of the Provinces of the lesser Asia, expecting still when some of BajaCet his sonnes or other friends should make suit or meanes unto him for his deliuerance, but none came : some fearing Tamerlane his heavy indignation, and others no leffe dreading the fierce nature of Bais a himfelfe, who if he had beene deliucted, was like enough (as was thought) to have taken tharp revenge voon all them which for fooke him in the late battell; and ther for eneuer made M intercession for him. Whereupon Tamerlane one day passing by him, faid vnto him, I maruell that none of thy fons or friends either come to fee thee, or to intreat for thee, it must need be that thou halt cuill deferued of them, as thou halt of othersizet how thinkest thou, if I should fee thee at liberty, would they againe receive, thee as their Lord and Soucraigne, or not ? dubis prest and bloudy war, wherein the Othoman Empire had almost taken end, the Sulsmootheype had (as is aforefaid) given aid vnto Bajazet : which Tamerlane tooke info cuill and the refolued to be therot revenged: for as he was vnto his friends of all others moth mont fo was he to his enemies no leffe terrible and dreadfull. Yet thinking it good before he departure out of the lefter Afia, to take fome good order with the fe his new conmestizated finding nothing more honorable to refolue vpon, he restored vnto the poore Ma-Toman Princes (Tabretin, Isfendiar, Germean, and the reft before fled unto him for refuge) all Greeke Emperour, for the yearely tribute of foure hundred thousand duehattofgold, and eight hundred thousand franks of filuer, which the Emperous promised to in the first with year and fo having inriched his army with the spoiles of the Othoman Empire in the Aliche turned his forces against the Egyptian Sultan, and so passing thorow Catamamidde an red into Sgritz, then part of the Sultans kingdome: where neere vnto Aleppo(being More veelded anto him) was fought betwixt them a great & mortal battel, the Sultan having A gotat battel is his artist any hundred thousand foot, and seuenty source thousand horse; whereof there were sugar because the Sultan of the world. cuen as the pilgrimes doe: and comming to the sepulchte, gaue thereunto, and the deuout G there, many rich and precious gifts, to the great contentment of all men (to fee him honour those holy places) but of the Iewes only, who greatly blamed him for fodoing : of whom of all others, Tamerlane made no reckoning, but called them the accursed of God. There had he news that the Sultan had gathered all his forces, and being come into Agypt, was there fortifying of hiscities, especially the great cities of Alexandria and Caier. Tamerlane his army in the mean time by his commandment came towards Ægypt to Damiatewhich firong city he thought not good to leave behind him, although he was by some persuaded so to do, for that it was thought impregnable, as well in respect of the castle, as of the strong garrison that the Sultan had put thereinto; but he whole fortune nothing could hinder, would needs go this ther: and fo having commanded Analla to fet vpon it, followed himfelfe after with the reft H of his army. Now Axalla having furnmoned the city, and declared vnto the inhabitants (who were most of them Christians) the mildnesse and courteste of Tamerlane, as also who himselfe was, and what religion he held : cauting many of the Greeke captaines to speake vnto them. and to tell thom of the mifery they indured under the Moores and Mamalukes : fo farre preuailed with them, that they all determined to aduenture their liues, to put the Mamalukes out of the city, with all them that feuoured the Sultan. And fo in the night taking vp armes. Demiata takes made themselves master of one quarter of the city, and delivered one of the gates to Axalla: wereby beentering, put all the Mamalukes to the fword, or tooke them priloners, and fo gained the city. Whereof Tamerlane hearing, being as yet vpon his march, was in good hope of fo prosperous a beginning, to find an happy end also of his designes in Ægypt. For besides the good fortune thereof, he knew that this hauen of Damiata might ferue him with victuals out of all the parts of Greece, as the Emperor Emanuel had promifed him, and wherein he no. thing failed him. Into which port Tameriane having made his enery; left there in garrifon two thouland of the Emperous Enfantel his fouldiers, with a governour, of whom he tooke an oath for their obedience. So having flated a space at Damiasa, he caused his vaunt gard to march towards Alexandria; and having passed over the river, even in an anstant turned directly vnto Caire, to the great aftonishment of the Bultan, who made provision for the defence of Alexandria, as the necrest vite danger. But vider fanding of these news, yeld such diffigence, that he entered into the city with forty thousand horse, and threescore thousand soot; even as Ties merlane his army approached, purposing in person himselfe to defend it. By whose comming k the great city ready before to have revolted, was againer in his obedience confirmed, to the great hinderance of Tamerlane his affaires: for to remaine long before it, was impossible, for want of victuals for fo great an army in the enemies Country. Yet notwithstanding all this, did not Tamerlane forbeare to draw neere vntoit, and with all his army to encampe neere vnto the same, having caused a great trench to be made for to couer his horsemen, and thereby to lodge his army more fafely during which time he caused divers onsets to be given, as well to try what confidence the enemy had in himfelfe, as to fee how the people of the City, especially the slaues (which in that populous city are infinite) were affected towards him; who certainely informed of the flate of the City, and the army , as glad to fee the same by him thut up, and the proud Mamalukes still put to the worst. But thus lying still at the siege, L one day he thought it good to show his army before the City, to try whether the enemy had a defire to come to a day of battell or not : as also to view what forces he had, and so indeed to fecke occasion to fight: in hope also, that if the Sultan did come forth with all his army into the field, some revolt might happen within the city, as well by the slaves (vnto whom liberty was by him promised) as by the citizens themselves (discontented with the insolencie of the Mamalukes entered of late into the city with the Sultan) who whom he had made it knowne by certaine flaues (for that purpose fled as fugitiues out of his army into the City) how that hee was not some to hurt them, but onely for the destruction of the Mamalukes, both his and there enemies. But betimes standing so in battell array, no man come forth, neither was there any tumult or firre raifed in the city, as he had expected. For the Sultan M in so great a City well prouided of all things, was resolved to weary him out with lying still, and not to put all to the hazard of a battell. Which Tamerlane perceiting, and fet downe not to depart from thence but victorious, refolued likewife to force him cuen in his greatest strength, in the heart of his greatest City; although it were not to be done, but with great add neutrolists confidence he had in the ftrength & multitude of his army. Now his purpose Atheredition of the etties (for Caire is divided into three) & therin incamping himfelf, by the left inde roaduance forward as he might, ftil fighting with the enemy. Vpon which rehisotherenmanded an affault to be given, and having brought his footmen to the place Caire effect there the would have them to give the onfer (for the city was not walled, but onely fortified by Tamellane, cit distant to renother he commanded the Prince of Thanais with fifty thousand footmen, which he most valiantly performed, and in the first and the ind care light. Axallain the mean time, decring (as the truth was) the Sulan had driven his greatest forces to the place where the Prince of Thanais fought to independ the a place of greatest danger; fee a compasse about, and vpon another quarter of B and any elite fem lite attance paffed the treaches; where he prefently left thirty thousand men confiling the ditches and to make way for the horfemen to enter; advancing forward himfelfe, west thousand fent by the Sultan to have Ropt his further passage: the Prince of Thereibbeing atthat fathe time almost beaten backe by the Mamalukes. But the way being made plaintly show that were for that purpose left by Axalla, and ten thousand horse entred, shich engel poor the backes of the Mamalukes, where the Sultan himselfe was; and they fecodded wish ten choosend too feat in by Tamerlane, following himself after, with al his powwith Shikad retired varus second trength, which he had made in the next city. The fight inched full the foare of feuen houres, wherein where flain of the Sultan his men about fixteen woulend and of Tandows betwirt feuen and eight thousand. Who contented to have dif-C ladged the enemy; and gained a third part of the city, caused a retreat to be sounded, in hope the next day kow in all she reft; as indeed he did. For the Prince of Thanais the next day forcide the effemiles trenebes in one place, and Axalla in another, the Sultan after a great fight finding himfelfe hardly preffed by the obstinat enemy, and too weake long to hold out, retired, and so foothwith abandoned the city, & encamped himselfe along the fide of the river Nilus, with ourseleto passe the fame, and to Hy to Alexandria his second strength & refuge. Which Twenterstill peding, followed after him with his horfemen (who onely were in order) and fone for forthardly drawne from the city, which their fellowes were in spoiling; so as hee was plad to promife them especially, to regard and reward their good service. Against whom the Seltad vpod a narrow cauley, had opposed twelue or fifteen thousand men, whom he called D his flanes (to Moour his paffage) but were indeed his best fouldiers, and stood fast, the place ferting greatly for their aduantage: who for all that, at length forced by their enemies, fill in-tenting with their, (though not without great loffe) cast themselves into the great river, and made a most honorable retreat: every man having his weapon in the one hand, and swimming which district the further bank. The Sultan flying with fome eighteen thousand horse (for thesaft were foodry waies fled or els drowned) is reported in his flight, to have comforted his men, by telling them, that they were not men that had vanquished them, but gods, there appeared in them loggest wisedome, force, and valor: divers of the Mamalukes taken in the late fight, being brought before Tamerlane, and by him curteously vsed, were of him demanded, if they would be content to ferue him, now that their mafter was fled and gone ? which they all therly refuselwhom notwithstanding, for their fidelity, Tamerlane fet at liberty to go againe sothe Sultan: as no leffe defirous to be admired of his enemies for his bounty and courte fie, than feareth for his force and valor. The wonderfull wealth of this fo great and famous a city became a prey water his foldiers; who for the space of foute and twenty houres had the spoile thereof every manbeing then by oren Proclamation commanded to repaire to his quarter. The citizens be see al at liberty, not fuffering any of them to be taken prifoners; and fo leaving ten thousand good foldiers, with a great number of others (wherof he caried a great multitude is his army planting enery where as he passed as it were new colonies) and carrying away with him fueltof the inhabitants as he thought might hurt him, and taking order for all things necollery for the keeping of fuch a city, he caused his army to passe ouer the river for to follow P the Salmin to Alexandria, to the end not to leave his victory unperfect : Axalla hasting before with the avaunt gard for to hinder the Sultan for joyning his forces againe together; and the the of his army conducted by the Prince of Thanais; he himselfe with an infinite number of bonte & foldlets to attend voon him going by water, taking great pleasure to behold the faire tines, and his fwift course somtimes, & in an instant to become so calme as if it scarce moued.

The citizens of Alexandria hearing of his comming, and fearing what might betide them, be- G fought the Sultan to have compassion on their estate, and to withdraw himselse into Lybia, whither Tamerlane for the barrennesse of the country could not with any great power follow himstefolued for their parts to give place who fortune and so do as the time required, and no more to refift fo great a force, whereof they had already made fufficient triall : promiting yet to remain in heart fill his, & vpon the first occasion offered, to make the same to him appeare. Wherupon the Sultan feeing all things desperat, determined for a time to settle, in hope, that time would bring some change: as also that Tamerland his populous army would not long remaine there. And so departing out of Alexandria with scares standing in his cies, oftentimes faid, That God was angry with him and his people; and that ho must of necessity fuffer the fatal ouerthrow of his estate, himselfe having done as much as in line lay, according to his H oftarge, and the expectation the world had of him: and yearhat he hoped at length to return agains, and deliner his people from the bondage, whereunto they must needs now fubmit themselves, Tamerlane comming to Alexandria (before yeelded to Analla) there staid a great while, fending Axalla to purfue the Sultan, exceedingly grieved, that he could not get him into his hands ; and therefore ftill fearing fome innovation to be by him mifed which caused him to deale the more hardly with them whom he suspected to faucht him. Now the bruit of the levistories having with Axella passed beyond Alexandria into Lybia, had brought fuch a feare, not onely upon the people adjoyning vato the focunquests, but also upon all Affrica (shay supposing that Tamerlane did follow) that two and twenty, of the Moore kings fent their embaffadors whoo him, to offer unto him their obedience i the Suftan as a man forfaken I of foresmo, kill flying before him. Of the neerest of which Kings, Transflane tooks hostages: as for the other farehenoff, he contented himselfe with their faith given, and with the other outward fignes of their good wils, " The same redoorly of tilling to at Mary

Now after this long trauell and paines taken, was Tamerland mione defirous than he had befrom to return foreview, to fee the pleasures of his owner structure country schemes thereinto mound by the tequel of his wife, then longing for his returne; and the newes believed of the ficknes of the old Tarrarian Emperor his father in law ; besides that, age it solfabegan to bring vnto him a desite of rest: with whom also the desires of his souldiers well agreed, as men now weary to haue run fo many and divers fortunes. The onely stay was, that he expected the comming of Caliber an old and faithfull feruant of his, whom he for his good defere had of his own accord K appointed gouernor of all his new conquelts in Ægypt and Syria 1 a great honour no doubt, but not too great for him that had fo well descrued, Somindfull was be of the good deserts of his faithfull feruants, as that he needed not by others to be of they put in remembrance, were they never fo far off, as was now Calibes, who at this time was with the third part of his army making way for him along the great river Buphrates, for the conquest of Melopotamia, and Persiamhose comming was now with great denotion looked for of the whole army, desirous to returne. Which their expectation he long delated not, but being fent for, came to Alexandria, whither the whole army was now by the commandement of Tamerlane againe affembled. Vpon whole comming, Tamerlane departed from Alexandria, having there left the Prince Zamalcan (a man of great reputation) with fix thousand horsemen and ten thousand L foot, as governour of that place, and lieutenant generall under Calibea: whom Tamerlane (as I have faid) had now appointed to command over all Egypt and Syria, together with the Countries newly conquered in Lybia and Barbary : and now conducting him vnto the great City of Caire, and there taking the best order hee could for the preservation of his new conquelts, left him with forty thousand horse and fifty thousand foot. And so having sufficiently instructed him how her would have those Kingdomes governed, dismifted him, not like a master, but as a companion, seeming very forty to leave him destitute of his prefence. So ferting forward with his Army, conducted by the Prince of Thanais, Tamerlane himselse, with a few to guard him, by the way turned aside wnto Ierusalem: Where hee remained clouen daies, dayly visiting the sepulchre of Christ Iesus (whom he called the God M of the Christians) and the suines of Solomon his Temple : much wondering thereat, and at lerufalem, the feat of Danids Kingdome, and of that great Solomon: but grieued that he could not see them fully in their former beauty. He onely despised the Iewes, which had commitsed fo cruell a murder against him that came to faue them. And to shew his denotion toA woldsthe holy eity commanded it to be free from all fub fidies and garrifons of men of war; and gaine great gifts vnto the Monasteries, and honoured them fo long as he remained there. Departing from lerufalem, he came to Damafco: which great city, as well for that it was infedd with the opinion of the ides (accounted an arch hereticke among the Mahometans) as affocuill affocted to his proceedings, he caused to be rased, and the bones of lexides the false Problet to be digged vp and burnt, and his graue, before much honored, in defpught to be filfelwitt dung. Somarching on, and blafting the world before him as he went (for long it were and from our purpole, to recount all his victories) he passed ouer the river Euphrates, and haning odnored Melopotania, with the great city of Babylon, and all the kingdome of Perfie laded with the spoile of the world; and eternized for ever, he returned at length to Samer-B cand the famous place of his birth, and glorious feat of his Empire.

Now had Baiace (but a little before one of the greatest Princes on earth, and now the fcorn of foreste, and a by-word to the world) with great impatiency lien two yeares in most mifera. The mifera to ble thraidemifor most part struct up in an yron cage, as some dangerous wild beast and having no better means to end his loathed life, did violently beat out his braines against the barres of the yron grate wherin he was inclosed, and so died about the yere of our Lord 1399. Yet of his death are divers other reports : fome faying, that he died of an ague proceeding of for low and griefe:others, that he poyfoned himfelfe; and the Turks affirming, that he was fet at liberty by Tamerlane, being by him beforehand poyfoned, whereof he died three daies after he was inlarged (a report not like to be true:) but how focuer it was, his end appeareth to have been C. right miserable. His dead body at the request of his son Mahomet, was by Tamerlane into Asprapolis, from whence it was afterwards conneied to Prusa, and there lieth buried in a Chappell neere vnto the great Mahometan Temple without the city Eastward : where also lieshis beloued wife Despina, with his eldest some Erthogral. And fast by in a little Chappell lieth buried his brother Iacup, whom he in the beginning of his reigne murthered,

These two great and mighty Princes, Tamerlane and BajaZet, (both of them whilst they li- A comparison uedabinthen to the world) as they tooke their beginning from the Scyths or Tartars, to were set and Tathey of like honorable progenitors descended: Bajazet being the fourth in descent from the mertane. warlike Otheman, the raiser of his family; and Tamerlane in like degree from the great Zineis, the first and most fortunar leader of the Tartars (his countrymen) vnto the pleasures of the D Eastboth Princes of great power and like spirit; wife, hardy, painefull, resolute, and most skilfull in martiall affaires, but ambitious aboue measure, the ground of all the former troubles by them raifed to the aftonishment of the world. How beit, the great vertues and other the honourable qualities of BajaZet, were in him by his cholericke and waiward nature much obfoured which made him to exceed both in crucity and pride: being also much more bandfast than were his honourable predeceffors. For which causes he was much seared and lesse beloued of his foldiers and men of war in generall, and of them at his most need for saken: He vied commonly to fay, That his treasures were his childrens meat, and not his soldiers pay; which by way of reprochwas by a common fould fer cast in his teeth, when he raged to see himselfe by them forfaken in the great battell against Tamerlane; telling him as he fled, that he ranne not E away, but went to seeke his pay, wherewith to prouide his children bread. Whereas all the aforefaid vertues in Tamerlane were graced with divers other of like nature, no man being to his friends more curteous or kinde, either vnto his enemies more dreadfull or terrible. The femice of his feruant he neuer forgot, either left the fame long vnrewarded : being thereof to mindfull, as that he needed not by them or others in their behalfe, to be put in remembrance thereof, having alwaies by him a catalogue both of their names and good deferts, which he dayly perused. Oftentimes saying that day to be lost, wherein he had not given them something: and yet neuer bestowing his preferments on such as ambitiously sought the same (as deeming them in so doing vnworthy thereos) but vpon such as whose modesty or defert he thought worthy those his great fauours; so tempering the seuerity of his commands with the greatnesse of his bounty, as that it is hard to say, whether he was of his nobility and men of war, for the one more feared, or for the other beloued ; both, the great states of Princes states ; feate keeping the obstinate in obedience; and love, the dutifull in devotion. But with Bajor a itwes not fo, who deeming all done for him but duty, and by nature cholericke and proud (afterthe manner of Tyrants) defired about all to be of his subjects seared, not much regarding how little he was of them beloued; not the least cause of his great fall and misery, and that G Beleger is bit therein he was of his own fo smally regarded : wherein for all that he is to be accounted more policity more fortunate than the other great conqueror his enemy, having ever fince in the lineall descent of himselfe, had one of the greatest Monarchs of the world to succeed still in his kingdome and empire: as he hath even at this day, the great Sultan Mahomet, the third of that name, who and empiresas ne nath even at this day, the great Sultan Mahomet, the third of that name, who now in great majefly reigneth in Confrantinople. Whereas the glory of Tamerlane his Empire, even in his owne time growne to the height thereof, and labouring with the greatnesse of it selfe, and by him divided amongs his sons, shortly after his death decayed, rent in sunder by ambition and civill discord; and not long after, together with his posterity, rooted out by Vian Cassant Persian King, to the worlds wonder, tooke end: nothing of the huge great new parts of some or since then remaining more than the same thereof are done then. neffe thereof now or fince then remaining, more than the fame thereof : as doth also the mi-H fery of the other so brought low. But leaving this mirrour of mishap (BajaZet) vnto his rest, and Tamerlane for a while to triumph in Samarcand; let vs now proceed in the course of our History, yet not forgetting by the way to remember such Christian Princes as then lived together with these two great Monarchs.

On wonderfully the Tukish kingdome was by the violence of Tamer. Divers opintal and that had the majestic thereof defaced, it well appeareth, in outcome, that the Histories of that time, as well those of the Greeks, as of the Bajazet, their Turks, in nothing more differ, than in the successors of Bajazet, their Liste whoremate King. Some writing, that he had two lons, Orchanes some wife easiled Calefinia and Mahomet and that Calepinia in the infecond yeare of his reigne was flaine, and his kingdome possess that two sons, I mannely, Calefinia and Massaget and that Calepinia sons, I mannely, Calefinia and Massaget and that Calepinia sons, I mannely, Calefinia and Massaget and that Calepinia sonce coding his father in the Turkish kingdome, when he had reigned fix yeres, died, leaving behind him two functions was flaine by his vocle: whom making inchange of his brokhers death, afterwards flew, and posse. Onlifed the Kingdome him-fisher which for his brokhers death, afterwards flew, and posse. Galepinus, to fus the younger, the fisher which and the wind has vocertaine function among it then also. This discription of ophilions, full of the vocertainty is as I meane not to follow in report of this History, so will not spend any time in refuting the same, (although much might be said in the matter) but lease the leave, to gether with the history following, to such credit as they shall hap to shad with the considerar Readers.

The Greeke Historion wanters (belt like to know the Turkish succession, as well by reason of their accessage as in that they were by them as their bad neighbors, so much troubled) make nomencionatalleither of Calepinus or of Orchanes : In like mann T. Hifloria Mufulmana Turcorangelliginely gathind out of the Turks own histories by Io. Leunclauius (a learned Phy an, and himselfa great ensueller among (t them, and therefore deferuing the more credit) do not for much as name the fuete fron of Calepinus or Orchanes, after the captivity of Bajazet, but rejederb them both as counterfets. But in my opinion (without prejudice to any, that upon better reason may deeme otherwise) the great confusion of the Turkish Kingdome, in thort time wanghe by the mighty Tamerlane and his Tartars, with the civill discord and war afterwards atting among the fons of Bajazes, Ariuing all as it were at once, for the reftleffe roome of four rainty, which fatteristis no partners; and enery one of them, according to his hap or power, living hand spondome one part or other thereof, and bearing himselfe therein for a time as a Ring in countries fo far diffant, neither leaving, untill they had like the earth borne brethren, wroughe one anothers defirm tion, might give just occasion of such diversity of reports as is telline is the function; might give just occasion of that troubled and rent Kingdome: F. Antereckeding one, some another; and some, such as never were, to have succeeded in the gosomeoc, and fo vntruly augmenting the number of the Turkish Kings. Wherefore leaving Calepinus & Orchanes whto them that first found them, with that little, which without any good ground and leffe probability is written of their supposed reigne; I (following the authority of the Turkish history) reckon this Mahomet one of the yongest sonnes of BajaZet (of whom we The true palle.

are now to intreat) fifth king of the Turks: who after great and dangerous wars as well against G his own brethren, as his forreine enemies, was at length folely inuefted in the Turkish King. dome, about ten yeares after the captiuity of his father Baiazet, as shall hereafter be declared

Baja Tet after the manner of the Turkish Kings, haping laid up the hope of his posterity in the common treasure house of nature, rather than in the body of one lawfull wife, had by diuers wines and concubins feuen fonnes, Bihogral, otherwise called Orthobales, Emer. Solyman Multapha-Zelebi, (that is to fay, the noble) Ifa. Zelebi, Mufa-Zelebi, Sultan Mabomet, and Cafan. Zelebr. Of whom Orthogral the eldeft was loft in the wars against Cafi Burchaniden, as is before faid in the life of Bajazet, Mustaphawas flaine in the great battell against Tamerlane, and there buried in the bed of fame. Cufan the youngest was a child in Baia et his court, when his father was taken, and afterwards with his fifter Fatime deliuered as hoftages, by their brother Soly- H man, vnto Emanuel the Emperor of Constantinople, where they both happily became Christians, and to thortly after died.

Solyman was by Alis Baffa Prefident of Baia Tet his Councell, and other great captains, conneved out of the battell against Tamerlane, into Europe, and soby them at Hadrianople saluted Sultan, Mahomet fled out of the same battell to Amasia in Capadocia, where he was in his fathers time gouernour. If a hearing of his fathers captivity, after the departing of Tamerlane with his Tartars, seised upon Prusa a city of Bithynia, the ancient seat of the Turkish Kings, with the country adjoyning, and there reigned as a King. Musi-Zelebi was raken prisoner with Baiazet his father, and afterwards fet at liberty by Tamerlane. But of sheir fortunes more shall be faid in this history following.

Mahomet was but fifteene yeares old when his father Baiafes in the vnfortunate battell of mount Stella was taken prisoner, and was at the same time by his appointment Gouernour of Amasia, with a great part of Gapadocia adjoining: which places became so troublesome after the great victory of Tamerlane, that the Turky in that country were glad day and night for the fafegard of themselves, their wives, and children, to keepe continuall watch and ward : in so much that many of them wearied with those troubles, & despairing of better times, went into voluntary exile, because they would not see so great miseries; which thing much griev'd yong Mahomes. Wherfore calling vnto him his most faithful counsellors, to consult what course to take in the midft of fo many dangers, it was by generall confent thought best (for so much as they could not without apparant danger continue negrounto Tamerlanes forces) to get them- K felues further off into places of more strength, & from thence to expect the departure of their enemics, and in the meane time to content themselves with such advantages as occasion and chance of war might minister, cutting them short by policy, whom they were not able to meet in the plain field, and foby little and little to weaken or weary their mighty firagling enemies. For albeit that Tamerlane himselse was not neere him, as then lying in Caria, yet did the Captains of his great and victorious army, at their pleasure spoile and forrage the countries far and neere all ouer the lesser Asia. V pon this resolution he with all his forces departed from Amafia, Derby in Paphlagonia where by the way he incountred with Gara lahia a nigh kinfman to the Prince Isfendiar of Castamona, his enemy, whom he put to flight with great slaughter of his men. This was the beginning of Mahomets good fortune. From thence he went to Kere. L Mibimet fen den, and there staying certaine daies, sent a spy into Tamerlanes campe, to see how all things detb Spire into went there and afterwards entred again into councel with his captains, concerning his further proceedings. In which confultation fomewere of opinion, That it was best for him to withdraw himselfe into the mountains of the lesser Asia, as a place of good safety, varill the departure of Tamerlane, which was shortly hoped for : for that it was not to be thought, that Tamerlane would with his luge army purfue him in that mountaine country, flying from hil to hil, and as it were from firength to firength. Others better adulfed, thought those mountains to be no places to trust vnto, and therefore that it were more honorable, and as free from danger, for him to turn again into Amasia, and there to live among a his subjects, protecting them in such fort as he might, and not to leave them for a prey to every straggling company of the rude Tar- M tarians: which councel he followed, as most reasonable; and being ready to set forward, the spy before by him fent into Tamerlanes campe, returned, certifying him that he had feen his father Baiafet in good health in the Tartars Campe, but could not by any means speake with him, by reason of the streight guard set ouer him : and that all that part of Asia was by Tamerlane poffeffed, policifed, who then with his army wintred in Caria and Lyfia : whereupon Mahomet returned hickeaganointo Amafia; where he had not long stayed, but that newes was brought unto him That ene of the Tartatian Princes called Cara Dulet schach (that is to fay, the fortunate blocke King) was with an army of twenty thousand comming to spoyle his country, being gisee him by Tanerlane. With which newes he was exceedingly troubled; wherefore with all ford calling together his forces for the fafegard of his country, he fent before a fpy to difeoanthe enemies doings. This diligent fpy returning in all half, told Mahomet, That Cara Dulet layar the towne of Agiolus in Galatia, in great fecurity, having about him but a small power sethethe fearing no danger, had at that time difperfed his army, to feeke after pillage shood in the country. Mahemet taking hold of this opportunity, marched thither with great celerity; and fuddenly fetting vpon Cara Dulet, ouercame him. In which conflict Cara Dulet Cara Dulet himselfewas that thorow the head with an arrow and flaine, and his army veterly discomfiand Mahamer returning backe to Amafia with victory, refreshed and rewarded his foldiers. ver no leffe carefull of the fafety of his kingdome than before. Shortly after howas advertised that Cubad Ogli with a great army laid hard siege to the citrof Califica in Capadocia, and was like in short time to take it, if it were not speedily relieand. By raking of which city, that Tartar Prince was like to make a great entrance, to the haranding of the whole country. Wherefore Mahomet having his army alwaics in readineffe. matched day and night with fuch speed to Cæsaria, as that he was voon Cubad Ogli before he was ware of his comming, and there flew most of his fouldiers, and put him with the rest to C fight. After that he returned into Cubad Ogli his Country in Pontus, and grieuously spoiled stifetifroied the fame: at which time he also by force won the strong castle Peltæ in the con-Immediatly after that, Inall ogli another of Tamerlanes Captaines (which at their pleafure without let forraged all the countries of the leffer Afia, during the time that Tamerlane made his abodewithin the Turks dominions) upon the fudden entred into Capadocia with an army of eventy thousand fighting men, killing the inhabitants, and spoyling the country before him for that the people for feare left their dwellings, and fled into the woods and mountains,

Shortly after, Mahomet according to his promife meeting with this Tartar Prince, by plain throwaby Me force ouerthrew him, and had of him a notable victory.

The like good hap he had also not long after, against Coffer Ogli and Kinpeck Ogli, two other to Tartarian captains, at the castle of Chara chizar and the Plaine of Artuck-Oua. And hearing that one Mester a Turke, had fortified himselse in the ruins of Sebastia, and from thence sooiled the country round about, he fent Bajazet one of his Baffa's against him; who in short time tooke him, and brought him bound vinto him: by whom he was adjudged to die. But feeing in the man an inuincible courage, and contempt of death at such time as he should have beene executed, moved therewith, he gave him his pardon; for which he ever after continued vnto him faithfull, and did him great service.

Mahomet having many times thus vanquished the stragling Tartarian Princes, which had fought the spoile of his country, became thereby famous among the great commanders of Tamerlane his army , in fo much that the bruit of his name came at length to Tamerlanes care, yet lying in the leffer Asiawho as he thought it not worth his greatnesse and labor, himself in person to goe against soweake an enemy; so he thought it not good or convenient, quite to negled him, but by fome other meanes (if he could) to ouertake him. For which purpose he began to speake many times very honourably of him, highly commending his great valor and forwardnesse in so tender yeres. And calling for BajaZes, told him what great commendation he had heard of his sonne Mahomet, and that he was therefore very desirous to see him : where if he found that true which was reported of his great vertues, hee would bestow one of his daughters upon him in marriage, with many other great preferments and therefore willed Ba. jazet to write vnto him, Not to doubt to come vnto him, to the great good both of himselfe and his father. Which thing Bajazet at the first doubting the worst, requested Tamerlane not K to beleeue that of his fon, being yet very yong, and not worthy of so great a fauor. Neuertheleffe pairly perfuaded by Tamerlane his protestations, and importuned by him that might now command him he with an euil will wrote to his fon Mahomet to fuch effe & as Tamerlane required. With which letters, and others of like purport for himself, with many rich Presents, Tamerlane fent Hozza Mahomet (one of his fecret councellors) Embassador to Mahomet, of whom he was right honorably received, and likewise entertained. But having read the aforesaid letters, and thereby vnderstood the cause of his comming, he entred into councell with the great Ballais about him, whether he were best to go to Tamerlane or not. Where his Councellors were all cleare of one opinion, that it was not good for him to aduenture his person to the dan. ger of fuch a journey, or the mercy of so mighty an enemy, of whose faith he had no affurance. L And if so be (said they) he therewith offended, will by force seeke to have you, we at his comming will take therefuge of the woods and mountains, and thereshroud our selues vntill he be departed againsfor that he with his huge army cannot here long flay in this barren country, for want of necessaries. Neverthelesse, Mahomet hoping that his journy might be both for the good of his father, and his own advancement; contrary to the mind of all his councellors refolued to go; and so having prepared all things needfull for the honor and safety of his journy, fet forward. But as he was vpon the way in the marches of Pontus, Cara Iabia whom he had before ouerthrowne, understanding of his comming that way, thinking now to be reuenged, and having got vnto him some of the Prince Issendiars forces, set vpon him by the way : but with as cuill fucceffe as before, most of his men being there by Mahomet flain, & himselfe glad M shamefully to fly. So trauelling on further he understood that Alia Beg, a great Lord in those countries, went about to intercept him also: which caused him in such hast to goe on, that he was vpon Alie before he was aware of his comming, or well prouided for him: fo that for feare he was glad to betake himselse to flight. Mahomet considering the danger he had escaped in that journey, and that the nearer he came to Tamerlane, the more like he was to fall into greateralthough happily without Tamerlane his knowledges by the advice of his grave and faithfull counfellors, resolved to go no further. Wherefore calling vnto him Tamerlanes Embastic dor, be thus fpake vnto him :

Tousee the dangers and injuries I indure in this my journy, and my minde forbode the greater to enfue: Makemet his for which canfes I may not goe any further, but bere returne. Commend me therefore I pray you wato the Beach to Tamelt mighty Taner late, with my father, and tell them what dangers have happened wno me woon the barder. way: which differed. I hope they will have me excused. For which purpose I will also send in your company an Hand aldone of mine owne.

Achomet at that time had with him a grave, wife, and learned man, called Sophis Bajazet. fometime his schoolemaster : whom he sent Embassador to Tamerlane and his father to have him vnto them both excused: and so departed, he homewards, leaving the way he came for feare of further danger) and they towards Tamerlane, who honourably received Atthomass Emhallador and letters. But taking pleasure in the man fent vnto him, gaue him honourable entertainment but would neuer after fuffer him to returne againe vnto his mafter.

It was notiong after, but that old Bajazet died of impatiencie (as is aforefaid:) whose dead body Tamerline left at Apropolis with the Prince Germean, to bee deliuered vnto his found Mahomet; with Musa his elder brother (who all this while Itad beene kept prisoner with Tamerlane) if Mahomet should require him. And so the mighty Prince Tamerlane, after he had long time wasted Phrygia, Caria, Lydia, with the most part of the lesser Asia; and con-C quered all Syria, Indea, Ægypt, and Persia, with many other great countries and provinces : returned at last into his owne Kingdome, unto the great city of Samarcand, which he wonderfully inlarged, and beautified with the spoiles of a great part of the world, before by him wasted: where heafterwards in great peace and glory raigned, no lesse honourable than feared of all the Princes of the Bast. To the terrour of whom, and for the assuring of estate, he kept The great power. alwaies a franding army of forty thousand horse, and threescore thousand foot ready at all to Tames land affaies: besideother his great garrisons which he kept in Syria, Ægypt, China, and Camba tept. lu; as also against the Muscouite, and Turkes; being commonly in every place three score thousand firong, though not still in field, but as occasion required. Vntill that at length hearing of the rifing againe of the Turkish kingdome, under the Othoman Princes, the sons of Ba-D jazer, with whom the oppressed Mamalukes of Ægypt, and the Greeke Emperour (as doubtfull of his estate) had now also for seare of him combined themselves; he by the persuasion of Axalla(then Generall of his imperial army) made great preparation for a fecond expedition to be made for the veter rooting out of the Othoman family, and the conquest of the Greeke Empire. But having now all things in readinesse, and also giving a good beginning vntothese his intended conquests, (one of the Turks great Bassaes being by Axalla his lieutenant in a great battell ouerthrowne, and thirty thousand of the Turks slaine) he in the middest of these his greathopes, as also of his greatest power, died of an ague the 72 day of lanuary, in the yere The destines of our Lord 1402. A little before whose death, appeared a great and terrible blasing star, portending as it were to the world the death of fo great a Prince. He was a man of a middle fla-E tute, tomewhat narrow in the shoulders, otherwise well limmed, and of agreat strength. In his The description cies fate such a rare majesty, as a man could hardly indure to behold them without closing of his owne; and many in talking with him, and often beholding of him, became dumbe; which caused him oftentimes with a comely modesty to abstaine from looking too carnestly vpon such as spakevnto him, or discoursed with him. All the rest of his visage was amiable and well proportioned : he had but little haire on his chinne; and ware the haire of his head long and curled, contrary to the manner of the Tartars, who shave their heads, having the same alwaies contractive hereas be contractive ife was for the most part bare headed, commanding his fon also to be fo by his totors brought vp : his haire was of a darke colour, formewhat drawing towards aviolet, right beautifull to behold : which his mother comming of the race of Sampson (as he gaue it out) willed him to nourish, in token of his descent : the cause that made him to be the more respected of his men of war; most part of them beleeving that in those haires was some rate vertile, or rather some fatall destiny an old practise of many great commanders of former ages, to fill the heads of their foldiers with fome strange opinion conceined of them, to be the more of them honored; as if in them had bin some one thing or other more than in other men-

His lively counterfeit, as I find it expressed by them that write the best of him, you may here G behold, with the testimony of his greatnesse following.

captaines what were best to be done: where Eine Sub-bassa man of great experience, and of G late one of Basaget his great councellors and captaines, told him, That it was not for their ho. nours being brethren, to pollute their hands one in the others bloud but to affay if the quarrell might by some other good meanes be composed, and they made friends. For which pur, role, Mahamet prefently fent letters unto his brother Ifa, concerning the partition of their fathers kingdome in Afia betwixe them coffering vnto him the provinces of Aidinia, Sarucha. nia Germeania, Charafia, Charamania, with other countries to them belonging fo that he might haue Prusa with all the other provinces about the same. Which letters, when said read, and faw that Mahomet Offered him but titles for Kingdomes, and fuch countries as were rather fometimes tributaries vnto their father Baiafer, than any part of his kingdome, and now of late by Tamerlane againe restored vnto their ancient liberty and gouernors, sharing out the best and strongest part thereof vnto himselfe, he brake forth into choler, and said :

What, doth not my fathers king dome of right belong unto me being the elder brother? Mahomet is 1/a to Maho- yet but a youth, and scarce crept out of the shell : by what right then can be claime my fathers kingdome as his inheritance? If he can by the fword win it, let him take it, and so hold it.

Mahomet having received his answere, prepared himselfe to the field, where his brother as ready as himselfe, stood, expecting his comming; and having fet his army in order of battell. gaue the first charge : which was the beginning of a most cruel and bloudy fight, wherein, as it commonly falleth out in doubtfull battels; many were on both fides flain. At last the fortune of Mahomet prevailing, If his army began to retire : which he feeing, left nothing vindone for the encouraging of his fasaring fouldiers, which belonged to a politicke Generall, or valiant foldier to do , but preffing into the thickest of his enemies, there with his owne hand flew the antient and valiant capesine Eine Sub. baffa, who had many times beene Generall of the footmen in old Baiafet his Wars. But what prevaileth sourage against euil fortune ? If a must either fly or die. And therefore having done what he could in for desperat a vale; being Himselfe on cuery fide forfaken in the end was glad himfelfe to fly to the fea fide: where finding a thip ready bound for Constantinople; homaffed ouershigher in safety, and there yeelded himselfe vnto the protection of the Greeke Emploior Emenuel: In this chase Mahomes his fouldiers tooke the valiant caritaine Towartales presoner, another of Balafet his great commanders, and brought him to Mahomet : who in revenge of the death of Bine, commanded his head prefently to be fmitten off, and his body to be hanged upon a tree by the high way fide. Of this victory, Mar. K homer certified his brother Solyman at Hadrianople, and in token thereof fent him Temuriales his head. This battell was much fooken of, both for rhatie was fought betwirt two brethren: and also for the death of the two famous and old captaines Bine and Temperates, who both together as louing friends, bad foreunately fought many great battels under Baiafet his enfignes: and now as it were by deftiny, and against their wils; without any private gradge, were both drawne into contrary factions and flaine : both whileft they lined withing a good peace betwist the ambitious brethren. After this victory, Mubiner thinking himfelfe now in fure possession of all his fathers dominions in Afia, led his army to Prufa, where howas of the citizens joyfully received as their 1. Solyman

Solvman the eldest some of Bajazet (who kept his court at Hadrianople, there peaceably G reigning all this while quor the countries which his father Bajazet formetime possessed in Enrope) hearing what his brother Mahomet had done, and how violently against all right he had driven Maout of Prufa, and made him glad to fly to Constantinoples was with this his outra. gious dealing much offended, and thereupon calling vnto him his Baffaes and faithfull counfellers, declared vnto them the vnnaturall proceedings of Mahomet against his brother 1/1. Wherein (faid he) he doth me also great wrong in taking woon him the sourraignty ouer those great dominions and countries in Asia which of right belong to me his elder brother, and not to him the young gefl of fix. In revenge of which injury and wrong, I intend in mine owneright to paffe over into Alia with a strong army, and by force of armes to recover mine inheritance there, if I may not otherwise come by it. Vato which speech one of his graue counsellers replyed, That in his opinion it was not H the best course for himselfe to goe in person into those warres. For although (faid he) your brother Mahomet be but young, and therefore by your greatneffeleffe accounted of, yet is his fortune great, and his experience about his yeares. None hath yet hadto doe with him, but they have had enough of him yea, it is worth the noting, how politickely he hath borne himselse for his owne safety, and the safet ard of the countries which he gouerned all the while that the great and mighty. Tamerlane with his innumerable forces concred the face of the countries fast by him : most part hereof, Mahomet hath now fince his departure, againe reconcred. Wherefore it were best for you to fend for your angry brother Ifa, to Confantinople, and to make him Generall of the army you intend to fend into A fia against Mahomet. In which warres, it is not unlike, but that one of your brethren will be loft, whereby you hall have one competitor of your king dome the leffe. So shall you afterwards with leffe trouble subdue him that is left, or I at leastwife please him with some part of that which they have so mightily striven for. This countest them was of Solyman and all the rest well liked of, and approved. So was Isa presently sent for vn. bit britter Se. to Conftantinople, and a great army leuied. Who being come to Hadrianople, was by Solyhman into Afa man courteously welcommed, and made Generall of his Army: and therewith shipped oner against Mabe the streit of Hellespontus into Asia. Where at his first comming, he possessed the whole countrey of Carafia or Lydia: and passing further, in all places where he came, was received of the people with great reuerence, they all promising him their obedience, if it were his fortune to prevaile against his younger brother Mahomet : wherewith he held himselfe well contented. So comming to the city of Beg. Bazer, otherwise called Despotolis, he there wintered with his army. In which time, he with many kinde and louing letters fill directed to K Mahomet as his younger brother, seemed to be glad that he was so well obeied and liked of by his subjects : and that presuming of his loue and fayour, he was as his louing brother, and not as an enemy come into Afia, to intreat with him of fuch matters as much concerned the good of them both. Whereunto Mahomet with like diffimulation answered, That he was right glad of his comming for which he needed not (as he faid) to make any excuse, for that he was entered into a kingdome, in part his owne, and the rest open before him: in token whereof he commanded a rich garment to be cast upon the messenger as a fauour, sending also diners rich presents vnto his brother, with great provision of victuals, and other necessaries for his fouldiers. But Winter past and the Spring come, 1/4 marched with his army to Piusa, & there shewed I. vnto the cirizens the louing letters he had at fundry times before received from Mahomet

and relling them that he was in good hope that they should in short time right well agree; to quested to have the castle delivered vnto him, somtime their soueraigne: whereinto the better fort of the citizens had retired themselves, and made fast the gates against him: but when he faw that he could by no faire words or policy gaine the possession of the castle, enraged with Profe barnedy that repulse, he fet fire vpon that goodly city, and burnt it downe to the ground. Mahomet not ignorant how his brother 1/a roamed up and downe his kingdome, vfing all kindnes to fuch as yeelded vnto him; and exercifing no leffe cruelty upon fuch as refused his obedience; and how that he had rafed the royall city of Prusa: having gathered a strong army, marched inten daies from Amasia to Prusa, and by the way meeting with his brother Isa, in a great battell M ouerthrew him with all his forces. Is himselfe accompanied with no more butten persons, fled vnto Castamona, Prince Isfendiar his city: who hearing of his arrivall there, enterrained him with all the honor he could, in recompence of the great friendship he had before found ar his hands, at what time he was an humble futer in his father Bajazet his court.

reference comming to Prula, grieved exceedingly to fee that fair city fodeftroved : ver to mifor the poor citifens, he gaue exceeding fums of mony to be bestowed among them, and med noder for the new building of the city, and there continued certain daies himselfe to see

If in the mean time having incited the prince Is fender in his quarrell to inuade his brother like going thicker himself in person, was by him now the third time out thrown and put to flight. Neuertheles he with some small forces twice afterwards entered Maho. deminion bur finding few or none willing to follow his euill fortune, was glad at last to dynome Prince of Smytha, by whom he was both honorably entertained and comforted.

This cance of Smyrna, mooued with If his pittifull complaints in fo manifest a wrong. B did not only promise him what help he could of himself, but also by Embassadors solicited the princes of Aidinia, Sarucania, and Mentelia, to give him aid in to just a quarrell, for the relief of Magainst his vsurping brother. These princes pittying the estate of the distressed Prince and mooued with the request of the Prince of Smyrna, and fearing alto the ambitious fpirit of Mahemet; among ft them fent fuch aid, that being all affembled together, Ila had now wenty thousand men in arms. Mahomet understanding of this great preparation made against bim and having raifed a strong army, thought it not best to expect his brothers comming into his country (where perhaps many might join themselves vnto him, being so strong in field) but entred into the prince of Smyrna's Country with fuch speed, that hee was upon him and the refi of his enemies before he was looked for , where after a great and bloudy fight he ob-C taised of them a notable victory. If a having loft the battel, and therwith his hope also, fled ine Caramania. and there in fuch obscuritie ended his daies, that no man can tell where or how hadled. This was the end of this noble Prince, alwaies of greater courage than fortune. If a flieth into The Prince of Smyrna the chief author of this war, humbling himselfe to Mahomet, obtained there dich in his favor. The other confederat princes which gaue aid to Ha, were shortly after by Mahomet obscurity. for most part spoiled of their dominions. Which done, he returned with victoric to the building of Profa, hoping now to live at more quiet.

But while Mahemet after this victory dreading no danger, was in the midst of his pleasures et Prusa, he was certainly aduertised, That his brother Solyman had raised a great army in Eutop, to intiade him in Afia. Vpon which aduertisement, he furnished the castle of Prusa with D aftrong garrison, and all things needfull for the enduring of a long fiege, and placed Incup Beg the fon of Firefts, captain therein; and afterwards departed himself, because that City (lately before burnt by 1/a) was not as yet to be defended, much lesse to be accounted of as a place to retyre vino, if need should so require. From Prusa he came to Ancyra, and from thence ditested commissions for the taking up of soldiers in all parts of his kingdom. At which time howrite letters also to Deieran a Tartar prince (whom hee had many times greatly pleasured) for aid who preferrly came vnto him with certain troups of braue horse, promiting him his faithfull service:

Not long after, bearing that his brother Solyman was with a puiffant army now come ouer Hellespontus, beconsulted with his best leaders, what course first to take, being himselse of opinion, without delay to meet his brother in the field; deeming it great shame, not to offer him present battel; but he was by his more expert captains adulted to confider, that hee was to fight against his eldest brother, of whose good or bad fortune he had as yet no experience: and that many fecretly favored his quarrel and claim, as the eldeft fon and right heir of his fathe Balacet. Wherfore it were better for him to retyre further off into the strength of his hingdom, and fo temporifing, to await all good opportunities that might chance (as it doth innothing more than in martial affairs) rather than to commit all to the hafard of one battel, wherinif fortune failed him, all were then vererly loft. V pon which refolution he retired from Macyta toward Amelia. At which time Doioran the falle Tartar, marching out at the other seof the city, fell to robbing and spoiling of Mahomets subjects as an enemy, burning the eductry villages as they went. Which thing when Mahomet vnderstood he with his horsemen partied him, and ouertaking him before he was looked for, flew most part of his men, & recohead all the spoil which he had before taken; all which Mahomet gaue to his soldiers: Deiohimself hardly escaping by flight. And so Mahomet having revenged himselfe upon his diffembling friend, held on his way towards Amasia.

Solyman being come into Asia, led his army towards Prusa; where the Citisens understanding of his comming, went out of the city to meet him, and having don vnto him such honor and reuerence as belonged to their Sultan, brought him peaceably into the City. But Lacun Bee flood voon his gard, and would by no means deliuer vnto him the caffle, which was before by Mahomet committed to his charge : for which cause Solyman laid hard siege vnto it , and gaue therunto divers tharp affaults, whereby the defendants were greatly weakened, many of them being flain, and the reft for the most part wounded. Wherupon lacup by letters fent by one Bine Hozze, certified Mahomet how things flood, and that the Castle could not long bee holden against the furious affaults of Solyman, vnlesse it were speedily relieued : vponwhich news he in all hast made toward Prusa, returning the same messenger before him with letters to the captain of the castle, if haply he could find means to deliuer the same, wher in he high. H ly commended him for his faithfull feruice, and promifed him fpeedy relief. This meffenger with his letters chanced by Solymans foldiers to be intercepted, and brought to Alis Baffa, Solymans chief Counsellor, a man of a sharp conceit, who of nothing could make something; but having any thing to work vpon could do wonders the having fireftly examined the meffenger and perused the letters, suppressed the same, and presently writ others in the name of Mahomer, commending the captain for that he had already done in his feruice: but yet forafmuch as he could not possibly in time relicue him, he willed him therefore to deliuer vp the Castle. and to prouide for the fafegard of himfelte and his Garrison by such conditions as hee could best obtain. These counterfeit letters Alia Baffa found means to be as cunningly deliuered to the captain, as they were craftily indited: who having read the same, and now out of all hope I of relief, expecting also every hour to be affaulted by the enemy, vpon reasonable conditions yeelded the Castle to Solyman. The news whereof being brought vnto Mahomet, now come within onedaies march of Prula, exceedingly gricued him, but feeing no remedy, hee returned back again to Amalia: whither Solyman (now possessed of the City and castle of Prula, and having therby got a great name in Asia) (hortly after came with his army, and hardly befieged his brother in Amasia: but seeing no hope to win the city, he retyred backe againe to Prusa, and thereafter his wonted maner spent his time in ryot and exces, wherunto he was ex. ceedingly giuen, Iacup Beg for yeelding the castle was afterward by Mahomet streitly impriso. ned, and in danger to have bin put to death, had not the great Bassa's become intercessors

Mahomet lying at Amasia, was by his secret espials advertised, that his brother Solyman hauing dispersed his Army, lay in great securitie, garded but with a small power, passing his time in all voluptuous pleasure, his common exercise. Whereupon hee in all hast marched with his Army thitherwards, to have surpised him before he should be able to call together his dispersed Forces. But when hee was come to the river Sangarius, hee was discovered by Solyman Sub-Baffa a great Captain, whom Sultan Solyman had fent for the taking up of men in that fide of the country. Who returning in all halt, gaue Solyman knowledge of his brothers comming : with which fudden news he was fo difmaied, being now of small strength, that for the avoiding of the imminent danger, he would presently have fled into Europ, had not Alis Baffa otherwise persuaded him; telling him, that if he should so cowardly fly away, it would L not only blemith and defame his honor, but discourage his friends also in Asia, and incourage his enemies to pursue him perhaps vnto the gates of Hadrianople : and that therefore it were better with such forces as he had to take the streits of Neapolis, and so to stay his brothers further passage into that country, vntill such time as he might assemble the rest of his army. According to which good counsel, he first took the before named streits and passages, whereby Mahomet was of necessitie to passe, and there strongly fortified himself, Mahomet comming thither, with great force entred those streights, but was still valiantly by Salyman repulsed. The like attempt he many times valiantly gaue, for that he knew himselse to be at that time too hard for his brother. But Solyman having the advantage of the place, with little danger or losse frustrated those his brothers braue attempts, although he were then a great deale the M weaker. Alis Baffa (whose wily head fraught with long experience, could with nothing effect great matters) in the mean time was not idle, but making Solyman before acquainted with his doings, fent a fecret messenger (one of his ownemost trusty scruants) to Mahomet with Letters; certifying him, That most of his Nobility and great Captains had secretly conspired to betray him into the hands of his eldest brother Solyman, as the vindoubted heir of his father Batalet; and fo with the price of his head to make their own peace and atonement with him and that for the performance therof they had bound themselves first vnto Solyman and afterwards one to another, by folemn oath. Which treafon he difcouered vnto him, with great processation of his love and good wil, as he that had a long time eaten bread and salts as the Turks vie to fay) in his fathers court, and therfore could not but with wel vnto him, being one of his Lord and matters fons. These letters somthing troubled Mahomet, breeding in his head many spisious conceit : for all that, hee cealed not for fix or feuen daies space, to give many a bot skirmith for the gaining of those streit passages, but all in vain. In which time it chanced one of his fermants heer about his person, to fly vnto the enemy; which caused him B the more white & all that to be true wherof Alis Baffa had forewarned him. Which confide. red and this by lying there he prevailed nothing, but loft and wearied his men (for it was all that while exceeding foul weather) and withal doubting to be betrayed, returned as he came, co-Amelia: And Solymin glad also of his departure, retired to Prusa, giving order into all parts olhis kindom for the affembling of a great army; but understanding that the King of Carumania had made a league with his brother Atabomes, and that they were agreed to join their forces against him for the driving of him out of Asia, he forthwith drew all his forces to Anevrass a place of more fafety.

While Solyman thus lay at Ancyra, it fortuned that Mula (who had all this while remained with his brother Mahomet, since he was fet at liberty by Tamerlane, though not altogether wel leased with his own estate) one day by way of talk thus spake vnto his brother: You see (said other our elder brother Solyman ceafeth not to vex and moleft vs daily, and is not wnlike in the end to prevail against vi to our viter destruction. Now if it might please you to give mee leave, I would goe to Islandiar Arince of Castamona and Pontus our brothers enemy, and of him procure shipping to pas ouer the Buxine fed, into Europ, where I doubt not to find opportunitie to make fome great innovation in that kingdom with in my brothers absence : by reason wherof Solyman shall of necessitie be driven to leave Afiato be we sind by you falely poffeffed ; or els be brought in danger there to lofe his king dome in Europe. Which if in Ball be my good hap to gain out of his hauds by your supportation, I promise you futbfully to hold the fame of you as of my Lord and Soueraign.

This greatly pleased Mahomet, and therupon not long after they concluded betwirt themfelues, one to frand fast vnto another, and the one to help the other in what they could, during life, confirming the same with great solemnitie of their Turkith faith given & taken. Wherupon Mahomet furnished his brother Musa with great fums of mony and other needful things for the taking in hand of fo great an enterprise.

Musa thus furnished, taking his leave of his brother, set forwards towards the prince Is fendiar: who hearing of his comming met him on the way, & entertained him as a great prince. But after that Mafa had made him acquainted with his purpose for passing into Europe, and had obtained grant of his help therein, he tooke his leave of him for a time, and went to visit the King of Caramania, who also most honorably entertained him, and the rather in despight of Solyman, Betwhill Musa was thus passing the time in Caramania it fortuned that Mark (of fome called Merces) prince of Valachia, having his country much spoiled by Solymons garrifons and hearing that Musa one of Bajazet his sonnes was with the Prince Issendiar, hee writ vato him, promiting to bestow his daughter and heir in mariage vpon Ausa, if he would come ouer into Europ, and reuenge the wrong done unto him by Solyman. Whereof Mula aduertised by the Prince Isfendiar, gladly returned out of Caraminia, and was by him transported ouer the Buxine or black sea, into Europe. Where the Prince of Valachia glad of his comming, received him with great honor, and according to his promife gaue him his daughter in M. fi. mariety

The fame of Musa his comming into Europe, and of his marriage, was in short time bru- doughter. ted thorow all Solyman his kingdome in Europe, and wrought such effect in the minds of the mutable vulgar people (always defirous of nouelty) that they all as it were with one content fubmitted themselves vnto him as vnto their Lord and Soueraign: insomuch that comming to the roial city of Hadrian ople, in the absence of his brother Solyman hee was there received Mula in Solyman hee was there received Mala in Solyman hee was there received

and that hee was possessed of a great part of his kingdome there, was therewith exceedingly G troubled. Wherfore leaving his deputy in Ancyra, he with all his army came to the streit of Bosphorus, and there of Emanuel the Greek Emperour obtained passage, promising for the fame to reftore vnto him certain places before taken from him in Afia. For his brother Much had to provided that he could have no help of the Turkish shipping, which was by his com. mandment all before brought ouer vnto Europ fide. Musa hearing of Solyman his arrivall in Europ, made towards him with a great power but after that both their armies were come the one within view of the other, and now ready to join battell, many of Mula his captains for fook him, and fled to Solyman his eldest brother and their vindoubted King. Which Musa behol. ding, was glad to fly, and to take the lafegard of the Woods and mountaines for his refuge. After which victory, Solyman returning to Hadrianople, tooke againe possession of his King. H dome, and there without measure gaue himselfe to ryot and excesse, according to his wonted

After the departure of Solyman out of Afia, sacup Beg (but lately before again received into Mahomets favor, and now left as Solymans deputy) delivered Ancyra, with the castle of Prusa and all the rest that Solyman had gained in Asia, to Mahamet, who shortly after led his Army thorow the countries of Caralia, Aidinia, Sarucania, Tekensis, and Germeania, teducing them once again vnto his obeyfance; and afterwards returned to Prufa, where hee now the fecond

Musa still aided by the Valachian prince his father in law, gave many great attempts against Lainft Solyman, his brother Solyman, but was still put to the worfe. At length having gathered some good I strength and diligently attending the least smile of better fortune, drew neere vnto the place where Solyman lay, who at that time was (as his maner was) banqueting with great pleafure in his camp and full of wine. Infomuch that when news was brought unto him, that his brother Mula was at hand with a great power he in his drunkennes caused the messenger that brought the news to be beaten, and when he had with greater earnestnes than was to his liking, affirmed that his report to be true he commanded him to be flaine for troubling his mirth. But shortly after, Mula was come so neer, that the vanteurriors of his army skirmished with some of Solymans foldiers. When as Chafis Eurenofes one of his fathers old captains, preffing in, told him that Mafawas abhand, and had skirmithed with part of his army. Wherof Solyman (now far in wine) had no regard, but faid, Good Tutor trauble mee no more : my brother Musa dares not K come fo night me, but if I do but hold up my cap he is gon. With which answere the old Captaine going out discontented, fent in Chafan Age of the Innizaries : who boldly comming to him, told him plainely of the imminent danger, and sharpely reproued him for his intemperance and securitie. With whose free speech Solyman mooned in great rage commanded his beard to be cut off, then no small diffgrace among it the Turks, Chafan presently comming forth thus difgraced, faid to them that flood waiting without, This is the honor wherewith Sultan Solyman in his excellerewards his most faithfull servants. Wherfore best known to you all. I will from henceforth (and not without cause) serve Mula, a Prince of greater temperance and discretion : whose will follow me, come and welcome. So mounting to horse, and accompanied with a number of his lanizaries, (of whom he was greatly beloued) went ouer to Musia, as did, many other great Captains also, with their companies, mooued by his example so to doe. But when Solyman understood that Chafan with most of the Ianizaries, & many other worthy captains, with the greatest strength of his army, were revolted to Mafa, then fast by, and ready to set vpon him; it then repented him too late of his dissolute folly, and finding no other remedy now to escape, hee hid himfelfevntil it was dark night; then taking horfe, accompanied only with Caratze Beg and Cara Muchil two of his Noblemen, and one country Turk whom they had retained for their guide, thought to have fled to Constantinople. This malicious Clown having of purpose led them by vnknown waies all that night, to and fro as it were in a maze, (oftentimes mif-naming vnto them the places they passed by, as if they had bin in the right way) brought them in the morning to a Village not farre from the place from whence they departed the night before: M and there riding a little before them of purpofe, gaue warning vnto a sturdy Peafant or two of his acquaintance, That Solyman was comming after, willing them to make stay of him. Thefe rude country churles, with some others of like breed, running out with bats and staucs, and such other homely tooles as first came to hand, slew CaratZe-Beg and Cara Muchil, who

A would not yeeld vato them, but flood vpon their gard, and took Solyman alive: where, as commay it fallett die in the vulgar peoples fury, some cried out to kill him, and so to end the wers there likewife to burn him; and fome to hang him; and fome few to fauchim: euery one at his rade affection led him. In the heat of this country vptore came Mula, who glad to Gelis breibet solfman fo hard befet, caufed him prefently tobe there ftrangled, when hee had Solyman franreigned in Hadrianople fix years and ten moneths.

Mahomet fifth King of the Turks.

This was the milerable end of Solyman, the eldelt fon which Bajazet left aliue:a man much This Solyman is glaten to excelle otherwile endued with many great vertues, being both of great valor, and excooling bountifull. In his time lived the learned Doctor Achmetes, who wrought the history of others cate. of Abraile the Great in Turkish verse, and published it in the name of Solyman himselfe, for him is the B which be was by him bountedully rewarded. The dead body of Solyman himselfe was by the fife was of the communitation of Musa conveyed to Prusa, and there lieth buried fast by the body of Amupublisgrandfather. So now of these Cadmeian brethren remained none but Mahomet and Meld the one reigning in A fia, and the other in Europ, divers parts of the world, & wel bounded with the fureft bounds of nature: yet not sufficient to content or contain their ambitious minds, with the yonger had most vinaturally denoured the elder: whose lively counterfeit, mit isby the skilfull workman expressed, you may here behold.

Quid properas, infane tuum, peffundare fratrem? Nam feeleris tanti, pramia digna feres. Quicquid enim fratri malefeceru, hoc tibi frater Mon referet, nimis hac in tha fatarnis?

RIC. KNOLLEVS.

Why hastest thou, mad fool, thy brother to confound? The guerdon of fuch villany shall to thy self redound. For look what mischief thou hast wrought, shall turn to thee again: Why doft thou therfore, foolish man, so hasten on thy pain?

Mule presently after the death of his brother Solyman took vpon him the Turkish kingdom G in liurop: who in the beginning of his reigne displaced most of them which had borne great Offices before in the time of his brother Solyman, and had now of late revolted to him, fearing to be by them betrayed or for laken, as his brother was and in their rooms placed others his own creatures. And not so content, proceeded further, upon small causes most unkindely to imprison and put to death many of them which had of him wel deserted. Which cruell death ling to alienated the mindes of his Nobility, that many of them kept themselves out of the way, doubtfully expecting the event of such his tyrappical government. Chase Eurenofes that old and renowned captain to escape his hands was glad to seign himselfe blinde, so to absent himself from court. At this time he also by his Embassadors demanded of divers Christian Princes his neighbors, such tribute as they had in times past either payd or promised to pay H unto his father Bajacet; and in that quartell inuaded many of them, namely the Princes of Servia and Bulgaria, Amongst other, he fent Ibrahim Bassa (a learned man of great experience, and formtime one of his fathers grave counfellors) wnto Emanuel Palaologus the emperor of Constantinople, to demand the like tribute of him, Who so seen as he was come to Constantinople, from thence by letters adversifed Mahamet of the undiffereet government of his brother Mafa in his new gotten kingdom; and what yntimely flirs hee began to make before he was therin wel fetled, losing the loue both of his subjects & neighbor princes: with much other matter concerning his milgouernment. Which things when Mahomes understood, hee fenta messenger with letters backe again to Constantinople, requesting the Bassa to come ouer voto him into Afia, and in token of his great facor fent him diners rich garments, with I many great and princely promifes. Wherwith the Baffa moued and detefting the cruell go-uernment of Mufa, went ouer viro him/to Prufa, and there was of him honorably entertained, and swom one of his priny Counsel : in which place of honor he long time afterwards scrued him faithfully and after him, his fon Amurath alfo.

Mahomet thinking upon the advantage of his brothers cuill government, to find meanes to thrust him out of his kingdom, and so to draw the whole government of the Turkish empire unto himself, as well in Europ as in Asia; assembled an army of sifteen thousand choice soldiers to inuade his brother in Europ, before he were there well established in his Kingdome. And fo shocking down towards the streights of Bosphorus, by his Embassadour concluded a League with Emanuel the Greek Emperor, That none of them should ever wrong or damnifie K the other : And that if Mahomet should hap to obtain the Turkish kingdome in Europe, he should alwaies honour and reuerence the Emperour as his especiall good friend. But if it should chance him to be diffressed or ouerthrown by his brother Musa, that then the Empefor should presently transport him and his Army backe againe into Asia. This League was with great folemniste of words on both parts confirmed. And flortly after, Mahomes with all his Army was by the Emperors shipping at the streit of Bosphorus neer vnto Constantinople, transported ouer into Europ : for Masa possessed of Callipolis, had stopt all the other

Musa having knowledge before of his brothers comming, was forthwith in readincsse to swirt the two meet him with a strong army. So that Mahomet had not marched far from the sea side, but that L bemen & Mu. the vanteurriers of his army met with his brothers at a place called Intzuge, and there began a light skirmish ; wherin Musa his fore runners were by Mahomeis put to flight, and chased vnto Musahis Camp. Wherof such a sudden feare arose in the Army, that they were almost ready to fly, thinking Mahomet had been upon them with all his power: But understanding the truth of the matter, both Armies rested that night; which as then drew fast on. The next day these two brethren, armed with equall hope, brought their Armies into the field, and gaue the fignall of battel, wherupon began a mortall and bloudy fight; in the fury whereof Michael Oeli Baffa of Romania, and certain other of Mafa his chiefe captains, vpon secret discontentment revolted to Mahamet : wherwith many of Mufa his fouldiers discouraged, fied. Which Mahomet his souldiers seeing, pursued the chase with such earnestnesse and fury, that M few were left with himselfe: yet with fuch as were left, in hope of good hap, hee fet voon his brother : who although the was halfe discomfired with the flight of the greater part of his Army, whom the enemies had then in chase, yet flood he fast himselfe with 7000 Ianizaries his belt foldiers fo taking the vnexpected good hap preferred unto him by his brothers forwardmefe valiantly received his charge. But Mahomet finding there a greater ftrength than hee had before supposed and himselfe too weake to withstand the fury of the lanizaries, because monto his men allowere following the chale, was now for fafegard of his life glad himfelfe inflyto Coultantinople, whither he came accompanied scarse with 200 men and was from there according to the agreement before made betwixt him and the Emperour, freedily hipped over into Alia. Musa having thus put his brother to flight, with great flaughter of ble med oreleasely took his tents with all that was therin, and there incamped himself. They of sales army which had followed the chase of such as had fled in the beginning of the hartellstor knowing what had hapned to Mahomet, returned to the camp, doubting no perill: and analy trat their return possessed by their enemies, stood as men amased and veterly disconsided at which time Maja would not fuffer his foldiers to put them to the fword, as they world faine have done, but commanded them to be dispoiled of their armes and such other filing whey had, and fo with life fuffered them to depart.

Afterthis ouerthrow, while Mahomet lay still at Prusa, the Prince of Smyrna forcibly enned into Aidinia, purpoling to passe thorow into Sarnchania. Which thing Mahomes heafing gathered a great army, and effering into the Princes country, made such spoil as he went, and to difference die Prince himfelf, that he was glad to submit himfelfe vnto him, and from theneeforth to hold his dominion of him as of his Lord and Soueraign, and fo returned vnto

Walter could not wel difgeft the loffe he had fo lately received in Europ, and therfore le-C wied an attent of choice foldiers out of all parts of his kingdom, once again to try his fortune against his elder brother Musa. For the better succes wherin, hee by his letters craued and of the prince Dulgader Ogli, written to this effect:

> Sultan MAHOMET, vnto the Prince DVLGADER OGLI, his father in Law.

Mr purpose is so lead myne army into Romania in Europ, and there again to try my quarrel with my Mahamess tec-manner Minsa: My hope is that you will not with your aid be wanting wnto me your son in Law, ters wate the in my fogtest affairs, neither for want of good will to hinder this my purpose. Fare you well. Intheyear of the great Prophet Mahomet 814. From Amafia.

Prince Dulga. der Ogli bu fa.

Prince DVLGADER OGLI, vnto the great Sultan MAHOMET.

Doubt not (most mighty Monarch) but that whither focuer your defires shall draw you for the under-destantive to taking of any great apploit, He that ruleth aboue in heauen will be alwaies your aid, profeer your at- Mahomet, tempts minister with you fit occasions, and bring all your actions unto most happy end, with most assured olderie Wher fore feeling (God fo difofing our affairs) I cannot my felfe in person come vato you with my power and give you my trulty help in shis your intended war : yet will I in no case fail with all speed to find my son your fermant so aid you with our Forces in this war. Fare you well.
This same year of our Prophet 814.

And to thorsty after the Prince sent vnto him his son, according to his promise, with a company of brane foldiers excellently furnished for the welcomming of whom, Mahomet his brothe in law made a great and royal feath and there in his mirth game vnto the yong Prince the het apparel he worch imfelf, with the horfe he rode you, and all the rich plate of gold & filbet wherin they were ferued at that feast, a matter of great valu. And to every one of his Nobles be game a rich garment made for that purpole, with some other gift as a fauor; and after-F wards gave them all to vnder fland, That he intended forthwith to passe ouer into Europ, and meretorecouer all his fathers kingdom, or els there to end his days as for the fooil and prey (Aid he)it that be theirs that can win it; one horse, one sword, one horsemans mace shall content my telf. So having furnished his army with all things needfull for so great an enterprise, belet forward and came to the fireight of Bosphorus, and from thence gaue knowledge of his comming to the Emperor of Constantinople; who glad thereof (for the displeasure here G bare to Musa) transported him and all his army over that fireit into Europe, and there in one of his country palaces royally scasted him. At which time Mahomet requested the Emperour to join with him in that war against their common enemy; but he excused himself by reason of his great age; yet nevertheles affifted him with certain companies of valiant Christians. whose service afterward stood the Turk in great stead.

So Mahames taking his leave of the Emperor, marched with his army to the river Wyzen in Thracia, where by the way he received letters from the antient captain Chasis Eurenoses, ad. uising him to be very circumstant in his marching, and not to make too much hast to join bat. tel with his brother; counselling him also, if he could by any means, to allure legides Basia Rerat Beg, and Sinan Beg, to forfake his brother, and to follow his entignes; for that in those men !! confished Muss his chiefest strength and promised in good time to come vnto him himselie alfo, if he were not too hafty. This messenger that brought this newes, Mahomes bountifully rewarded, and so sent him away. Shortly after, as he was marching toward Hadrianople, part of the enemies army began to shew it selfe under the leading of Cara Calife, and was presently charged by Michael ogli and put to flight. So holding on his way to Hadrianople, he laid liege to the city , where the citisens sent out to him certain of their gravest and most substan. tiall Burgesses, to certific him, that by reason of the garison there left by Musa, they could not as then deliuer the city vnto him, but if it should please him to go and try his fortune in the field against his brother, who should be the commander therof, be should find them ready to follow his good fortune, and to yeeld themselves, the city, and all therin, to his pleasure, if it I were his good hap to carry away the victory. With which answer Mahamet contenting him. selfe, raised his siege, and took the way toward Zagora. In that place Musa is reported to have come secretly disguised into Mahamets camp, and to have taken ful view thereof; but perceiuing himfelf too weak to incounter his brother, withdress his army into the fafegard of the great woods and strong places, and so from thence retyred with his army toward Philippo. polis, and so marched along the river Meritze, called in antient time Hebrus: where legidu Balla, with Ham Za Rag and Ifmir Ogh (three of Mula his great captains) fet vpon the rereward of Mahamas army, and were by Michael Ogh repulled. Mahamas holding on his way, came to Sophia, where as howent, Musa divers times from the mountains made shew of his army, but durst not come down into the plain to give him battell. Mehemet having refreshed his army at Sophia, marched to Sarkiue, where he received Letters from legides Baffa, Barac Beg, and Sinan Beg, all secretly persuaded by old Eurenoses to revolt vnto him: The tenour whereof in brief was this:

IEGIDES BASSA, BARAC BEG, and SINAN BEG, vnto the great Sultan MAHOMET.

E are three young men (most mighty Monarch) and have with us three thousand choice soldiers, men of incomparable valour, such as the world hath scarse the like : draw your forces neere to vs with as much freed as you can, and you shall find vs ready to come over unto you. Fare you well.

Mufa bis chief

Wherupon he marched all the next night after, vntill hee came to the river Moraua, and there incamped : where the three aforenamed Captaines according to their promise joined themselues vnto him with all their soldiers. Thither came also old Eurenoses, of all others the most famous captain among the Turks, and now no longer blinde, bringing with him a great company of most expert soldiers. Mark the Despot of Servia, for the displeasure he bare vnto Mula fent him aid thither alfo. By which supplies Mahamets army was greatly increased, who after he had curredully welcommed all these new come Captains, hee began again to march further, vntil he came to Cossova the vnfortunat plain, where HamZa Beg the Prince of Smirna his fon, haning for laken Musa, came vnto him with flue hundred horse, certifying him that M all the Nobility had for faken his brother. So as he marche from place to place, his forces fill increased by the revolt of his brothers. Mafa seeing his foldiers thus daily fall from him, insomuch that he had almost none now left but the souldiers of the Court (which were indeed his best men of war, and alwaies vnto him faithfull, because hee had bin ever vnto them exceeA diag bountifull) thought it best to attempt something before hee were left himselfe alone. Wherfore having yet with him 7000 of those expert soldiers, he drew neerer to his brother. feeking to have taken him at fome advantage, But Mahomet having knowledge of his purpofe, and contented to be aduised by his old expert captains, had ever a vigilant eye vnto him. Yet at last whether it were vpon good hope, or els prickt forward with dispair, Musa vpon the suddenyaliantly fet vpon his brothers army : but his fouldiers oppressed with multitude, rather than ouercome with true valor, after a hard and bloudy fight were put to the worlt. Which he feeing desperatly brake into the midst of his enemies, seeking there for death among the thickeltof them. But being known by Bajazet Baffa, Mahomets lieutenant general defirons to take him alima he was befet on every fide : where feeing himfelf in more danger to be taken than B flain he with great courage brake from among it the midft of them and fled. In which flight his horse falling into a deepe muddy ditch (or as some others say, hoxed by Sarut so his owner femantand himself wounded) cuerthrew him, and there before he could again recouer himfelfe was taken by Bajazet Baffa the great Lieutenant, Michael Ogli, and Birac Beg, which had Mafa taken, hardly purfued him out of the battel; and so with his hands bound by them brought thorow the midtof the army. Which pittifull fight grieued not a little the hearts of many, to fee himbuteuen now fo great a King, and one of the fons of great Bajazet, by the strange change of forume bound like a captine flaue led forth to execution: yet were most part glad therof. booing this long civill wars would now in him take end. Shortly after came vnto him a Nobleman called Balta Ogli, fent (as they thought) from Mahomet himselfe; who after hee had in C few words bitterly reproued him, for the cruelty by him before shewed vnto his brother Soly-Musa granged man in like case, caused him presently to be strangled with a bow string. His dead body was by and by after presented to his brother Mahames, who seeing it, shed a few Crocodiles teares over it. He reigned three years and feuen months, and was afterward conveyed to Prufa, and ther Amurath. Mahamer after the death of Mufa now free from all competitors, took vpon him the fole go. usernment of the Turkish kingdom as well in Europ as Asia. And here the Turkish Histories begin thereign of this Mehomet fift king of the Turks; accounting the trouble for time from the captivity of Baja (et, vnto the death of Musa, as a time of vacancie or anarchy, wherein the D Turkith kingdome was not at any time wholly possessed by any one of Bajazets sons: Ila posfeffing one part therof, wherof he was by Mahomet dispossessive ho afterward vsurped all that part of the Turkish kingdom in Asia, being the right of his elder brother Solyman: who at that time reigning in Burop, was deposed and strangled by his brother Musa; who was in like manner setued by his yongest brother Mahomet, the only some of Bajazet then left, as is before declared. Which divers mutations and intrrupted fuccessions, was the cause that the historiographers do lo greatly diffent from the fucceffor of BajaZet, fome reckoning one, fome another; fome more, some fewer; and some, such as neuer were. But forasmuch as Mahomet held all or most part of the Turkish kingdom in Asia, during his troublesome time, and in the end possessed the other part therof in Europ also; I reckon him for the fift King of the Turks, and fuccessor to his father. Bajazet: including also in this history of his life, all that intestine and there lieth buried by the body of his brother Solyman, in the fame chappel with his Grandfa-

serpentine like tragedy, wherin he himselfe was the principal aftor. Whilft Mahomer was (as is atorefaid) thus busied in his wars in Europe against his brother 1415 Mula, the king of Caramania taking advantage of his troubles there, with a great army invaded his kingdom joining upon him in Afia, burning and spoiling all before him as hee went: Einafes Baffa, Mabomets lieutenant then lying at Prusa, not able to withstand him; and fearing his comming thirher, because it was the seat of the Othoman Kings in Asia, he cansed the citisens to bring the greatest part of their wealth into the Castle; whereinto he also received as many of the citifuns as he conveniently could, willing the reft to shift for themselves as they might, in such case of extremitie. Shortly after, the King of Caramania (according to his ex-P pectation) came to Prusa, and without resistance tooke the City, not as yet fully sortified; the caramaniwhich be without delay caused the second time to be burnt downe to the ground; and afterwards laid siege to the castle, giving many great assaults therto by the space of 30 dayes, but was alwaies valiantly repulsed by Einases the Bassa, who ceased not continually to encourage his foldiers, fill putting them in comfort, that Mahames having now overcome his enemies in Europe,

Europ, would in few daies undoubtedly come to their reliefe. It chanced at the same time, G that the dead body of Musa sent to Prusa to be buried, was honourably conveyed upon the way, with much people following it. The Caramanian King heating of the comming of such a multitude, and fearing it to have bin Mahomet with his power, raifed his fiege and speedily departed. Wherat the Turks long time after jested, saying, If the Caramanian King tun away for lear of the dead body of the Othoman King, what would he do if he had come against him aline ? But the truth was, he feared Mahomet and his power.

Orchanes the fou of Selyman (yet a boy) having lived at Constantinople ever fince his fathers death, about this time departed thence, because of the league but lately made between the Emperor and his vncle Mahamet, purposing to have gon into Valachia: but by the way as he was trauelling the Turkish voluntary souldiers understanding that he was the son of their H late King Solyman, reforted vnto him in great numbers, offering in his quarrell to fpend their liues. Of which infurrection Mahomet hearing, marched thather in all haft with a great power to suppresse the same of whose comming the soldiers with Orchanes understanding, differsed themselves and fled. As for Orchanes, he was by his value tutor Zaganes betrayed vato his vicle Mahomet, who prefently caused his cies to be put out, and so sent him to Prusa, allowing him great reuenues to line vpou, and ouer after vsed him with great honor. The fifter of this Or chanes he gaue in mariage to one of his noblemen with a great dowry. This is that Orchanss whom some Historiographers reckon vp among the Turkish Kings, as one of Bajazets Succesfors, and that he was betrayed to his worle Mofes: erring, as I suppose both in succession and the name, mistaking Mojes for Mahomet.

Now Mahomet calling to remembrance the injury which the Caramanian King had done 1416 to him in his absence, returning to Prusa, affembled a great army to reuenge himselfe of that madesthecare wrong. At which time he fent to the prince Isfendiar totald, who fent him his fon Cassumes. manian King. He commanded also the Prince German Ogli to make provision for the victualling of his camp, as he should passe by his country; which was accordingly don. And so prouided of all things necessary, he with his army entred into the Caramanian country; where he tooke the cities Aspropolis, Despotopolis, Hierapolis, and besieged Iconium; but by reason of the immoderat rain which at that time fel, her was glad to make peace with the Caramanian King, called also Mahomet, and foraising his siege departed towards Pontus: where he had not long flayd, but that news was brought him, that the Caramanian King renouncing his league, was again up in arms : wherfore recurring into Caramania, and fo to Iconium, he there ouerthrew the King in battell, and took both him and his fon Mustapha prisoners : who redeemed them-

felices by deliuering many of their strong Cities and Castles into his hands : and afterward concluding a peace, they received from him an enfigne (as the Turkish manner is) in token they were now become his vassals.

The Caramanian war thus happily ended the went ouer into Europe, and passing ouer Danubius, forraged the country of Valachia Transalpina, making there great spoil: for redresse wherof the Valachian Prince by his Embassadors sent him such tribute as he demanded and his fon also to serue him in his court. Mahomet, after the death of his brother Mufa, had fent Scheiches Bedredin (his brothers Cade- M lescher) to Nice in Asia, as unto a place of exile; allowing him neuerthelesse a great pension wherento line. This Bedredin had in his house one Burgluzes Mustapha his steward: these two consulted together, how to raise some tumult or rebellion to trouble the peaceable gouernement of Mahemet : for which purpose Burgluzes (according to the plot by them laid) took his

A way into Aidinia (fomtime called Caria) and there pretending great zeal of reforming Religopwith wonderful granitie began to broach divers new and strange opinions, far differing from the Turkish antient superstition, yet very plausible, and well fitting the humour of the valgar people. By which meanes hee was in short time reputed for a famous learned denout man, and had many followers, drawing after him much people, fit to begin fome great innovation Bearing led of his mans fucces, fled from Nice, into the prince Is for hars country, from sheare he took thipping ouer the Euxine into Valachia, and there withdrawing himfelf inmagnest forest, as if the had bin some deuout or religious man, allured vnto him a great number of out lawes and theeues which there lived. Whom when he had fufficiently inftructed and framed to his purpose, he sent them in the habit of religious men into the country of Za-B gore and other places in the frontiers of Mahomets dominions neer vnto him, as his diffinles : who with great boldnes and confidence published Bedredins doctrine and authoritie, & how that he was by God appointed to be the King of justice, and Commander of all the World. whose doctrine and maner of government was (as they faid) already received in Asia, beeing fet forth but by one of his schollers, Burgluzes, whose same was now dispersed throughout all the Turks dominions. And that therfore if any were defirous of preferment, they thould repair to Bedredin, who would in short time shew himself to the world, and promote his followersaccording to their deferts. Many of the country people deluded with this phantalic and practile of these seditious seed men, resorted to Bedredin in hope of preferment, & with them fome of good calling alfo. At last, out of the forrest commeth this great Prophet with ban-C perdifolated attended your with a great multitude of the feditious vulgar people, which daily reforted vito him more and more. Mahomet for the repressing of these dangerous tumules. feet his fon Amurati and BajaZet the great Baffa, with two thousand men to apprehend Burflazer in Aidinia. But when they came thither, they found him garded with three thousand men well appropried, ready to aduenture their lives in defence of their foolish Prophet. Nevertheles Amurat and Bajazes not diffusied with the multitude of those vplandish people, fet vponthem; where was fought a right bloudy battell for the number, and many flaine on both fider: wetat last the Rebels fled, in which flight Burglu Zes himselse was flain and howne Burglu Zes all to pieces. After which victorie BajaZet from thence hasted to Magnesia and there executed Tolac Keman another feditious Turkish Monk, who with two thousand by him seduced, D did much harm in the country therabout. At the fame time also Mahomet fent another power against Bedredin: but most of his followers seeing in him no such matter as was by his disciples and himself promised, and as they hoped for, were already fallen from him; so that of that great multitude which before followed him, few or none were left with him : wherby he was castly apprehended by them whom Mahomet had sent against him : and so being brought to Mahames, to Serras, was there in the market place before a tauern door fair hanged, without nedredin any further harm.

Mahamet in the thort time of his reign finished the great Mahametan temple at Hadrianople, before begun by his brethren Solyman and Musa: Where he also built a princely palace, the feat of the Turkish Kings in Europ, vntil the taking of Constantinople. He also built an other Temple, with a most sumptuous Abby, and a publique school therto adjoining, indowing the same with great reuenues, such as had by him and those his brethren of late bin taken from the Christians. He also gave great sums of mony, yearly to be paid at Medina and Mecha, for the telief of poor pilgrims trauelling from far, to the sepulchre of their great prophet

Mahomet, at Medina, or his temple at Mecha.

Shortly after, Mahamet fell ficke at Hadrianople, and perceiving himfelfe indanger of Mahamet dies death, by his last Will appointed his eldest fon Amurath to succeed him in his king dom, and attadianteles fent Blum-Beg (a man in great fauor with him) in post to Amasia, to wil him with all speed to repair to the Court at Hadrianople. But feeling death to approch, and that he could not poffibly line vntill the comming of his fon, he fireightly charged his Baffa's, with all fecrecy to F conceal his death virill his comming, for fear left any trouble should arise vpon the brute therof, before his comming thicher. And so having set all things in order, he departed out of this world vico his prophet Mahomet, about the year of our Sautor Christ 1422, when he had reigned seventeen years : accounting in his reign that troublesome ten yeares next after the captinity of Bajazet, in which time the Turkes Kingdome was by his ambitious fons rent in funder (as is aforefaid) until it was at length again by this Mahomet restored to the former integrity, about 7 years before his death, which the Turks account the whole time of his reign; and the other troublesom 10 years as a vacancie or anarchy of their kingdom, as is aforefaid.

Mahomes being dead, the three great Baffa's, Einafes, BajaZet, and Ibrahim, torid themselves of the fear they had of the Ianizaries and other foldiers of the court, called a Divano or counfel for the wars, as if the King had bin aline. Wherin it was pretended, that Mahomet had de. termined to make war vpon the prince of Smyrna, & that for that service it was his pleasure. that the Ianizaries should forthwith passe ouer into Asia to the castle of Baga. Whereupon presse mony was presently given them, and they sent ouer with letters directed to the viceroy of Anatolia, for the affembling of an army for Baga. In the mean time the great Baffas of the court fat daily in counfel, placing and displacing, promoting & disgracing whom they plea. H fed, as if the King had fo commanded. The Kings physitians also, to countenance the matter, were commanded continually to go to and fro with their potions and receits, after their won. ted maner, as if they had had the King fill in cure : and letters were fent in post to Eluan Ben. for speedy dispatch of the busines for which he was sent into Asia. Yet for all this cunning diffimulation, the penfioners and other foldiers of the court, wont to be neer the kings perfon. and some of them alwaies of the priny chamber, began to suspect the matter: and comming to the Bassa's, said, they maruelled the King in so long time did neuer shew himself, as he had alwaies before don. Wherunto the Baffas answered, That he had bin dangerously sick, & was as yet but a little recouered, and that therfore the Physitians would not suffer him to looke abroad or take the air, for fear of easting him down againe. Then will wee our felues (laid the I pentioners) go and fee his Majesty, and with that were ready to force in vpon the Bassa's, Eiwafes seeing their importunitie, desired them to hold themselves contented, and not as then to trouble the King, for that he had that day taken physicke; but to morrow (said he) we will request his Majesty, if he so please to thew himselfe, that you may see him. Wherewith they for that time were fatisfied. Now among the Kings physicians there was one Geordiron a Perfian, a man of a quick spirit and subtil deuice, who sound means to deseive the Pentioners: he deuised, that the dead body of the King beeing apparelled in royal large robes, should bee brought betwixt two, as if fice had bin led, into an high open gallery; and beeing there fet, to haue a boy so neatly placed behind him vnder his large robes, as that hee vnperceived might moue the Kings hand up to his head, as if he should stroke his face or beard, as his maner was, K The next day the dead king being accordingly brought forth by the Baffa's in his rich robes, and wrapped with cloaths about his head, as if it had bin for feare of the aire, or taking cold, and so placed in an high open gallery, as was before deuised, suddenly the physician came running in furning and raging as if he had bin halfe mad, ready to teare his cloaths for anger, and in great choler casting his cap against the ground, asked the Bassa's if they meant to kill the King, by bringing him into the open aire > Wee (faid hee) have with great paines, in a long time a little recoursed him, and will you thus foolishly cast him down again. Pardon vs good doctor (faid Einafes) for these gentlemen (pointing to the Pentioners) were so importunat to see his Majesty, that to satisfie their desires, he was content to be led forth of his chamber; where f we hope shall ensu no harm. The pentioners seeing the King many times moue I. his hand to his face, and as it were froking his beard, held themselves wel contented, suppofing him to have bin alive, although but weak, and therefore not willing to fpeak vnto them. The physicians taking them vp smongst them, carried him into his lodging again, which was but fast by, making as if they had caried an extream fick man. Thus was his death cunningly concealed one and forty daies, vntil the comming of Amurath his fon,

This Mahomet was both wife and valiant, and with all exceeding bountifull, but ambitious about measure, who may of right be accounted the restorer of the Turks kingdom; for he recoured again all those Countries in Asia, which Tamerlane had taken away and given to other Mahometan princes, after the overthrow of Bajazet. And when as the kingdome of the Turks was rent in pieces and almost brought to nought by civil wars, and the ambition of his Morethren and himself, he at length got possessing the whole, and so left it to his son Amerath an intire kingdom, in the sormer greatnes, although not so much by him augmented. His body lieth buried in a fair tomb made of artificials stone, very beautifull to behold, in a chap-

THE LIFE OF AMURATH, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, SIXT KING OF THE TYRKS, AND THE GREAT ESTABLI-

SHER OF THEIR KINGDOME.

Fter the death of Mahomet had bin politiquely concealed one and fortie days, by the three great Bassa saya set, Einases, and Ibrahim; Amurai h (or Marai is the Marai as the Turks cal him) his eldest son, at that time comming to Pru- and Desidefa, was by them placed in his fathers feat, and the death of Mahomet at the riss. fame time published. Wherupon great troubles began on every fide to arife. The Princes of Smyrna and Mentesia rose vp in arms: and at Thessalo. Mustapha, 82. nica, an obscure fellow crept as it were out of a chimney corner, took vpon him the name and for rather reperson of Mustaphathe son of Bajazet, who was slain many years before, in the great battell a belien against gainst Tamerlane at mount Stella, as is before declared in the life of the vnfortunate Sultan Amurath. Bajazet. This counterfeit Mustapha, animated by the Grecian princes, and going from Theffalonica to Vardarum, fet fo good a countenance upon the matter, with fuch a grace and Ma-D jefty, that not only the countrey people (apt to believe any thing) but men of greater place and calling alfo, as Tzunites Bee the prince of Smyrna's fon, with the fons of old Eurenofes Buffa,persuaded that he was the very son of the great BajaZet, tepaired vnto him, as vnto their naturall Prince and Soueraign. From Vardarium he went to Serræ, and from thence to Hadrianople (Amurath being then at Prusa) where he was received as if it had bin that noble prince Mustapha, whom he seigned himself to be. So that in short time he was honored as a King in all parts of the Turkish Kingdom in Europ.

Amurath to represse this so great and dangerous a rebellion, sent Bajazet Bassa, a man of great authority in his Court, with a strong army into Europ. This great Bassa passing oues Hellespontus, found all the country revolted vnto their new found King Muslapha: but mar-E ching toward Hadrianople, with purpose to have given him battell, hee was first for laken by the Europeian foldiers which he brought out of Alia, and afterwards of all the rest also ; and beeing left post alone, with his brother HamZe Beg, was for safegard of his life glad to yeeld himself to Mustapha, of whom he was gratiously entertained, and vpon promise of his loialtie

Mustaphathus now possessed of the Turkish kingdome in Europe, and entertaining great thoughts, the better to maintain his credit, leuied a great army to make wat vpon Amurath in Affa. And as hewas vpon his way, at a place which the Turks call Sassidere, or the place of Willowes, his other counsellors repining at the great honor he gaue to Bajazet Baffa, advised bim to beware he trufted him not too far, of whole fmall faith he had fufficient trial already, F and was like enough when occasion should ferue, to reuolt from him to Amurath, & to draw after him some great part of his army, to the great peril both of himself & all them his fairhfull fernants & followers. Vpon which jelous conceit, this great Baffa Baia et was there forthwith as a traitor apprehended, and without further trial executed: at which time his brother Hamzewas with much ado spared. This done, Muftapha proceeded on his journey, and passed

Europ, would in few daies undoubtedly come to their reliefe. It chanced at the fame time, G that the dead body of Musa sent to Prusa to be buried, was honourably conneyed upon the way with much people following it. The Caramanian King heating of the comming of fuch a multitude, and fearing it to have bin Mahomet with his power, raifed his fiege and speedily departed. Wherat the Turks long time after jested, saying, If the Caramanian King tun away for icar of the dead body of the Othoman King, what would he do if he had come against him aline? But the truth was he feared Mahomet and his power.

orchanes the four of Selyman (yet a boy) having lived at Constantinople ever since his fathers death, about this time departed thence, because of the league but lately made between the Emperor and his vnele Mahamet, purposing to have gon into Valachia: but by the way as he was trauelling, the Turkith voluntary fouldiers understanding that he was the fon of their H late King Solyman, reforted vnto him in great numbers, offering in his quarrell to spend their lines. Of which infurrection Mahomet hearing, marched thither in all haft with a great power to suppresse the same of whose comming the foldiers with Orchanes understanding, dispersed themselves and fled. As for Orchanes, he was by his value tutor Zaganos betrayed vato his vicele Mahomet, who prefently caused his cies to be put out, and so sent him to Prusa, allowing him great reuenues to line voon, and euer after vsed him with great honor. The fifter of this Or changes he gaue in mariage to one of his noblemen with a great dowry. This is that Or changes whom some Historiographers reckon vp among the Turkith Kings, as one of Bajazets Succesfors, and that he was betrayed to his vincle Moses: erring, as I suppose, both in succession and the name, mistaking Moles for Mahomet.

Now Mahomet calling to remembrance the injury which the Caramanian King had done to him in his absence, returning to Prusa, assembled a great army to reuenge himselfe of that addesibecura wrong. At which time he fent to the prince Isfendiar totald, who fent him his fon Cassiumes, manian XIII. He commanded also the Prince German Ogli to make provision for the victualling of his camp, as he should passe by his country; which was accordingly don. And so provided of all things necessary, he with his army entred into the Caramanian country; where he tooke the cities Aspropolis, Despotopolis, Hierapolis, and besieged Iconium; but by reason of the immoderat rain which at that time fel, her was glad to make peate with the Caramanian King called alto Mahomet, and for ailing his fiege departed towards Pontus: where he had not long flayd, but that news was brought him, that the Caramanian King renouncing his league, was again p in arms: wherfore returning into Caramania, and fo to Iconium, he there ouerthrew the King in battell, and took both him and his fon Multapha prisoners : who redeemed themfelius by deliuering many of their frong Cities and Castles into his hands; and afterward concluding a peace, they received from him an enfigue (as the Turkish manner is) in token they were now become his vasfals.

The Caramanian war thus happily ended he went ouer into Europe, and passing ouer Danubius, forraged the country of Valachia Transalpina, making there great spoil: for redresse wheror the Valachian Prince by his Embassadors sent him such tribute as he demanded, and his ion also to serue him in his court. Mahamet in the short time of his reign finished the great Mahametan temple at Hadrianople, before begun by his brethren Solyman and Mula: Where he also built a princely palace, the feat of the Turkish Kings in Europ, until the taking of Constantinople. He alto built an E other Temple, with a most sumptuous Abby, and a publique school therto adjoining, indowing the same with great reuenues, such as had by him and those his brethren of late bintaken from the Christians. Wherewith they for that time were fatisfied. Now among the Kings physicians there was one Geordison a Persian, a man of a quick spirit and subtil deuice, who found means to deseive the Pentioners: he denised, that the dead body of the King beeing apparelled in royal large robes, should bee brought betwixt two, as if fice had bin led, into an high open gallery; and beeing there fet, to haue a boy so neatly placed behind him vnder his large robes, as that hee vnperceived might moue the Kings hand up to his head, as if he should stroke his face or beard, as his manerwas. K The next day the dead king being accordingly brought forth by the Baffa's in his rich robes, and wrapped with cloaths about his head, as if it had bin for feare of the aire, or taking cold, and so placed in an high open gallery, as was before deuised, suddenly the physitian came running in, furning and raging as if he had bin halfe mad, ready to teare his cloaths for anger, and in great choler casting his cap against the ground, asked the Bassa's if they meant to kill the King, by bringing him into the open aire : Wee (faid hee) haue with great paines, in a long time a little recoursed him, and will you thus foolishly cast him down again, Pardon vs good doctor(fuid Einafes) for these gentlemen (pointing to the Pentioners) were so importunat to see his Majesty, that to satisfic their desires, he was content to be led forth of his chamber, where f we hope shall enfu no harm. The pentioners seeing the King many times mone L his hand to his face, and as it were stroking his beard, held themselues wel contented, suppofing him to have bin aliue, although but weak, and therefore not willing to speak vnto them. The physicians taking them vp amongst them, carried him into his lodging again, which was but falt by, making as if they had caried an extream fick man. Thus was his death cunningly concealed one and forty daies, vntil the comming of Amurath his fon.

This Mahomet was both wife and valiant, and withall exceeding bountifull, but ambitious about measure; who may of right be accounted the restorer of the Turks kingdom; for he recouered again all those Countries in Asia, which Tamerlane had taken away and given to other Mahometan princes, after the ouerthrow of Bajazet. And when as the kingdome of the Turks was rent in pieces and almost brought to nought by civil wars, and the ambition of his M brethren and himself, he at length got possession of the whole, and so left it to his son Amurath an intire kingdom, in the former greatnes, although not fo much by him augmented. His body lieth buried in a fair tomb made of artificiall stone, very beautifull to behold, in a chappel on the East side of Prusa; where we leave him at his rest.

THE LIFE OF AMVRATH, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, SIXT KING OF THE TYRKS, AND THE GREAT ESTABLI-

SHER OF THEIR KINGDOME

Free the death of Mahomet had bin politiquely concealed one and fortic days, by the three great Baffa's, BajaZet, Einafes, and Ibrahim . Amurach (or Murat is the Murat, as the Turks cal him) his eldest son, at that time comming to Prus same that we fa, was by them placed in his fathers feat, and the death of Mahamet at the fame time published. Wherupon great troubles began on every side to

The Princes of Smyrna and Mentefia rose up in arms: and at Thessalo. Mull. pha, 81nica, an obscure fellow crept as it were out of a chimney corner, took vpon him the name and J. Colon feld person of Mustapha the son of Baja Xet, who was slain many years before, in the great battell a believe against gainst Tamerlane at mount Stella, as is before declared in the life of the vnfortunate Sultan Ammath. Bajazet. This counterfeit Mustapha, animated by the Grecian princes, and going from These falonica to Vardarum, let fo good a countenance upon the matter, with fuch a grace and Ma-D jefty, that not only the countrey people (apt to believe any thing) but men of greater place and calling alfo, as Tzunites Beg the prince of Smyrna's fon, with the fons of old Eurenofe's Baffa, perfuaded that he was the very fon of the great Bajazer, repaired vnto him, as vnto their naturall Prince and Soueraign, From Vardarium he went to Serra, and from thence to Hadrianople (Amurath being then at Prusa) where he was received as if it had bin that noble prince Mustapha, whom he feigned himself to be. So that in short time he was honored as a King in all parts of the Turkish Kingdom in Europ.

Amurath to represse this so great and dangerous a rebellion, sent Bajazet Bassa, a man of great authority in his Court, with a strong army into Europ. This great Basta passing ones Hellespontus, foundall the country revolted vnto their new found King Mustapha: but marching toward Hadrianople, with purpose to have given him battell, hee was first for saken by the Europeian foldiers which he brought out of Asia, and afterwards of all the rest also ; and beeing left post alone, with his brother HamZe Beg, was for fafegard of his life glad to yeeld himself to Mustapha, of whom he was gratiously entertained, and vpon promise of his localtie

Mustaphathus now possessed of the Turkish kingdome in Europe, and entertaining great thoughts, the better to maintain his credit, leuied a great army to make war upon Amurath in Afia. And as he was vpon his way, at a place which the Turks call Saflidere, or the place of Willowes, his other counsellors repining at the great honor he gauceto Bajanet Baffa, admited bim to beware he trufted him not too far, of whose small faith he had sufficient trial already, F and was like enough when occasion should ferue, to revolt from him to Amurath, & to draw after him some great part of his army, to the great peril both of himself & all them his fairhfull feruants & followers, V pon which jelous conceit, this great Baffa Baia Zet was the te forthwith as a traitor apprehended, and without further trial executed; at which time his brother Hamzewas with much ado spared. This done, Mustapha proceeded on his journey, and passed a matrice cound feating, it to have bee Mahomel with his power, raised his siege and speedly was the day herat the Turks long time after jefted, faying, If the Caramanian King tun away rat of the dead body of the Othoman King, what would he do if he had come against him alian ? But the truth was, he feared Mahomet and his power.

crechages the four of Selyman (yet a boy) baning fined at Constantinople ever fince his fathere death, about this time departed thence, because of the league but lately made between all all as a read by cooks Weben t purposing to have gon into Valachia: but by the wavae L. was transiling the Turkith voluntary fouldiers understanding that he was the fon of their H L. K ne viginal reforted into him in great numbers, offering in his quarrell to found their ines. Of which influrection Millionet hearing, marched thither in all haft with a great power to the proceed the fame of whose comming the foldiers with Orchanes understanding dispersed them they and ted. As for Orchanes, he was by his volumental tutor Zaganos betrayed unto his where Mill and who preferrly caused his cies to be put out, and fo fent him to Prufa, allowing him great reachues to line you, and ouer after yied him with great honor. The fifter of this Collaborate plane in marriage to one of his noblemen with a great dowry. This is that Orchans whom tome Hulorographers reckon vp among the Turkith Kings, as one of Bajazets Success ters, and that he was betrayed to his vncle Atofes : erring, as I suppose, both in succession and the name millaking Moles for Mahomet.

Now Mahamet calling to remembrance the injury which the Caramanian King had done to him in his ablence, returning to Prula, affembled a great army to reuenge himselfe of that substitutes wrong. At which time he fent to the prince Isfendiar totald, who fent him his fon Cassumes, "anian Kill. He commanded also the Prince German Ogli to make provision for the victualling of his camp, as he should passe by his country; which was accordingly don. And so provided of all things necessary, he with his army entred into the Caramanian country: where he tooke the citics Aspropolis, Despotopolis, Hierapolis, and besieged Iconium; but by reason of the immoderat rain which at that time fel, hee was glad to make peace with the Caramanian King, called also Mahomet, and foraifing his fiege departed towards Pontus: where he had not long flayd, but that news was brought him, that the Caramanian King renouncing his league, was againsp in arms: wherfore returning into Caramania, and fo to I conium, he there ouerthrew the King in battell, and took both him and his fon Mustapha prisoners: who redeemed themschucs by delinering many of their strong Cities and Castles into his hands: and afterward concluding a peace, they received from him an enfigne (as the Turkish manner is) in token they were now become his vassals.

The Caramanian war thus happily ended, he went ouer into Europe, and passing ouer Darubius, foraged the country of Valachia Transalpina, making there great spoil: for redresse Prince by his Embassadors sent him such tribute as he demanded, and his ion alto to ferue him in his court. About which time hapned a great earthquake in Prula and other places of Asia, wherby many houses and towns were overthrown; after which enfued great troubles in most parts of Asia: howbeit Mahomet going thither, by his presence kept all his dominions in peace and quietnesse.

1 fender Prince of Castamona and part of Pontus, reserving vnto himself Castamona, with a little part more of his dominion, gaue the rest vnto Mahomet, vpon condition that he should restore no part therofagain vnto his son Cassumes; who having long time served in Mahomes his court and Wars, could not be persuaded to returne again vnto his father, and therfore was by him thus dif-inherited. Which great gift Mahomet thankfully accepted of, and in lieu thereof, hee assigned vnto Cassumes other great and large possessions lying within his own kingdome.

Mahemet, after the death of his brother Mufa, had fent Scheiches Bedredin (his brothers Cade- M leicher) to Nice in Afia, as vnto a place of exile; allowing him neuertheleffe a great penfion wherento line. This Bedredin had in his house one Burgluzes Mustapha his steward: these two confulted together, how to raife some tumult or rebellion to trouble the peaceable gouerne ment of Mahamet : for which purpose Burgla Zes (according to the plot by them laid) took his vulgar people. By which meanes hee was in thort time reputed for a famous learned of divine man, and had many followers, drawing after him much people, fit to begin former to a time extion, Bedredinglad of his mans fucces, fled from Nice, into the prince Isfor har country from whence he took shipping ouer the Euxine into Valachia, and there withdrawing himself into a great forest, as if he had bin some denour or religious man, allured vnto him a great number of out-lawes and theenes which there lined. Whom when he had fufficiently inftructed and framed to his purpose, he sent them in the habit of religious men into the coentry of Za-B gora, and other places in the frontiers of Mahomets dominions need vinto him, as her difference who with great boldnes and confidence published Bedredins do Ctrine and authoritie, & how that he was by God appointed to be the King of justice, and Commander of all the World, whole doctrine and maner of gouernment was (as they faid) already receined in Afia, being fet forth but by one of his schollers, Burgluzes, whose same was now dispersed throughout ail the Turks dominions. And that therfore if any were defirous of preferment, they should repair to Bedredin, who would in short time shew himself to the world, and promote his followers according to their deferts. Many of the country people deluded with this phantatic and practile of these seditious seed men, resorted to Bedredin in hope of preserment, & with them fome of good calling also. At last, out of the forrest commeth this great Prophet with ban-C ner displaied, attended upon with a great multitude of the seditious vulgar people, which datly resorted vnto him more and more. Mahomet for the repressing of these dangerous tumules, fent his fon Amurath and BajaZet the great Bassa, with two thousand men to apprehend Burgluzes in Aidinia. But when they came thither, they found him garded with three thousand men well appointed, ready to aduenture their lines in defence of their foolish Prophet. Neuertheles Amurath and Bajazes not difmaied with the multitude of those vplandish people, fet voon them; where was fought a right bloudy battell for the number, and many flaine on both fides: yet at last the Rebels fled, in which flight Burgluzes himselsewas slain and howne Burgluzes all to pieces. After which victoric Bajazet from thence hasted to Magnesia and there executed Torlac Keman another feditious Turkifli Monk, who with two thousand by him seduced, D did much harm in the country therabout. At the fame time also Mahomet sent another power against Bedredin: but most of his followers seeing in him no such matter as was by his disciples and himself promised, and as they hoped for, were already fallen from him; so that of that great multitude which before followed him, few or none were left with him: wherby he was easily apprehended by them whom Mahomet had fent against him : and so being brought to Mahomet, to Serras, was there in the market place before a tauern door fair hange d, without nededin any further harm.

Mahomet in the short time of his reign finished the great Mahometan temple at Hadrianople, before begun by his brethren Solyman and Musa: Where he also built a princely palace, the seat of the Turkish Kings in Europ, until the taking of Constantinople. He also built an E other Temple, with a most sumptuous Abby, and a publique school thertoadjoining, indowing the fame with great reuenues, such as had by him and those his brethren of late bintaken from the Christians. He also gaue great sums of mony, yearly to be paid at Medina and Mecha, for the relief of poor pilgrims trauelling from far, to the sepulchre of their great prophet

Mahomet, at Medin, or his temple at Mecha. Shortly after, Mahomet fell sicke at Hadrianople, and perceiving himselfe indanger of Mahamet dies death, by his last Will appointed his eldest son Amurath to succeed him in his kingdom, and methadians ple fent Eluan-Beg (a man in great fauor with him) in post to Amasia, to wil him with all speed to repair to the Court at Hadrianople. But feeling death to approch, and that he could not poffibly line vntill the comming of his son, he streightly charged his Bassa's, with all secrecy to F conceal his death untill his comming, for fear left any trouble should arise upon the brute therof, before his comming thither. And so having set all things in order, he departed out of this world onto his prophet Mahomet, about the year of our Sautor Christ 1422, when he had reigned seuenteen years : accounting in his reign that troublesome ten yeares next after the captiuity of Bajazet, in which time the Turkes Kingdome was by his ambitious fons rent in funder (as is aforefaid) until it was at length again by this Mahomet restored to the former integrity, about 7 years before his death, which the Turks account the whole time of his reign; and the other troubleson 10 years as a vacancie or anarchy of their kingdom, as is aforesaid.

Malionet being dead, the three great Baffa's, Einafes, BajaZet, and Ibrahim, to rid themselves of the car they had of the Ianizaries and other foldiers of the court, called a Divano or counfel for the wars, as if the King had bin aliue. Wherin it was pretended that Mahomet had determined to make war upon the prince of Smyrna, & that for that service it was his pleasure. that the Ianizaries should forthwith passe ouer into Asia to the castle of Baga. Whereupon presse mony was presently given them, and they sent over with letters directed to the vicerov of Anatolia, for the affembling of an army for Baga. In the mean time the great Baffas of the court fat daily in counfel, placing and displacing, promoting & disgracing whom they plea. H fed, as if the King had so commanded. The Kings physitians also, to countenance the matter, were commanded continually to go to and fro with their potions and receits, after their wonted maner, as if they had had the King still in cure : and letters were fent in post to Eluan Beg. for speedy dispatch of the busines for which he was sent into Asia. Yet for all this cunning diffimulation, the penfioners and other foldiers of the court, wont to be neer the kings perfon. and fome of them alwaies of the priny chamber, began to suspect the matter; and comming to the Bassa's, faid, they maruelled the King in so long time did neuer shew himself, as he had alwaies before don. Wherunto the Bassas answered, That he had bin dangerously sick, & was as yet but a little recouered, and that therfore the Physicians would not suffer him to looke abroad or take the air, for fear of casting him down againe. Then will wee our selucs (said the I pentioners) go and fee his Majesty; and with that were ready to force in vpon the Bassa's. Eiuafes feeing their importunitie, defired them to hold themselves contented, and not as then to trouble the King, for that he had that day taken physicke; but to morrow (faid he) we will request his Majesty, if he so please to shew himselfe, that you may see him. Wherewith they for that time were fatisfied. Now among the Kings physitians there was one Geordiron a Perfian, a man of a quick spirit and subtil deuice, who found means to deceive the Pentioners:he denifed, that the dead body of the King beeing apparelled in royal large robes, should bee brought betwixt two, as if hee had bin led, into an high open gallery; and beeing there fet, to haue a boy so nearly placed behind him under his large robes, as that hee unperceived might mone the Kings hand vp to his head, as if he should stroke his face or beard, as his maner was. K The next day the dead king being accordingly brought forth by the Bassa's in his rich robes, and wrapped with cloaths about his head, as if it had bin for feare of the aire, or taking cold, and so placed in an high open gallery, as was before deuised, suddenly the physician came running in furning and raging as if he had bin halfe mad, ready to teare his cloaths for anger, and in great choler casting his cap against the ground, asked the Bassa's if they meant to kill the King, by bringing him into the open aire? Wee (said hee) have with great paines, in a long time a little recouered him, and will you thus foolishly cast him down again. Pardon vs good doctor (faid Einafes) for these gentlemen (pointing to the Pentioners) were so importunat to see his Majesty, that to satisfie their desires, he was content to be led forth of his chamber, wheref we hope shall enfu no harm. The pentioners seeing the King many times moue L his hand to his face, and as it were stroking his beard, held themselves well contented, suppofing him to haue bin aliue, although but weak, and therefore not willing to speak vnto them. The physicians taking them vp amongst them, carried him into his lodging again, which was but fast by, making as if they had caried an extream fick man. Thus was his death cunningly concealed one and forty daies, until the comming of Amurath his fon.

This Atahomet was both wife and valiant, and with all exceeding bountifull, but ambitious about measure; who may of right be accounted the restorer of the Turks kingdom; for he recoursed again all those Countries in Asia, which Tamerlane had taken away and given to other Mahometan princes, after the overthrow of Bajazet. And when as the kingdome of the

THE LIFE OF AMURATH, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, SIXT KING OF THE TVRKS, AND THE GREAT ESTABLI-

SHER OF THEIR KINGDOME.

Fter the death of Mahomet had bin politiquely concealed one and fortic days, by the three great Bassa's, BajaZet, Einases, and Ibrahim; Amurach (or Murat is the Murat, as the Turks cal him) his eldest son, at that time comming to Prufa, was by them placed in his fathers feat, and the death of Mahomet at the rius, fame time published. Wherupon great troubles began on every side to

The Princes of Smyrna and Mentefia rose vp in arms: and at Thessalo. Mustapha, 84nica, an obscure fellow crept as it were out of a chimney corner, took vpon him the name and jazzin uppried person of Mustapha the son of Bajazet, who was slain many years before, in the great battell a belien against gainst Tamerlane at mount Stella, as is before declared in the life of the vnfortunate Sultan Amurain. Bajazet. This counterfeit Mustapha, animated by the Grecian princes, and going from Thesfalonica to Vardarum, let so good a countenance vpon the matter, with such a grace and Majesty, that not only the countrey people (apt to believe any thing) but men of greater place and calling also, as Tzunites Beg the prince of Smyrna's son, with the sons of old Eurenoses Bassa, persuaded that he was the very son of the great BajaZet, tepaired vnto him, as vnto their naturall Prince and Soueraign. From Vardarium he went to Serre, and from thence to Hadrianople (Amurath being then at Prusa) where he was received as if it had bin that noble prince Mustapha, whom he seigned himself to be. So that in short time he was honored as a King in all parts of the Turkish Kingdom in Europ.

Amurath to represse this so great and dangerous a rebellion, sent Bajazet Bassa, a man of great authority in his Court, with a strong army into Europ. This great Bassa passing ouer Hellespontus, found all the country revolted vnto their new found King Mustapha: but marching toward Hadrianople, with purpose to have given him battell, hee was first forsaken by the Europeian foldiers which he brought out of Asia, and afterwards of all the rest also; and beeing left post alone, with his brother HamZe Beg, was for safegard of his life glad to yeeld himself to Mustapha, of whom he was gratiously entertained, and vpon promise of his loialtie fworn one of his priny Councel.

Mustapha thus now possessed of the Turkish kingdome in Europe, and entertaining great thoughts, the better to maintain his credit, leuied a great army to make war vpon Amurath in Asia. And as he was vpon his way, at a place which the Turks call Saslidere, or the place of Willowes, his other counsellors repining at the great honor he gaue to Bajazet Bassa, advised 256

outer with his army at Callipolis into Afia. Amurath understanding of the proceedings of G Malapha in Europand his preparation made for the inuation of Afia, created three new Baf-(a) comer I rune, and Alis, all the fons of Temurtales; these he joined with his old Bassa's, Ibraham and Emales. All these five he yied as his Counsellors for the Wars; by whose advice he tent for Muhamet Beg syrnamed Michael Ogli, who in the time that Mula reigned was Vicerov in Europe, and therefore a man wel known to most principall men in Mustapha's army, but had bin kept prisoner in the Castle of Amasia, from the time that Musa was deposed and put to death by his brother Mahomet, until now that he was after 8 years imprisonment, for this foe-cial purpote inlarged and received into favor.

About the tame time that Mullapha fet footing in Afia, Amurath having gathered his army let forward from Prufa; yet with fuch distrust in his forces (which were thought to bee much H interior to the Europeian foldiers that followed Mustapha) that he was glad vpon a superstitious opinion, to profirst himfelfe at the feet of an Emir, one of the false prophet Mahomets potheritie, to receive at his hypocritical hands a graceles bleffing for his better speed. By whom be was made to belocue, that after two repulses, hee had with much ado at the third time obtained grant of the prophet Mahomet, that he should prevail in that War: and therupon had his fword girt ynto him with the Emirs holy hands, with many other vaine and superstitions commonies. Yet for all these charms, he marched on with his army in fear enough, vntill hee came to the river of Vlibad, otherwise called Rindacus: where having intelligence of the apwtoch of Mullapha, he for fear caused the bridge ouer the river there to bee broken downe, and meaniped himself on that fide the river. Not long after came Multapha, and finding the bridg 1 broken, incamped at the foot therof on the other fide, fo that nothing parted the two Armies but the fluer only. Whilst they lay thus neer incamped together, that the soldiers might on both fides take the full view one of another, and alfortalk together; Mahomet Beg (fyrnamed Wishael ogh) but lately delivered out of his long imprisonment (as is aforesaid) came to the truer fide, and with a loud voice called by name upon the great Captaines and old fouldiers that were in Mustapha's Army; asking by name for many of his old friends and acquaintance. Many of them being there prefent, rejoicing to fee that honourable man, whom they suppofed to have bin dead in prison many years before, came gladly to the side of the river to heare what he could fay.

Then with a loud voice he began to perfunde them, that the man whom they followed was K not the honourable Muftapha, but some base high minded fellow set up by the Grecians, abufing the obfcuritie of his birth, as the vail under the couert wherof he went craftily to intrude himfelfe into the honourable different of Bajazet; and fo masking in the counterfeit titles of from honor, had mif-led them from their duty to their naturall King and Sourraign, to follow him a meer Deceiver. And further affured them, That Mustapha (BajaZet his fonne) was dead and buried in the bed of fame 22 years before, honorably ending his daies in defence of his country, in the great battell of mount Stella against Scanderbeg: wherfore they thould do wel to forfake that supposed Mustapha, and again to yeeld their dutifull obedience vnto their vindoubted Soueraign Amurath. Thefe words delivered vinto them by Mahomet (whom they generally both reverenced and trufted) wrought such effect in their minds, that some present- L ly aduentured to fwim ouer the river, and joined themselves vnto him; and many others that flaid flil, began now to doubt lest they had worshipped a wrong Saint. At the same time alio, Linafes Baffa to terrifie Mustapha, sent vnto him letters as in great secret, aduertifing him, That Amurath had the next night purposed with his Army to passe ouer the river above the broken bridge; at which time the chief Captains of his army being (as he faid) corrupted, had promited to deliner Mustapha into his hands, and with his head to pay the ransom of them all-This he colored with fuch fair gloffes, that Mustapha partly beleeved the same. So when the dead time of the night was come, Einases with certain troups of horsmen passed ouer the riuer at the very tame place he had in his letters named; and that with fuch a noise & tumult, as Amurath with his whole army had been comming. Mustapha seeing things begin to worke M thus, according as Einafes Baffa had before written; and with this, doubting also to be presently betrayed; and carrying about him a guilty conscience (the mother of fear and distrust) took horse (slenderly accompanied but with ten persons of his whole army) and fled in hast, no man pursuing them, vntill he came to the river of Boga, and there with a great summe

A of mony obtained passage, by corrupting the Captain that dwelt in the Castle voon the pasfage of the river; and the third day after, passing over the streight of Hellespontus, landed at Callipolis. The flight of Mustapha once known in his army, they all yeelded themselves ynto Einafes Baffa; who taking poffession of Mustapha's tent, caused the broken bridge to be repaired: wherby Amurath passing with his Army, joined himself with Einases. The other Bassa counfelled Amurath to put to the sword all those rebels that had followed Mustapha. But by the mediation of Einales (to whom they had yeelded themselves) they were all generally par-

Amurath departing from Vlibad or Lopadium, came to Boga, and there banged the Captain that had given Multapha paffage. From thence he held on his way to Lampfacum, inten-B ding to pursue Mustapha into Europ:but being come to the sea side he could find no passage, for that Multapha had caused all the shipping on that side to bee brought ouer into Europe. Yet at last Amurath by good fortune chanced upon a great Genoa ship, which he hired for 4000 ducats to transport his army, and so with much ado at length landed in Europ. Multaphase ing that Amurath was now come over, fled to Hadrianople, where hee found such cold entertainment, that fearing to be betrayed, he was glad to speed himselfe thence, thinking all the world too little to hide himself in and so came to an obscure place in the country of the Turks, called Kiful-Agatze-Genitze: where the foldiers fent to purfue him, ouertooke him, and brought him bound to Amurath, then being at Hadrianople : by whose commandement he was shamefully hanged from the battlements of one of the highest towers of the city, and Mustable. C there left to the worlds wonder.

This Multapha of some writers is reported to have been indeed the son of the great Sultan BajaZet, and that he was kept in prison all that long time, & thus at length fet yo by the Greeks. to trouble the state of the Turkish kingdom. But the Turkish histories report as before, calling him Dusme or counterfeit Mustapha. And it is very likely, that if he had bin one of the fons of Bajazet, he would have found fome meanes to have made fome great stir long before that, as all the rest of the viquiet broad of Bajazet did, which never tested vitill they had like the earth born brethren one destroied another. Besides that their bloudy natures considered, it is very like that Mahomet his yonger brother, who reigned in Hadrianople almost 8 yeares, and was in league all that time with the Emperor of Constantinople, would for his more safe-D ty haue got him into his own power, if he had been in prison with the Emperour; or els haue dispatched him if he had bin in prison with himself. All which I am the rather persuaded to think, for that Orchanes a child, the fon of Solyman, could find no fafe place of abode at Conflantinople in the reign of Mahomet, but flying, was apprehended, and his cies put out, as is before declared in the life of Mahomet. Much leffe is it like, that Mustapha beeing a warlike Prince, and his elder brother, could have been fo long preferued and kept in prifon from his

It fortuned in these late broiles (as oftentimes it doth with others in like cases) divers of Two Asapi fold the rebels Asapi or common souldiers, whom he for his greater countenance had apparelled by a Janizarie and armed like Ianizaries, to fall into the hands of the true Ianizaries, Amurath his faithfull bead, gard; whose lines indeed they spared, but vsing them with all the despight and indignities possible. Among the rest, one of the Ianizaries being hungry, brought two of these Asapi his prisoners vnto a cooks shop, offering to sel them vnto him for a little victual: which the cook refused to give him, having novse for such vnnecessary servants. Wherwith the proud Ianizarie inraged, lwore many a great oath, presently to cut off their heads and to give them him for nought, if he would not for a thing of nought redeem them. And like enough hee was to haue fodon, had not the Cooke, moued with pitty, offered him for them both a sheeps head; which the Ianizary tooke, swearing that the Cook had given for them more than indeed they were worth. Which difgrace so long since done vnto these Asapi, is yet oftentimes by way of reproch in great contempt, by the masterfull and insolent Ianizaries, obiected to the whole F body of the Asapi, the greatest part of the Turks huge armies; of whom for all that, the proud lanizaries make small reckoning, acounting them scarse for men, and in their rage of tentimes telling them, that two of them are not worth a fodden sheeps head.

Amurath having at length with much adoe thus pacified the dangerous rebellion raised constantinople by the counterfeit Mustapha both in Europe and Asia, was yet not a little grieued to thinke in vaint hesse.

how the same had bin first plotted by the instigation of the Greekes, and afterwards assisted G by the Greek emperor, of whom he thought now to be reuenged. And therfore fending before him Atichael oglishis lieutenant general in Europ, with his Europeian fouldiers to inuade the country about Constantinople, followed himself after with the Ianizaries and his Asian forces; and to incamping before the city, filled all that neck of land which lieth before it, from tea to fea. And to incamped began right furiously to batter the wals, in hope to to have made a breach, and by the fame to have entred the city. But finding the Walls of greater strength than he had before supposed and the defendants stil repairing what soeuer the sury of his Artillery had beaten down or thaken, he ceased his battery, and comming on with all his forces. desperatly attempted by assault to have gained the city:wherin his fortune was not answerable to his defire; for approching the city, with arrows as shours falling upon the defendants. H and scaling ladders in the mean time clapt up to the wals, and the Ianizaries with other of his be (t foldiers valiantly mounting the fame, they were by the defendants notably repulfed and beaten down, loting fome their hands, fome their arms, fome their heads, but most their lives, no thot falling in vain from the wals. Which Amurath beholding, and gricued to fee (though vowilling) commanded a retreit to be founded, and the affault given ouer: and shortly affer feeing no hope to preuail, in great rage raifed his fiege and departed. Vnto whom for all that the Greek Emperor not long after fent his embassadors to intreat with him for peace-wherof he would by no means hear, but proudly threatned to be ere long of all his wrongs reuenged: which caufed the Greek Emperor to deuise what he might for the troubling of his estate, so to keep him otherwise busied. As he did shortly after with the Caramanian king, by counte- I nancing another Mullapha (fyrnamed Cutzug, or the little) Amuraths yonger brother, against him, to the raising of new stirs, and Amuraths no small trouble.

Atthoret the late King had five fons and feven daughters, whereof Amurath was the eldeft. and succeeded in his fathers kingdom; Mustapha the second, syrnamed the little; Achmetes the third, who died before his father: the other two, lof phus & Machmutes, both died of the plague being but children, after the death of their father. Three of their fifters were maried to three fons of the King of Caramania, Ibrahim, Aladin, and Isa: other two were bestowed upon the sons of the prince Isfendiar, Ibrahim and Casimes: the fixt was given in mariage to Coz 7a-Beg Vice-100 of Anatolia: and the seuenth to the son of Ibrahim Bassa, who died at Mecha, whither shee went upon superstitious denotion on pilgrimage.

At such time as Amurath was busted in his wars in Europe, against Mustapha the supposed fon of Bajazet, the yonger ton of Mahomet (called also Mustapha) beeing but 13 years old, and Amurath's brother indeed, was fet up to raife new troubles, by the King of Caramania & other Princes, as wel Mahometans, as the Christian princes of Grecia; who thought it good policy by that means to impeach the greatnes of Amurath. This yong prince Mustapha, strengthned with the forces of his friends, entred into his brothers dominions in Afia, and befieged Nice, which was at length yeelded to him. Amurath advertised of this new rebellion, by great gifts and large promifes corrupted Ilias Beg the yong princes tutor, to betray the Prince vnto him. Wherupon Amurath with great celeritie fet forward with his army from Hadrianople, & in nine daies came to Nice, where he entred the City with small resistance, as was to him before L promised, where Mustapha was by his false tutor presented to him; who because he would not spill one drop of the sacred Othoman bloud (as the Turks call it) commanded the executioner prefently to strangle him with a bow string; which was don accordingly, and his body afterwards buried by his father at Prusa.

Amurath having repressed these two rebellions, and now out of all sear of any competitor, thought his fine counfellors too many by three, and therefore removed the three Baffa's, Omure, Vrut \(\chi_i\), and Alis (the fons of Temurtafes) into honorable places; retaining of his Counfel only the two old Baffa's, Ibrahim and Einafes. But shortly after, Einafes was secretly accused to Amurath, that he fought by his fauorits the foldiers of the Court, to aspire vnto the Kingdom it selfe, and to depose the King, and that intending some such matter, he did vsually wear M a priny coat. This suspitious report troubled the jealous Tyrant. Wherfore on a time as he rode accompanied with Einases, he cast his arm about him as if it had bin in kindnesse: but finding him fecretly armed, he would needs know the cause therof. Whereunto Binases answered, That it was for sear of some enemies he had in the Court. But this excuse could by

A no means serue his turn, but that he was forthwith apprehended by Amurath's commandment, and both his eies burnt out with a hot steel glasse.

Whilft Amurath was thus busied in subduing rebellions at home, Muhametes the Carama- eyes put out. nian King besieged Attalia a great city in Pamphilia, by the space of six moneths, which was valiantly defended by Hamza Beg, Amuraths lieutenant there. At which fiege the infortunate King himself, as he was taking view of the City, was slaine with a great shot out of the City. The Caramania Whereupon Ibrahim (who succeeded him in the kingdome) brake up the siege, and returned an King stain. home to bury his father. At this time also Dracula Prince of Valachia, passing over Danubius did the Turks much harm about Silistra; but was afterwards inforced to submit himselfe to Amurath, and become his tributary.

About this time also TZunites prince of Smyrna, which had before aided the rebel Mustapha, did by all means he could vex Iaxis Beg, Amuraths lieutenant in Aidinia; and having by chance taken his brother prisoner, put him to death. This prince of Smyrna was descended of the antient princes of Aidinia, and therfore pretended an interest in that feigniory, Which his claim the people of the country secretly favored, so far as they durst for fear of the Turks. Amurath hearing of the harms which this prince of Smyrna did, commanded Hamze Beg viceroy of Anatolia, with all his power to make war vpon him. The viceroy without delay affembled a great army, and inuaded the princes country; and the prince beeing well provided for his comming, meeting him vpon the way, gaue him battel wherin Hafan the Princes fon leading a great part of his fathers Army, had put one part of the Turkes Army to flight: & pur-C fuing them with too much fury, left his father at the fame time so hardly beset by the viceroy. that he was glad to fly to his castle of Hipsily hard by. Hasan returning from the chase of the enemy, not knowing what had hapned to his father, was by the Turks in his return ouercome and taken prisoner. After which victory the viceroy presently laid siege to the Castle wherin the prince was. The fiege continued a great while: at length the prince brought to extremity was content to yeeld himfelf vnto the Viceroy, vnon condition he should vse no violence against the person of himselfor his son, but to send them prisoners to Amurath. Which thing the viceroy by solemn oath promised, wherupon the prince came out of the castle, & yeelded himself prisoner to the Viceroy. land Beg, whose brother the prince had before put to death, attended the going of Hamze the Viceroy to his tent, where finding Hasan the princes fon fit-D ting vpon the ground, as the maner of the Turks is, took him by the collar with great fury, and drawing him along to the feet of the Prince his father, there most cruelly struck off his head : and in the same rage laying his hands upon the aged Prince, strooke off his head also; to the great dishonor of the Viceroy, who had before given his faith for their fafety. The heads of the prince and his son were set upon two launces, within the sight of the castle which the de-

Amurath having laid up in the depth of his thoughts the remembrance of that the Greci-E an Princes had don, in giving aid to the Rebels aforefaid, thought it now high time to take reuenge of that wrong; and for that purpose gathered a great army, wherwith he ranged at his pleasure thorow Macedonia, until he came to Thessalonica; surprising by the way divers cities and castles belonging to the Constantinopolitan empire. This famous city Thessalonia Thessalonica ca, now called Salonichi, for beauty & wealth somtime not inferior to any of the greatest and besieged. most renowned cities of Grecia, is scituate vpon the borders of Macedonia, close by a bay of the Archipelago or the sea Ægeum, which bay was in antient time called Thermaicus-Sinus, and now the bay of Salonichi. To the Christian congregation there dwelling, S. Paul wrot two Epistles, in the later whereof he forewarneth them of a great desection to come before the later day. Before this Christian city, then in the Venetians protection, Amurath infendants feeing, and now despairing of all rescue, yeelded themselues with the Castle. This vnfortunat Tzunites was the last prince of Smyrna; after whole death all his territory was vnited to the Othoman kingdom. After all these troubles, Amurath with great triumph maried

F camped his army of mif-beleening Turks, and laid hard fiege to it with most terrible battery. At which time he by secret means corrupted certain of the wicked citisens to have betraied the city by a secret mine, and to have let him in : which treason was by the Venetian Gouernors perceiued, and the plotters therof for safegard of their lines glad to leape ouer the walls, and to fly into the Turks camp.

Amurath having greatly battered the walls of the city, the more to incourage his foldiers. G promised to give them all the spoil therof if they could by force win it. The greedy defire of this rich prev (wherin enery common foldier promifed vnto himfelf what foeuer his foolish fancie or ynbridled affection could defire, so inflamed the minds of these barbarous soldiers. and clos cially of the lanizaries, that giving a most terrible assault to the City, they by force carried the fame and won it. The Venetian foldiers fled to their gallies lying at anchor in the hauen, and fo got to fearbut the infinit miferies which the poor Christians endured in the fury of that barbarous nation, no tongue is able to expresse, or pen describe; death was les pain than the ignominious outrages and vn peakable villanies which many good Christians there fuffered, heartily withing to die and could not; and yet the furious enemies (word deuoured all the people without respect of age or fex, except such as for strength of body, or comlines H of person were reserved for painfull labor or beastly lust; which poore soules were afterwards differfed into most miserable servitude and slavery thorow all parts of the Turkish kingdom. The infinit riches of that famous city became a spoil to the barbarous soldiers, and the goodly houses were left desolate void of inhabitants. Thus the beautifull city Thessalonica, fometime one of the most glorious ornaments of Grecia, the late pleasant dwelling place of many rich Christians, was by the tyrant given for an habitation to such base Turks as at their pleafure repaired thither to feat themselves and so is at this day by them possessed. This calamitic hapned to Thessalonica in the year of our Lord 1432.

The stalonica being thus taken, Amurath returned to Hadrianople himself, and at the same time tent Caratze with the greatest part of his army into Ætolia. Charles Prince of that country, dying a little before the comming of Amurath to Thessalonica, and having no lawfull istue, had divided the country of Acarnania among his three base sons, Memnon, Turnus, & Herculcist leaving all the rest of his dominions to his brothers son, called also Charles. But shortly after, such discord fell among these brethren, that Amurath sending his Turkes to aid one of them against another, as he was by them requested, in fine brought all that country of Ætolia into tubjection to himselfe, leaving nothing for the foolish brethren to striue for, more than the bare titles of imaginative honor. The other Grecian Princes, of Athens, Phocis, Boetia, and all the rest of Grecia vnto the streit of Corinth terrified by their neighbours harms were glad to submit themselves vnto the Barbarian yoke, and to become tributaries vnto the Turkith tyrant: vnder which flauery they have of long time most miserably lived, if intolerable K flauery joined with infidelitie may be accounted a life. Thus the Grecians loft their liberty, which their ancestors had many times before to their immortall praise worthily defended against the greatest monarchs of the world, and are now so degenerated, by means of the Turkith oppression, that in all Grecia is hardly to be found any smal remembrance of the antient glory therof: infomuch that whereas they were wont to account all other nations barbarous in comparison of themselves, they are now become no lesse barbarous than those rude Nations whom they before fcorned. Which mifery with a thousand more they may justly impute to their own ambition and discord.

At this time, among the diffressed princes of Macedonia and Grecia, one John Castriot reigned in Epitus, who feeing how mightily the Turk prevailed against the Princes his Neigh- L. bors, and confidering that he was not able by any means to with stand so puissant an enemy; to obtain peace, he was glad to deliver into Amurath his possession his four sons, Stanistic, Repo-(im. Constantine, and George, for hostages: whom Amurath faithfully promised, well and honotably to intreat. But as foon as he had got them into his reach he fallified his oath, and cauted them to be circumcifed after the Turkish maner, and to be instructed in the Turkish supersistion, to the great grief of their Christian parents: and afterwards when hee understood of the death of George Castrot their father, he poisoned all the three elder brethren, and by Se-Laly (one of his chief captains) feifed upon Croia his chief city, and all the rest of his territories, as if they had by good right devolved to him. But George the yongest, whom the Turks named Scanderhee or lord Alexander, for his excellent feiture and pregnant wit, he alwayes en- M tirely loued, and as fome thought, more passionatly than he should have loued a boy. Him he caused to be diligently instructed in all kind of activitie and feats of war, wherin he excelled all other his equals in Amuraths court; and rifing by many degrees of honor, came at last (being yet but very yong) to be a great Sanfack or gouernor of a prouince, and was many times

A appointed by Amurath to be General of his armies; in which service he so behaved himselfe. that he got the love of all that knew him, and increased his credit with Amurath, vntill at last he found opportunity, by his great policie and courage, to deliner both himselfe and his native country from the horrible flavery of the Turkish tyranny, as shall afterward be declared.

Shortly after that Amurath had thus daunted the princes of Grecia, hee turned his forces into Servia: but the prince of Servia, vnable to withstand so mighty an enemy, to procure his fauor fent Embassadors, offering to pay him a yearly tribute, and to do further what he thould reasonably demand. Amurath besides the yearly tribute, required to have Mary this princes fair daughter in mariage; and that he should not suffer the Hungarians to passe thorow his country to inuade him; and further, not at any time to deny passage vnto the Turkish Army, B when he should fend forth the same for the inuation of the kingdom of Bolna. All which vn. reasonable conditions the prince was glad to agree vnto, and sent his fair daughter by Saratze, who was afterward maried to Amurath.

mong the Turks, died of the plague at Prula.

Whilst Amurath was thus butied in his wars in Europ, the King of Caramania his brother in law inuaded his dominions in Afia: for so it was agreed betwixt the Christian princes of Europ, and the Mahometan princes of Asia, to whom the greatnes of the Othoman Kingdome was now become dreadful, That when soeuer he inuaded the Christians in Europ, the Maho-C metan princes should inuade his countries in Asia: and that whensoeuer he should turne his forces into Asia, the Christian princes should spoil his countries in Europ. Against this Caramanian king Amurath transported his army into Asia; and as he went, seised upon the countries of Sarucania, Mentesia, and other provinces, before but tributaries vnto him, driving out the poor princes before him; and so entred into Caramania, and inforced the King so far, that he was glad to agree to fuch conditions of peace as it pleased the King to propound to him, and to fend his fon to wait at his court. And at the fame time picking a quarrel with Isfendiar prince of Castamona, caused him to become his tributary, & to send his son to his court allo. By which means the name of Amurath became terrible to all the Mahometan princes.

When Amurath had thus quieted all his troubles in Asia, he recurred to Hadrianople; and D vnderstanding that the Hungarians passing ouer Danubius, had in his absence made divers incursions into his dominions, he was therewith greatly offended; and in reuenge thereof, sirst fent Alis Baffathe fon of Eurenofes, with an army to invade Hungary; which he performed ac- nungary fluid cordingly by the space of a moneth, and returned from thence with rich booty. Not long af- by dimination ter, he himself in person made another road into Hungary, commanding the prince of Servia his father in law to give his army free paffage through his country; and charging Dracula the Prince of Valachia to aid him with his forces in that expedition. Which his command both the Christian princes, more for fear than of good will, diligently performed, So Amurath hauing inriched his foldiers with the spoil taken in Hungary, returned home and wintred at his court at Hadrianople. The fecret confederation between the Hungarians and the Mahometan King of Caramania, was not vnsuspected of Amurath, which hee was the rather induced to believe, for that whenfoeuer he inuaded the one, he was prefently fet vpon by the other either in Europe or in Asia: of which plot he doubted not but that George Prince of Servia (his father in law) was the chiefauthor, although in shew he was therin the least actor. Wherfore Amurath intending to spill the play, sent for the prince his father in law to come to the court at Hadrianople: but he doubting some Turkish tragedy, pretended great occasions that he could not come 3 and seating that which afterward felout, fortified and manned all his strong cities and castles by all means he could possibly, especially his chief city Semendre (otherwise called Spenderovia) and left therin his fon Gregory (or as some call him George) as Gouernor: for his other son Ste-F phen was long before in Amurath his Court, with the Queen his fifter. The Prince of Servia went himselfe into Hungary, to procure from thence some aid, having there also himselfe certain territories, which hee had in exchange of Sigismundus (late Emperour and King of Hungary) for the city of Belgrade. It was not long after, but Amurath forgetting both the affinitic and league he had with the Prince his father in law, entered with a great Army into

Arm athera- Servia, defiroyed all before him, and hardly befreged Semendre: where after long frege, the G Song Gonernor the Princes fon, doubting to fall into the enemies hands by fudden affault. veelded himself with the city. Which thing so discouraged the rest of the Servians, that in thort time Sophia, Novomont, with all the rest of the cities of Servia were yeelded into the power of Amurath, After which conquest he returned to Hadrianople, and hearing that the Prince of Servia with the Hungarians were making head against him, and that the two yong Servian Princes, Gregory and Stephen his wives brethren, had intelligence with their father, he commanded them both to bee cast in orison at Didymoticum, and their eies cruelly to bee burnt out with a braten baton made red hot, a common unmerciful practife among the Turks

About this time, Albertus duke of Austria having before maried Elizabeth the only daugh. rer of S. ersmund the Emperor, and succeeding his father in law both in the empire and King. H dom of Hungary: (vnto which type of highest honor nothing more furthered him than the remembrance of Sigismund) in the second year of his reign, before he was wel settled in his new archieued honors, died of the flix, as he was making great preparation against Amurath the Turkish King: who having lately driven George Prince of Servia and Rascia out of his dominion, had now extended the Turkish kingdom even vnto the borders of Hungary. This Albertwo dying, left his wife great with child. The Hungarians (in whose minds the remembrance of Sigifmund was yet fresh) could have bin contented to have lived under the government of the Queen his daughter, the widow of Albertus, (then great with child) but that the Turkish King was now grown to great, and come to nigh, that it was thought more than needfull by Tolin Huntades and other of the Hungarian nobility, for defence of that kingdom, not wholly to rest upon the deuotion of the people toward the Queene, and the expectation of her issue, (wherby they should be nothing strengthned) but to make choice of some great prince, by whose power they might the better defend themselves and the kingdome against their dangerous enemics. Wherupon with confent of the Queen it was refolued vpon to make choice of Vladiflam the yong King of Polonia, then a prince of great power, but of far greater fame and expectation and by Embassadors to offer vnto him the mariage of the Queene, and with her the kingdom alfo. This embassage being sent vnto Vladislams, the matter was to and fro debated in the Polonian court, whether it were to be accepted of or not. Some began to speak of the inequalitie of the match, confidering that the King was but in the prime of his youth, and the Queen wel stept in years, viging further, that nothing was offered in that march bot K wars, and that the Hungarians therin fought for nothing more, than by the Polonian forces to defend themselves against the Turks. Others of the contrary opinion said, that the vniting of those two mighty kingdoms would be to the great good of them both, and to the great honor of the King, whose very name would therby become terrible vnto the Turks : and that it were greater policy, by the forces of both the kingdomes, to keepe the Turkish king f om entring into Hungary, than to leave that kingdom to him for a prey, and afterwards be inforced to fight with the fame enemy in the heart of Polonia: and as for inequality of years betwixt the King and the Queen, it was not fo great a matter, that in regard therof, fo honourable and commodious allyance thould bee rejected; for a funch as Princes doe more regard the vertues of their choice, with the increase of their honour, and wealth of their kingdomes, L than the fummer fruit of youth and beauty, which of it selfe in short time doth rot & perish, although it were neuer fo carefully kept and preserved. And that for a smuch as there can bee but one King in a kingdome, fuch choice was to be preferred of Kings, as had not therein the greatest hope of many children. After long deliberation, Vladislaus gave answer to the embasfadors, That he would accept of the offers by them made. Wherupon some of them returned age that to make relation to the queen, and some of them staid behind to hasten the King forward. But ting time sfitted whilst these things were a doing, the Queen was in the mean deliucred of a faire sonne, whom the caused to be baptised and named Ladislaus. After the birth of this child, the queen mooued with a motherly affection, began to repent her felfe, that shee had given her consent for the calling in of the Polonian King, to the prejudice of her fonne. And being animated by M some of the Hungarian Nobility (who presuming of the good grace they were in with the Queene, hoped to grow great themselves, if they might first draw the government of that kingdom to the Queen and her yong fon) determined now by all means to exclude the Polonian King: but the greater part of the Nobility better confidering what was most expedient

A for the present estate, and that they could neither with honour or safety fly from that which was before, for the common good, by the Embassadors concluded; continued firme in their former resolution for the bringing in of Vladislatus. So that by this meanes, some taking part with the queen and her yong son, and others standing fast for Vladislams, the kingdom of Hungary was divided into two factions, and as it were rent in pieces, and so grew to civil Wars. The Queen with such as fauored her claim, the more to gain the minds of the common people (who are many times no leffe caried away with shewes than matter) caused her fon Ladia flaus (being then but three months old) folemnly to be crowned king at Alba Regalis, the viuall place for the coronation of the Hungarian Kings. But after that the Polonian King had entred into Hungary with a goodly army, and joined his forces with his friends, most part of B them which before followed the Queen and her fon, revolted vnto Vladislaus. So that when she had don what she could, she was glad at last to commit the tuition of her sonne, together with the crown of Hungary, to Frederick the third, then Emperor, neuer ceasing for all that, to the vemost of her power, to trouble the gouernment of Vladiflans, continually stirring vp great wars against him both at home and abroad, until that at the last by her death her quarell took end together with her life.

In the midst of these civil wars Amurath thought a faire opportunitie presented vnto him, to make an entrance vnto the conquest of Hungary, which kingdom he had in his ambitious mind already deuoured. And therfore gathering a great Army, hee marched along the river Danubius, vntil he came to the strong city of Belgrade, called in antient time Taurunum, and Belgrade besses Danubius, vntil he came to the strong city of Beigrade, casted in antient time Laurendin, and Coffee of fome Alba Græca, but now commonly Greeis Weisenburg. This city is invironed on the Tarks. East side with the famous river Danubius, and on the South side with the great river Saus or Sawe, which there falleth into Danubius; and on the other two sides is defended by strong walls with deep and large ditches, and was then accounted the gate or entrance into Hungary. Vnto this city Amurath at his first comming gaue two terrible affaults, and was in good Bugrade in hope so to have won the same : but yet was both times valiantly repulsed with great slaugh- vain affaulted. ter of his men. Wherfore finding it to be a matter of more difficulty than was by him at first supposed, he began to raise mounts against the City, and high Towers of wood to annoy the defendants, and furiously battered the walls. At this time also hee caused great numbers of gallies and smal pinnaces to be brought into both the rivers of Danubius and Saus, to assault the city on those parts where was least feared, and by that means also to keep them of the city from all fuccors to be fent that way out of Hungary. Yet for all he could do or deuise, the city was still valiantly desended by the Christian soldiers, who under the leading and conduct of Joannes Vranus a Florentine, gouernour thereof, with often fallies and continual! shot flew great numbers of the Turks. At the time of this fiege, Vladiflaus King of Polonia, & lately elect King of Hungary, was fore troubled by the queen and her faction in Hungary; which thing the Turkish King knew rightwel, & therupon continued his siege (although famin began greatly to increase in his camp) hoping nothing more, than that the defendants dispairing of the Kings help, would in short time yeeld up the city. Vladislaus being so intangled in Civil wars, as is aforesaid, that he could not possibly prepare such force as might relieve the E besieged: yet forasmuch as the Turkish King had not long before by his embassadors required to join with him in league and amity; he thought good now to affay if he could raise the fiege by sending vnto him the like embassage. Whereupon hee sent Dobrogosius, Ostrorog :nus, and Lucas Gorsensis, three of the Polonian nobility, his embassadors to Amurath, declaring vnto him, That for somuch as he had offered by his Embassadors to join with him in league, before he came out of Polonia; the remembrance therof had taken such deepe impression in his mind, that he would not take up arms against him, though it were in his own just defence, before he had offered him reasonable conditions of peace. Wherfore if he would desist from inuading of Hungary (wherof Vladeflaus was now by Gods permission, and the consent of the people, chosen King) and so raise his siege, that then they should afterwards easily agree vpon the defired peace, in concluding wherof, he should not find Pladiflaus inferior vnto himselfe in any manner of princely courtefie. But if hee had rather proceed in Armes, and to make proofe of his strength, he would then do the best that hee could to make him know that hee was of sufficient power, in so sust a quarrel to withstand his greatest forces, and to seuenge the Wherupon some of them returned case that the to make relation to the queen, and fome of them staid behind to hasten the King forward. But tisgt meffetd whilft these things were a doing, the Queen was in the mean deliucred of a faire sonne, whom the caused to be baptised and named Ladislaus. After the birth of this child, the queen mooued with a motherly affection, began to repent her felfe, that shee had given her consent for the calling in of the Polonian King, to the prejudice of her fonne. And being animated by M some of the Hungarian Nobility (who presuming of the good grace they were in with the Queene, hoped to grow great themselves, if they might first draw the government of that kingdom to the Queen and her yong fon) determined now by all means to exclude the Polonian King: but the greater part of the Nobility better confidering what was most expedient was before, for the common good, by the Embassadors concluded; continued firme in their former resolution for the bringing in of Vladislaus. So that by this meanes, some taking part with the queen and her yong son, and others standing fast for Pladislaus, the kingdom of Hungary was divided into two factions, and as it were rent in pieces, and so grew to civil Wars. The Queen with fuch as fauored her claim, the more to gain the minds of the common people (who are many times no leffe caried away with shewes than matter) caused her fon Ladiflaus (being then but three months old) folemnly to be crowned king at Alba Regalis, the viuall place for the coronation of the Hungarian Kings. But after that the Polonian King had entred into Hungary with a goodly army, and joined his forces with his friends, most part of them which before followed the Queen and her fon, revolted vnto Vladislaus. So that when she had donwhat she could, she was glad at last to commit the tuition of her some, together with the crown of Hungary, to Frederick the third, then Emperor, neuer ceasing for all that, to the vtmost of her power, to trouble the gouernment of Vladiflaus, continually stirring vp great wars against him both at home and abroad, vntil that at the last by her death her quarell took end together with her life. In the midst of these civil wars Amurath thought a faire opportunitie presented vnto him. to make an entrance vnto the conquest of Hungary, which kingdom he had in his ambitious mind already deuoured. And therfore gathering a great Army, hee marched along the river Danubius, vntil he came to the strong city of Belgrade, called in antient time Taurunum, and Belgrade bester C of some Alba Græca, but now commonly Grecis Weisenburg. This city is invironed on the ged of the Fast side with the famous river Dopubius and on the South side with the famous river Dopubius and on the South side with the famous river Dopubius and on the South side with the famous river Dopubius and on the South side with the famous river Dopubius and on the South side with the famous river Dopubius and on the South side with the famous river Dopubius and on the South side with the famous river Dopubius and on the South side with the famous river Dopubius and on the South side with the famous river Dopubius and on the South side with the famous river Dopubius and on the South side with the famous river Dopubius and on the South side with the famous river Dopubius and on the South side with the side wi East side with the famous river Danubius, and on the South side with the great river Saus or Sawe, which there falleth into Danubius; and on the other two fides is defended by strong walls with deep and large ditches, and was then accounted the gate or entrance into Hungary. Vnto this city Amurath at his first comming gaue two tetrible affaults, and was in good Bugrade in hope so to haue won the same: but yet was both times valiantly repulsed with great slaughter of his men. Wherfore finding it to be a matter of more difficulty than was by him at first supposed, he began to raise mounts against the City, and high Towers of wood to annoy the desendants, and furiously battered the walls. At this time also hee caused great numbers of gallies and smal pinnaces to be brought into both the rivers of Danubius and Saus, to assault D the city on those parts where was least feared, and by that means also to keep them of the city from all succors to be sent that way out of Hungary. Yet for all he could do or denise, the city was still valiantly defended by the Christian soldiers, who under the leading and conduct of Joannes Vranus a Florentine, gouernour thereof, with often fallies and continual! shot flew great numbers of the Turks. At the time of this fiege, Vladiflaus King of Polonia, & lately elect King of Hungary, was fore troubled by the queen and her faction in Hungary; which thing the Turkish King knew right wel, & therupon continued his siege (although famin began greatly to increase in his camp) hoping nothing more, than that the defendants dispairing of the Kings help, would in short time yeeld up the city. Vladislans being so intangled in Civil wars, as is aforefaid, that he could not possibly prepare such force as might relieue the befieged: yet forasmuch as the Turkish King had not long before by his embassadors required to join with him in league and amity; he thought good now to affay if he could raise the fiege by sending vnto him the like embassage. Whereupon hee sent Dobrogosius, Oftrorog:nus, and Lucas Gorsensis, three of the Polonian nobility, his embassadors to Amurath, declaring vnto him, That forsomuch as he had offered by his Embassadors to join with him in league, before he came out of Polonia; the remembrance therof had taken such deepe impression in his mind, that he would not take up arms against him, though it were in his own just defence, before he had offered him reasonable conditions of peace. Wherfore if he would desist from inuading of Hungary (wherof Vlads flans was now by Gods permission, and the consent of the people, chosen King) and so raise his siege, that then they should afterwards easily agree vpon the desired peace, in concluding wherof, he should not find Vladiflans inferior vnto himselfe in any manner of princely courtefie. But if hee had rather proceed in Armes, and to make proofe of his strength, he would then do the best that hee could to make him know that hee

wrongs to him done. When Amurath had received this embassage, he appointed the embass. fadors to withdraw themselves for a while to Synderovia, a City of Servia not far off, untill he might better confider of their demands; pretending that he did it for their fafety; but as appeared afterward, (ceretly refoluing with himfelf, prefently to doe his vtter denoir for the gaining of the city, and your fucces thereof to shape them answer accordingly. Wherfore to foon as the Embassadors were departed to Synderovia, hee first by his messengers assayed the minds of the citifens and foldiers with magnifical promifes of large liberties, and infinit rewards and preferments if they would yeeld up the city; and many arrows with letters made fast vnto them, full of like promises, were at the same time shot into the city. But seeing no hope to prevail by that means, he called together the captains and commanders of his army, and there in the presence of them all spake vnto them as followeth:

Although I know it is in myne own power to grant or not to grant the peace wheref our enemies have made a motion : yet it is my pleasure (worthy soldiers) to know your mindes also : for somuch as wee have felders to at that war in hand wherin with worldly felicitie (wherof I hold the chief place among st you) is also indan-Saut Elegrade, gered our religion and purity of life the defence and care wher of equally belongeth unto us all. For alshough we differ much one from another in the maner of our vocation and living here; yet after death we all hope for one and the felfe same felicity. And ther fore I would have you to under stand all that I that fay as proceeding not of any regard of myne own privat, but upon the confideration of the common good of you all. For as concerning myne own estate, I possess so large countries in Asia, to great dominions, in Europ, that either part therof (in good time be it (aid) might feem a sufficient king dom, So that perhaps it might better stand with my estate, to take more care for keeping of that I have, than to travell for the caining of more. But you are to confider with your filues, whither you have every man fufficient to lattice himselfe or not, and how long you think your selves assured of the same : and moreover, that together with these worldly things we shall be driven at length to forsake our religion and profession, if we shall now lay down arms. For our enemies requare that we shall first cease from war; and then afterward they think it meet to talk of peace. I will not speak of the indignity, that men besieged, and in entil plight, thould propound conditions of peace to them that befrege them, and are well furnished with all things: That feeble and cowardly men should promise peace unio couragious and expert soldiers. I omis what labor and pains we have taken in laying our fiege, in raising of mounts, in making of shipping : all which our enemies command vs to for fake, as if they had vs already bound or couped up in hold, as we have them. All Bulgaria and the greater part of Rascia is by vs now conquered, and most part of Servia is at our comwand : all which places are by vs either to be kept, or els all the rest of that we possesse in Europe, is with them to be loft and for faken. Who focuer shall have in their power this city which wee befiege (and that our enemies know right well) shall have not only a fortresse and bulwark of desence for his owne, but also actifile and entrance for the subduing of others. The Kingdom of Hungary is now divided in itself, and full of domestical sedition. Neither is is it so much strengthned by the writing of the Kingdom of Polenia, as it is by civill diffention weakned. And in this motion of peace nothing is fought for but to gain time for the pacifying of their prinat quarrels, that they may afterwards with their double forces let upon vs. For if we shall break up the siege before we have won the city, they will easily find delayes so long to protract the conclusion of peace, until Vladislaus his good fortune, or els the Hungarians beeing of L themselves better advised, shall make an end of their Civill wars. What manner of conditions of peace will they then require of vs, when they are at unity among themselves, and in arms against vs ; seeing that now being in danger with mutuall discord, and almost by us vanguished, they shinke it reasonable (as if they had won the field) that we should first raise our siege, and then intreat of peace. Their proud demaund for the restitution of Bulgaria and Rascia, with other Countries and Cities won by our great to auch and danger, already sound in our ears. Which if we shall refuse to grant, not onely the Hungarians (beeing then at unitic among st themselves) but also the Polonians joyned unto them, will bring those Warres home onto our owne doores, which we now with great advantage make upon them, beeing trove bled with difcord and civil broiles. And if for defire of peace we could be content to yeeld with than full and miferable conditions, and reftore unto them all they should or in reason could defire 3 do you M think the Prince of Servia wruld reft contented with his own, whose haughty mind (I am fure) being in-Hate with the combining of two (uch mighty kingdoms, thinketh not only of the recovery of that hee hath loft, but cuen now gapeth at all this is ours in Europ. He will not think himselfe satisfied, before hee (haA uing brought the Hungarian and Polonian forces against vs) shall see the same hanocke and shoile made in our King dome with fire and fword, which he hall before feene made by vs in his owne. Where if his fortune flould an swere his designes (which God forbid, but yet it may chance) before all the miserable and intollerable outrages, which are to be feared of an angry conquerour, it is accounted with them for a godly and religious worke, to vie all cruell and unspeakeable villanies against our nation, except we will for lake the faith and religion delinered unto us and our ancestors, and follow their new incredible ceremonies. Neither doe they thinke they can more easily and effectually procure the favour of God with any other kinds of facrifice or fernice, than by ouerthrowing and prophaning our temples, by feoffing at our most secred and secret rites and ceremonies, by scorning our religion, and priests: and that you may know all the fury wherewith they rage against we and our religion, they account all them for holy siints B which die in fight against vs. There is no cause (valiant (ouldiers) that upon the vaine hope of peace. we spould expect whilest the enemy doth gather and unite his forces and armes against us especially such an enemy as propoundeth not spoile and worldly honours, but immortality it selfe, as a reward of his victory. We have already taken much more labour than we have to take wee have filled the disches with rest less clabour, we have cast up bulwarkes equall with the wals, and part of the wals we have beaten even with the ground, so that you see the towne halfe opened : and that towne, by gayning whereof, all that ours u, may be made lafe and quist; and that which our enemy possesseth, subject to our spoile and prey. If you will but a little inforce your felues as men mindfull of our good fortune and forwardneffe, you Mall findour temples, our facrifices, our religion, all worldly and heavenly felicity to be then affured unto us. when as you hall to morrow overthrow the very foundation of the enemies wall. Then (couragious foulasours) we may cry victory, not for the present, but for ever. If this warre should bring unto us nothing elsebut an assured security of our estate, it were sufficient reward for which we ought cheerefully to aduentureour selues to all dangers, and to challenge in combate even death it selfe. But at this victory doth defend all our things as with a deepe trench or fure wall so dothat lay open and expose all our enemies dominions unto danger and spoile. Hitherto we have striven with nature her selfe in therough and ab. rupt mountaines of Bulgaria and Rascia, where we were to strine with hunger, thirst, labour, and aesperation: all them we have oversome, allured with no other reward, but that at length we might attaine unto the wealth of fruitfull Hungarie, from whence we must fetch the guerdon of our willory, and the ground of our glory. We are come to the gates, which being laid open, we are not to passe ouer inaccesible rockes, or vacouth defarts, but we shall one through most pleasant places, decked both by nature her selfe. D and the industry of man, where the temperatenesse of the aire, and lively springs, with the fruitfulnesse of the faile, doth enery where yeeld plenty of all manner of food both for man and beaff, not onely to serve for natures necessity, but even to glut our wanton desires. What thing soever curious indenour hardly bringeth forth mother places, that the fertility of the foyle yeeldeth plentifully of it felfe: 10 that it is to be thought, that nature adorned Hungary with a certaine extraordinary care, when as she would set forth a patterne of good husbandry, for other countries to imitate. Neither hath she in any place beene more bountifull in bestowing her rich gifts : for gold, which other men most painefully dig up, and that in few places, the Hungarians gather at their ease, as if it were a growing plant. It is in your power (worthy souldiers) whether you will to morrow open a way to all these good things for your sclues for ener, or else leave the way open for your enemies wato all that you hold. I would that you would remember when you go unto the breach, that all the store of happy fortune is laied open to you for a prey, without any other defence, without any other garrison, without any other keeper; and that behind you are your wines, children, your houses, your temples, and religion, together with the rewards of all your former victories : ouer whem (except you win the city) the fury and infolencie of the victorious enemy, will most cruelly and Shamefully infult. I, according as I shall fee you fight at the breach to morrow, Shall easily perceive how you are fet downe to command as conquerours, or else as slaves to be commanded; and also what to answere to the most insolent demands of the proud Embassadours. In the meane time make much of your selues, and together with your armour, have all things in readine fe, that to morrow with the dawning of the day we may affault the breach.

The Turkish captains for that time joyfully departed as if they had bin already assured of the victory, & of all those good things which Amurath had so lively set before their cies. The next morning very early, Amurath commanded the affault to be given vnto a great breach which he had made in the wall with continuall battery: the foldiers with great courage affailed the breach, especially the Ianizatics, who under the leading of Haly-Baffa valiantly won the fame, and were entring the city with affured hope of victory. The Christians seeing all indanger to be loft, running to the breach from all parts of the city, to forceably charged the proud lanizaries on enery fide, that they were glad to retire with more hast than they before entred: religate notes in which retreat many of them were flaine, and the rest flying out at the breach, were either flaine or burnt to death in the towne ditch with wild fire, whereof the defendants had caff great store upon the Turks at the breach, which having taken hold upon the faggots, hurdles and other light matter, wherewith the Turks vpon the fudden made their way ouer the towne dirch, did foterribly burne, that the Ianizaries which had entred the breach, being againe repulfed, were in that fiery lake confumed, or elfe with smoke strangled. In this assault Amurath is reported to have loft 8000 of his best men, beside 7000 others overwhelmed or strangled in the mines, by the countermines of the Christians. The other part of the Turks which at the H fame time affaulted the city by water, out of their gallies and small ships, had as euill or rather worfe fuccesse:many of them were sunke with great shot, and some burnt by the fire cast from thewals, and fo fired one another; and divers of them in that fudden feare, for avoiding of that prefent danger, ran a ground vpon the shelfs in the river, and so split. Amurath wonderfully discouraged with the slaughter of his men, and shamefully beaten from the assault, returned to his camp with his Turks, much like men which had lately escaped some great shipwracke. And thus partly by famine, and partly by the defendants force; having loft the greatest part of his army, he determined now after seuen moneths siege to returne home. Yet because he would not encourage his enemies, by shewing his feare, he sent for the Embassadors into the campe, and with sterne countenance answered them in this fort.

Wewill (faid he) then talke of peace, when Vladislaus shall deliver unto us all that part of Ras-Embassadors. Cia which he yet holdeth, and also this city of Belgrade, as a pledge of the league. And for this time I will raife my fiege, to gine Vladidaus time to aduife himfelfe : yet I would wish him, rather to accept of my friendship upon these conditions, than by denying that little which is demanded, to hazard the flate of both his Kingdomes. I aske but that which is mine owne by law of armes, before Vladiflaus was called into Hungarie: and the Hungarians cannot transferre unto him that right which they had not themselves. Wherefore if he will proceed rather to strine for that which is other mens, than quicity to possesse his owne, I will in good time repaire buther againe, with my God the beholder and revenger

> With this answer he dismissed the Embassadors, and forthwith rise with his army, fore repenting his comming thither:yet because he would take something in his way, he left his nephew Ifa beg with certaine troups of horsemen at Scopia in Seruia, who so troubled the King of Bolia, that he was glad to require peace of Amurath, and to promise vnto him a yearely tribute of 25000 duckats.

Vladiflaus newly erected King of Hungary, seeing that part of his kingdome which he called Transiluania, or Pannodacia, to be much subject to the incursion of the Turks, (who hauing got into their possession all the country of Moldauia, and growne insolent by continuall victories, ceased not to inuade and spoile the country of Transiluania) for remedy of that dai- L ly mischiese, created tohn Huniades Vayuod, or his vice-gerent in Transiluania. This Huniades, as some write, was Earle of Bistrice, borne in Valachia: other say that he was borne but of meane parents, and called Huniades of the village wherein he was borne, and grew to be great by his vertue and prowesse. Whatsoeuer his parents were, he himselse was a most politicke, valiant, fortunat and famous captain, his victories fo great, as the like were neuer before by any Christian Prince obtained against the Turks: so that his name became vnto them so dreadfull, that they yied the same to feare their crying children withall. This worthy captaine according to the trust reposed in him, began to keepe the Turks short, by cutting them off, when soeuer they prefumed to enter into his country; and also by shutting vp the passages whereby they were wont to forrage the country of Transiluania; and when he had put his own M charge in safety, he returned into Moldania; and neuer rested till he had quite won it out of the Turks hands. And not contented with this, paffed many times ouer Danubius into the Turks dominion, making bauocke of the Turks, and carying away with him great booty, with many captines.

Now were two great and worthy captains met together, in places nigh one to another, Huniades in Transvivania and the next part of Hungary, and Is in Rascia and the yoper part of Scruia; the one lying at Temeswar, and the other at Sinderouia; both men of great spirit, and defirous of honour. Of these two, Ifa in great fauour with Amurath, and by him highly preferred, to increase his credit with the Sultan his vncle, and to inlarge the bounds of the Turkish kingdome committed to his charge continully forraged the country about Belgrade, to the intent that having wearied the inhabitants with the harms he daily did them. & brought the city into great wants, he might fo at length gaine the fame, for the most part abandoned then of citizens, which Amurath could not by force obtaine, and fo to open a way into Hungary. Thus was the country by him spoyled, the villages rifled and burnt, and great numbers B both of men and cattell dayly carried away: yea fometime not contented to have spoyled the open country, he affailed the very suburbs of the city, and was thence hardly repulsed; and finding Huntades the only man that hindred his further proceedings, to require him, and prouoke him the more, brake somtimes into his country, laying in enery corner as he went, strong ambushes, so to have circumvented that wary captain, if it had bin possible. But he grieved to fee the countrey thus spoyled, and purposing thereof to be reuenged, secretly raised a strong power both of horse and foot, and with his companion Nicholas Vilach a right valiant captain, passing ouer Danubius, came and incamped betwixt Belgrade and Sinderonia, being about 20 miles distant. Of whose comming 1sta-Beg understanding, forthwith set forward with 2 great army against him, less the should by longer delay seeme to stand in doubt of his enemy. C whom he had by many injuries to often prouoked. So marching on with his army ranged in order of battell, he found Huniades as ready for battell as himselfe, who in both wings had placed his light horsemen, and behind them his men at armes, with certaine companies of croffebowes on horsebacke in the midst stood his armed men, with his archers, and other fouldiers more lightly armed, ready at all affayes, all strongly garded with men at armes: after whom in the rereward followed also a strong squadron of valiant sootmen. The signall of battell being giuen, there began a great and cruel fight, as amongst men desirous either to be ouercome, or there honourably to end their daies. At the first incounter, the wings of Huniades his bactell were by the Turks inforced to retire; but comming to the men at armes, their fury was there stated, and a cruell battell fought, wherein many fell on both sides, but of the Turks mo. D who trusting to their agility and nimblenes of body, were not able long to endure the shocke and strength of the men at armes, but were there by heaps ouerthrowne, and most miscrably flain. Which 1/a beg beholding, and perceiving the Hungarians couragiously to fight, as men almost in possession of an assured victory, to saue himselfe, turned his backe and fled to Sinderouia. The rest beholding the flight of their Generall betook themselves to flight also, after whom the Hungarians fiercely followed, especially Huniades himselfe, who by his example to animate therest lest not the chase vntil he was come almost to the suburbs of Sinderouia: sew of the Turks escaped, the rest being either taken or slain, Huniades after so great a victory, with a rich prey and a multitude of prisoners returned to Belgrade; having now sufficiently revenged himselse of the wrongs he had before received. After which time 1st the Turke was more E quiet, as having sufficient proofe of his valor. The fame of this victory increased not a little the fame of Huniades, the report whereof comming to Buda, filled the city with joy and gladnesse; but most of all King Vladislaus, who therupon caused publique prayers, with thanksgiuing to be made in enery Church; and by his letters gratulatory, with many rich presents incouraged Huniades to the profecution of the religious war, wherein was propounded vnto him 1 4 4 4. not onely the increase of his wealth (a base regard in the honourable) but the immortality of his name, and hope of eternall bliffe.

Wot long after this vi Cory, Huniades obtained a far greater in Transylvania. For Amurath Transfluania much grieued with the losse he had first by himselfe, and after by his lieutenant Isa, received in under and at Belgrade, and in the country therabout; lest he should seem to yeeld vnto the Hungarians, fies Rasa.

F repaired his broken forces with new supplies, with purpose againe to renue his wars in Valachia. And so having put all things in readines, sent one of his Bassa's called Messies (his Vice-10y in Asia, a man of great wisedome, experience, and valor) with a puissant army vpon the sudden by the way of Valachia Transalpina, to inuade Transyluania. This worthy captain according to his charge departed out of Seruia, and passing from Danubius, suddenly entred into

Huniades his country, burning and spoiling what soeuer came in his way, and killing all that he light vpon, man, woman, and child, without respect of age, sex, or condition, filling all the country as he went with tumult and terror. Whereof Huniades (but lately come into the country) understanding, and having then no sufficient forces to oppose against the sury of so puissant an enemy, either means to raife any in fo great a confusion and feare, was wonderfully grieued thereat, and perplexed in mind, as not well knowing which way to turne himselfe. At length Han'aket flieth he tooke his flight into Alba lula, vnto his old friend George Lepe Bishop of that city, a man of great vertue and grauity: but whilest he there staied with his friend, about the raising of a tumultuary army, the enemy was now come neere vnto him; who having ouerrun the greatest part of the country, had scraped together such a booty, and taken such a multitude of prisoners, that furcharged as it were with the spoyle, he was glad to march softlier; yet still burning H the country before him. Which Huniades and the good Bishop beholding out of the city. To much grieued thereat, that albeit that they both well knew themselves, with an handfull of men taken up in haste hand ouer head, too weake to encounter with their enemies; yet thought it better, with fuch power as they had to go out, and fo in defence of their country honorably to die, than longer to behold the most miserable destruction of the same. But whilest they vp. on this refolution (carried forth with too hot a defire of revenge) march vnaduifedly forward. without any feours or cipials fent out before them, they fell before they were aware into fuch ambushes both of horse & foot, as the crafty enemy had in the secret woods and vallies whereby they were to passe, laid of purpose to intercept them: which now with great force and horstandales and rible outeries breaking out upon them on every fide, diffmaied them with a great feate. Hunia. I des and the Bishop seeing themselves so intrapped and beset with the multitude of their enethe mies, as that they must need sperish if they should longer stay, sled incontinently back againafter whom followed all the rest of their army, and at their heeles the eager Turks, who soared none of the flying Christians they could ouertake, but put them al to the fword:neuertheleffe most part of them escaped backe again to Alba Iula. The Bishop thinking to have saved himselfe by the swiftnes of his horse, comming to a river, in taking the same was overthrown, and there by the enemy flain. With whose death the Bassa incouraged, as also with the present victory, began now more at liberty to range abroad, and at his pleafure with fire and fword to wall that part of the country which yet remained inspoiled : leaving in the meane time (494 man out of feare) the rich prey he had taken, together with his baggage & carriages, to be car- K ried all together, as a notable testimony of his victory, vnto his great lord & master. Huniades in the meane time with wonderfull celerity running about the borders of his country, and out of euery town & village taking fuch foldiers as he could, perfuaded also the Sicilians (or people commonly called Siculi) in defence of their wives and children to take vp arms: who all in respect of the present necessity, cheerfully did whatsoeuer he commanded. With this tumultuary army he followed the Bassa (who then in great pride was returning, laded with the spoile of the whole country) with purpole to fet vpon him as time or place should give him occasion. In the meane time Mesites being told, that Huniades with a great power was comming after him, and now even at hand; is reported to have made no reckoning thereof, but to have proudly answered vnto bim that brought the newes, Let him come, and with the foile of himfelfe inrich L our victory. There was present when he thus said, one John one of Hunjades his espials; who discouered vnto him many of the Turks designes concerning the joyning of battell with him; but especially, that the Bassa had commanded thorow his army, That about all things, they should in the beginning of the battell affaile the person of Huniades himselfe, for that hebeing once flain, the rest would easily be put to slight, as all depending on his direction; and that for the performance thereof, he had appointed certaine companies of his best soldiers, giving them certain tokens wherby they might know both him and his horse. There was then in the army one Simon Kemene, a right valiant and couragious gentleman, not much vnlike to Huniades, with whom he changed both his horse and armor, appointing vnto him a strong troupe of his choice horsemen to attend upon him : neither was this counterfeit Huniades unwilling to M expose himselfe vnto the danger, accounting it honour enough, if by his death he might saue the life of his friend, and preferre fo worthy a defender of the common-weale. Huniades following fast after, the Bassa marching before him, sought by light skirmishes, somtimes on the one fide, sometimes on the other, and sometimes in the rereward, to stay him, and at some aduantago, if any such were given to fight with him before he should get out of the country. At length finding such an opportunity as he thought good to lay hold vpon he with al his forces. as if it had been a violent tempert, came upon the Turks fo fuddenly, as that they had not time to put themselves in order of battell, but were glad confusedly to fight as they might, & without order : inwhich disordred fight many fell on both fides, but far more of the Turks. But whileft both armies with like obstinacy incounter together, certain troups of the most valiant Turks descrying Simen the counterfeit Huntades, & by the fignes before delivered vnto them. both of his horfe and armor, supposing him to have bin Huniades indeed with all their power made towards him, to have flaine him, according as they had in charge: where meeting with right valiant men, of no leffe courage than themselves, there was fought a most tetrible and Agranhanes bloudy battell, in such fort, as if in that very place should have bin tried the whole fortune of sesand Husiathe day. But the Turks still bending their forces more and more thither, for the killing of him der. of whom they stood in more dread than of all the rest; at length by plaine force made a way vnto him, and having flame them that were about him, though not without their owne great loffe, furiously assailing him, slew him, vainly supposing it to have bin the very Generall himfelfe who had he there perished (as like enough it was he should, had he not bin before warned of the Baffa's purpose) no doubt but that the whole country had bin with him, or shortly after quite loft. But Huniadee in the mean time riding to and fro in the army, encouraged his foldiers not to for lake the victory they were now as it were in possession of, nor leave unreuenged fo many flaughters and harms fo lately committed by their enemies, but to remember as they were fighting that they carried in their bands their wives and children, and were in that one battell to reuenge the wrong by them done both to God and man. Somtime he with new funplies encouraged such as were ouercharged, and even now ready to fly; othersome he with cheerfull words staied, that had already turned their backs; performing in every place all the parts both of a worthy commander & valiant foldier, as the necessity of the time and place required. In the heat of this battelk fortune yet fauoring neither part, but both fighting with all their power) the Transilvanian prisoners that in great number were kept in the camp, wishing rather to die, than to be carried away into captinity, & thinking it now or neuer, time for them to attempt their deliverance, with one confent brake afunder their bonds, and with fuch weapons as first came to hand, fet upon their keepers, of whom they slew a great number, and so de-D speratly issuing out of the battell, incouraged their countrymen, and discouraged their enemies. Yer was the battell hardly fought, though not altogether with like courage, or for like cause: for why the Transiluanians sought for their country, their wives, their children, their liues, their liberty, their religion, and alters : but the Turks, for the rich prey they had before taken, and that they were by victory in hope of But at length the Turks by the breaking out of the prisoners (who laid about them like despetatmen) out of hope of the victory, began by little and little to retire; and the other on the contrary part by this vnexpected aid encouraged, and quickly finding the enemies fainting, fought more fiercely than before. Mefites feeing his army thus in energy part wavering, was therewith exceedingly troubled ; but prefently after, beholding some of his men retyring as if they had fled, and othersome flying out right, and no means to flay them, for fafegard of his life turned his horse and fled also : after whom the Hungarians followed with most terrible execution, as men desirous of the bloud of them that had done them fo great harme. In this chase Mestres himself with his son were both slain: the report of whole death in the pursuit, added swiftnesse vnto the Hungarians, to the increafing of the shughter of the Turks, whom for the desire of reuenge they ceased not for certaine daies to purfue, ynto the top of the Alps. In this battel were flaine of the Turks 2000, and of the Hungarians about 1000. Huniades with this victory reconcred all the prey the Turks had taken of the spoile of the country, together with their tents and baggage, vnto whom at his returne incorbe campe, a wonderfull number of poore capitues carrie, and falling at his feet, Greavejoling and kiffing them, gaue. God thankes for their deliverance by him; some called him the father, F some the defender of his country; the soldiers, their invincible Generall; the captines, their delinerer; the women, their protector, the yong men and children, their most louing father. In all which joyfull act lamations, no honorable addition was heard, which in the judgement of all men, worthily agreed not with his deferts. He againe with teares standing in his eies, courteoutly embraced them, rejoycing at the publike good; and himfelfe giving most hearty thanks yor o God, commanded the like to be done in all churches of that Province. Somtime @ he commended the foldiers valor, and in generall the peoples lovalty. The nobility and work thy captaines he extolled by name, according as their deferts had bin in that notable battell. not detracting any thing from any mans worthy praises part of the spoile of the Turk's head pointed ynto deuout yles, and the other part he divided among this foldiers: and willing as it were with the first fruits thereof to gratifie King Vladistate and the Despot of Servia, then prefent with him, he fent a greatwaggon, with 10 horfes which could fearer draw is, laded with the Turks enfigues and the chief of their heads, where the heads of the Basia and his son food formost, and about them was placed an old Turke, somtime well known wnto the Despot; who in this order prefented ynto them, is faid to have thus delivered his message, as followerh:

Huniades your Majesties most humble servant, and the most honourable Despots sonne. Rindeth until disputes the youthis part of the foile gained by thu late wittory, left he should feeme to defraud you of the honour at 1 det van the battell, happily fought under your good fortune. These heads of the Asian Nobility he sendeth you for a Prefent, that you hould not want the affured testimony of fu notable a victory these are two Princes beads, the one of Melites Balla the Generall, and the other of his fon therest are the heads of the other great commanders and Sanzacks. All these witnesse the greatnesse of the lang beer, and exhort you to greater atchieuements. What your royall Majefty for the naturall inftinet of gitte and religion ingrafted im 1 you, may hope for and what an occasion of immortality and elory is offered onto you. Huniades mitheth you hereby to confider and humbly requesteth, that generall supplications may be commanded, and a great army provided, for asmuch as all roon supposes that the Turke will gage his whole forces sand leave 1. nothing unattempted, in renenge of fo great a flaughter of his people.

> Having ended his speech, he shewed vnto them the grisely mortified heads: which the mo bility and others there prefent, earneftly beheld, and wondred at, especially the King and the Despot, who by letters further understanding the whole proceeding of the war, and fortune of the battell, highly commended the discreet valour of Huntades, together with the glorious vis ctory, worthy (as they faid) of a Roman triumph': for which Vidillaid commanded publike fupplications to be made in all churches thorow Hungary! and by honorable medlengers fent of purpose to Huniades, gaue him great thanks, according to his delerts, with many rich Pretents allo, commending his faithfull and worthy feruice l'and requesting him, with like coul K rage and care, to profecute the war, fo happily begun; promiting him; That he should neither want men nor mony, or any thing elfe needfull thereunto. Vpon this victory, the countries of Moldania and Valachia, before tributaries vnto the Turks, now renolted again vnto the Hungarians, to the great griefe of Amurath: and the fame of Huniades was in there differ ted thorow all Europe, and a generall hope conceiled of him, as of one most like to be one of the greatest champions of the Christian Commonweale, as in his time vadoubtedly hewas.

> The report of this late ouerthrow, with the death of the Bassa Wither, and the losse of his Army, being brought to Hadrianople, much troubled the Turkish Tyrant, but thost of all, the revolt of the two Countries, Moldauia and Valachia. So that full of wrathfull lidignation and defire of reuenge, he commanded a great army to be sailed against the next Spring, with L intent to have gone therewith himselse: but afterward vpon better addice changing his pull pose, he committed the leading thereof vnto one Schech Abedin Baffa (corruptly eatled sciale) din Baffa) an Eunuch, and yet neuerthelesse a right valiant and experceaptaine, and his Vice roy in Europe; with charge first to enter into Valachia, and there having done what harmele could with fire and sword, to doe the like in Moldaula: and after that, with all his power to breake into Transyluania, there to reuenge vnto the full, the losses before received, and will the flaughter of the Hungarians to facrifice vnto the ghofts of their dead friends and companions. The Baffa according to his charge, departing out of Macedonfa, and matelfing thorow Mysia, and so passing over Danubius, with an Army of sourcescore thousand fighting men whereof foure thousand were of the best lanizaries, entred into Valachia, filling the country M with feare and tumult; the Valachians now altogether in despaire to be able to defend them? felues against the fury of the Turks, and fore repenting them of their revolution them, vi to the Hungarians. Whom for all that, Huniades comforted with cheerefull words, willing them betime to retire themselves vnto the safest places of the Country, and not to expose

A themselves with their too weake forces against the sury of the Barbarians; promising in good time to come himself to their reliefe, not doubting by the power of lesus Christ, to date them battell in the plaine field, and to have of them a glorious victory, although they were in number far more than they were reported to be. The Baffa dividing his army into two parts forraged the country far and neers, burning the country townes and villages before them, fooiling what soeuer came in their way, and killing who soeuer they light voon, men, women, or children. without respect of age, sex, or condition. But the Valachians for the most part retired themselues some into the mountains, some into the strong townes, and some into places further off, fo that few fell into the enemies hands, but fuch as were not able to fly, or not regarding the danger, had negligently staid the enemies comming, and so perished. Valachia thus B spoiled, the Turks passing ouer the mountaines, descended into Transilvania, as Amerath had commanded with purpose there to have done the like or greater harme, if possible it had been to have fo done: but there was Huniades with 15,000 chosen soldiers ready to encounter them. A final power indeed, in comparison of the multitude the Bassa led; but al men of greatexperience and resolution, invalor counternailing the great number of their enemies, men resolued rather to die than to fly. Of whose approch the Bassa(vnto whom the name and fortune of the man was dreadfull) by his espials understanding, staied his intended fury, and as one well aware with whom he had to doe, without farther proceeding, encamped himselfe with his army, to fee what power and courage the enemy had. But certainly informed by his fcours, for that purpose sent out. That he was not in number a quarter so many as the Turks, but lay strongly c encamped with his waggons and carriages, as in a fure fort, in fuch order as that he could not without great danger be affailed, and yet might at his pleafure come forth, and fo if need were retire againe as into a strong hold : he wondred at his courage and skilfull manner of encamping, yet prefuming of his owne multitude and strength, he doubted not to march forward, and to offerhim battell. Being come within halfe a mile the one of the other, although they were on neither fide vnwilling to fight, yet hoping both for a great victory, they thought it not best to attempt any thing rashly, but betooke themselves both vnto the highest of their wits, as willing in fo great a conflict, as well to fhew the vimolt of their policy and skill, as of their courage and valor. The Turke thought it not best to joyne battell with his enemies in one front for feare of confounding to great a multitude, but to divide his army into certaine D battalions, and so to fight by degrees and in good order, whereby to make all his men profitablesor if he could not do for then with his multitude to inclose the Christians round, and so to ouerwhelme them. On the other fide, Huniades charged his foldiers, about all things to keep their order, and in no case to suffer them elues to be divided by their enemies. The next day, being come ynto a place which they call Vascape, both the armies by the breake of day began to diflodge at which time the Bassa spent a good space in the martialling of his great army, as did also Huniades, seeking by provident foresight and policy to match the multitude of his enemies. And so having set all things in order, calling vinto him the chiefe captains and commanders of his army, with cheerefull countenance encouraged them as followeth:

First, you are to fight for the health and welfare of your children, wives and country, joyned with your whole estate : then, for eternall glory and renowne in this world: and last of all, for immortality and a crowne that shall never be taken from you, in F the world to come . How many miseries and calamities we hand in former times, and of late received from the Turks, would to God you had rather heard thereof by report, than seene the same with your eies, and indured them in your selves. You had long since beene bereft of your beloved wives and children, whom most miserable servitude had overwhelmed , you had had neither house nor Church, whereinto dwell or Oferue God had not the dinine power of God and your rare proveffe beene at hand for prefent refeue your country, your goods, your honour, your liberty, you could not have kept, had not your valour, confirmed by G an affured confidence in the highest preserved all these things unto your selves : The horrible fury of the Turke had now brought all thefethings into the power of it felfe, had they not beene by your armes defended and he by 10 many bloudy overthrows repressed. He could not before be stayed; the Grecians the Ma. codonians (both sometimes the greatest commanders) the old Thracians, the strong Bulgarians, the valia ant Eperots and Dalmatians, could not abide their force: the Athenians, the Thebans, the Lacedemonia ans authors and masters of the ancient discipline of war willingly gaue place unto these. Unto we is the praise & great glory of the victory by God assigned, who oftentimes with a small power, yea, and that some. time against all hope, bane with a notable stang heer overthrown them, vanquished them, and put them to tlight. Neither is there any men in the World whom they more feare and stand in dread of than you. whom though in number but few, they have by their dayly flaughter and loffes, learned no leffe to feare, the than if you were many. And now to try the vitermost of their power they are come with their sunumera. ble legions : but are not for that of you any whit the more to be feared than before feeing that we all beare armes and r the conduct of the mil mighty God and are by dayly victory, long experience, and approved valour taught, what we are to dare : besides that, the greatest part of their army is of common souldiers. flues or rude country peafan's or men by force by them compelled more than the Ianizaries are no good fouldier among them, the rest as men enforced, serve them for feare, and against their wils, and they by their cowardife brought into that bondage and flauery. What Greekes, Macedonians, or Selauonians fee. ner are fent to their aid for a fmuch as they are not yet revolted from the Christian faith, deeme them not to fland for them, but for us: they long for us the revengers of their wrongs, and for you as victorious conquerors in this war they have given unto the Turks their names, but unto us their hearts and power. and pray heartily for our victory : wherefore you ought to much the more valiantly and couragiously to fight, by how much greater you fee the victory, the honor, the prey before your cies. We are not to fight for other mens houses and alters but for our owne : so our present necessity requireth, in such fort, that if wee our sclucs, deliner not our sclues, and beare our selnes upon our wonted hope and valour, we shall this day be inforced to endure the greatest misery that men may possibly. First the losse of our goods and subflance the captinity of our children, the deflouring of our dang heers, the ranifing of our wives the flaughter of our parents, the burning of our houses and churches, and that which worse is than all this, the scorne of our Sautour Christ Iesus, and his Saints , whose images you shall see in despight broken, or dragged in the dirt, or moulten and converted unto other prophane vies; all Beligion trodden downe, and God himfile (if it were possible) with violence and despaire driven out of our hearts, if we stand not manfully ontost as becommeth worthy champions. God is able with his little finger if he fo will forthwith to destroy all the Turks in the world but seeing he bath committed with our right hands the defence of his name he first maketh proofe of our courage and valour that finding the same faithfull and ready, he may strengthen and defind it with his owne right hand. He never yet for looke any faithfull or devout man, heither will our Sautor Christ be wanting unto you, if you be not wanting to your selves in the power of bis name which is about all names he shall tread downe his rebellious enemies and exalt the right com that put their trust in him. Moreouer, the causes that they and we combat for are divers, and our hopes much stronger: They fight for their Prophet, a most prophane man, author of all impiety, for spoile and prey, for the destinaction of nations and countries, for other mens king domes, for the inlarging of their dominions, and territories for worldly praise and glory: But we contrariwise beare armes for the Sautour of the world for our I faith and religion, for the Christian common-wealth, for our native country, for our wives and children, for our fortune and state , than which nothing can be more excellent, more commendable, or honourable, What reward is laid up for them in heaven which have worthily protested or delivered their country, or laid downe their lives in defence of their faith and religion? Neither, having often proved, are we ignorant, that Godwill never for sake them that honor, feare, and serve him. Whereby (fellow fouldiers) you may plainely perceive, how far your hopes are beyond theirs. Beleeve our Saviour, promifing winto you an eternall remard and shew your fidelity and valor unto God and your country together. Wherefore feeing wishout the power of God we can do nothing, before the signall of battell be given, I befeech you collonels, captains, and lieutenants, by your effectuall and Christian exhortations in your regiments and companies, to encourage your foldiers, valiantly to fight the Lords battell, and for the present, every man by taking a M lutle earth in his mouth, to prepare himselfe according to the necessity of the time, as it were to the receiuing of the Lords Supper: so having cleansed your soules, embrace you one another, plight your mutuall faith with your right hand and a kiffe : and make a perpetuall covenant among your felues, none of youth forfake one another in this holy battell, but for your religion and country valiantly to fight it out, even to

A the last man. And a little refreshing your selves with a short repast as you stand, upon the signall given, thrice calling aloud vpon the mighty name of Christ Iesus, fight with the like valour and courage fo neer as you can that he in the agony of death fought for your redemption and liberty: which that you will willingly do, I request and charge you thus for our Sautours fake, for the love of our country, and for the faith you ove both to God and man. I also pray and befeech you, so to fight, as men resolved either to gaine a most glorious victory, (whereof I doubt not) or offe if it should otherwise chance, this day to purchase vnto your Clues a bleffed life in the king dome of heaven : not to fup in hell with the Turks, but with the bleffed wights in heaven: for Christ lesus our Sautour will be alwaies present with vs, who (beleeve me, and to hope) will this day not onely deliver us out of the hands of the Turks, but to our immortall glory lode us with the rich spoiles of our enemies, and so in safety bring all home agains with much juy and triumph.

The Bassa on the other side likewise encouraged his souldiers, putting them in remembrance of their former victories, exhorting them not to degenerate from their worthy ancestors and themselues, by whose great valor the glory and Empire of the Turks had bin so mightily increased; and vnto whom their great prophet Mahomet, the interpreter of the gods, had foretold the Empire of the whole world to be by all the gods allotted, and had by divine inspiration prophecied, that antient and stately nation in time to become the terror of the world, the feourge of the wicked, and commander of all nations. He farther declared vnto them, what an increase of kingdomes they had got in that short time, since which they first passed ouer into Burope: and filled them with the hope of a great spoile; promising vnto them that should in C the battell valiantly behave themselves, not onely the spoile and prey, but whole villages. towns, and cities, and other great preferments, according as they should descrue. As for the victory, confidering the weake power of their enemies, and the great number of themselues, he affured them thereof, if they would but a while valiantly fight it out like men. In conclusion, he told them, that having overcome Huniades (whom only, as he confessed, he had found to be the most valiant and skilfull captaine of the Christians) nothing should afterward be able to stand in their way, or to hinder their further conquest: and that if this day they should veterly ouerthrow him, they should gain the most honorable victory that was ever yet got in Europe. Wherefore he willed them aboue all things, in the battell to feeke after him, promifing vnto him that should kill him, a great reward, with most honorable preferments. Having thus fufficiently as he thought, encouraged his Turks, he fee forward with his army in order of battell. His horsemen and footmen he divided into two great wings, betwixt which marched the Ianizaries in a square battell, all men of approued valour: after whom followed the rereward: vnto the wings he had also joyned certaine loose companies of light horsemen to begin the battell, and to fly about the enemies, and fo as occasion should serve, either to charge or retire. Huniades likewise had placed in both wings two square battalions of men at armes, and with them certaine horsemen with crosse-bowes; before these wings he had also placed certaine troups of light horsemen, to encounter the enemies: in the midst stood two square bartels of men at armes: and betwixt them a strong squadron of armed men, guarded behind with a convenient number of pikemen and archers: both the wings he had compassed about with E a multitude of carts and waggons, and they also well manned. So marching forward, and borh armies being come within a quarter of a mile together, the fignall of battell was on both fides giuen, and the battell begun. Huniades feeing the multitude of his enemies, cast his first bat- Acruell battel tell into the forme of a wedge, the more easily to divide them : and they on the othe side in der and abedia forme of a paire of theores were ready to receive them : where on both fides they encountred Edge. together with such fury and outcry, as neuer was thing more terrible to be heard or seene. The Turks trufting vnto the multitude of their nimble light horfinen, first with their light staues, and afterward with their crooked Scimaters fiercely affailed the Christians light horsemen, in which first incounter many fell on both sides. But the wedge battell of the Christians could not of the Turks be broken, as confifting all of valiant expert fouldiers, and they also strongly armed; who, do the Turks what they could, with a great slaughter cut their army in funder, but not without a great fight, and some losse also vnto themselves. In the wings also the light horsemen for a while fought couragiously and with like hope; but the Turks with that kind of fight better acquainted than the Christians, and better appointed for that purpose, and exceeding in number also, put the Christian light horsemen to the worst, and entor-

ced them to retire to the nwa at armes. Here began the fortune of the Turks to flay, where G b. th parted sperally affailing the one the other, was made a most terrible fight, wherin most part of the Turks light horfemen were flaine: for why, thy were not able to abide the force of the menat arms, a though in comparison of them but sew; but were with their lances and arming foorts ouerthrowne and flaine, no otherwise than if they had bin naked men; so that in both wings the Turks began now to faint. But the battell in both the wings yet wavering, and the victory doubtfull, in the maine battell was fought a most cruell fight: the Ianizaries with a strong power of men at arms, and certain troups of light horsemen, compassed about the men at armes that flood (as we faid) in the maine battell of the Christians, where the old Ianizaries with their crooked Scimitaries, with great courage cut in funder the legs of the horses of the men at arms; of whom many fell down, and lying along vpon the ground, were made shorter by H the head : as likewise on the other side, the lanizaries whilest they seek the destruction of the men at arms, were themselves overborn & troden under soot. Wherupon such a slaughter was made, that the bloud run like riners, whilest they desperatly fight with furious rage both on the one fide & the other. In this cruel fight most part of the lanizaries were slain, and many of the Christian men at arms also. The Bassa now perceiving the Hungarians to have the better. both in the wings and in the main battell, & yet in hope that with long fight they would faint (although he faw great flaughter of his men in euery place) came on with the rereward, and a number of other fresh soldiers which he had lest for the garding of his baggage, all yet sound men, in good hope so to ouerwhelme the wearied Hungarians. It was now four houres that this cruell fight had endured, when as the Bassa began it asresh: neither was this by him done 1 without reason; for why, he was affraid lest if his men should turne their backes and fly, the whole army should follow after: and therefore to make vse of all the men he had, he brought on his rereward, in hope that his enemies now spont with long fight, would not longer endure a fresh charge. And the more to encourage his men, he commanded them to compasse in the Hungarians round, and to dispatch their wearied enemies; vainly boasting, That it would be the last battell that ever the Hungarians would fight. On the other side Huniades perceiving the enemies purpose, suffered his men to be in part invironed, and by and by caused the waggoners with the armed carts & waggons to thrust in behind them, and so to compasse them in, dinided in part from the rest, & afterward with fresh supplies renewed the battel with the enemy. The fight was great, and in every place right terrible: and albeit that the flaughter of the K Turks was in many places great, yet by reason of their multitude they felt it not much, but fought yet fill most desperatly: vntill that they in the right wing seeing themselues compasfed in behind with the waggons, & fo from them charged with shot, darts, and other such misfive weapons; standing in doubt which way to turn themselves, & befet with danger on every fide, began to faint, and fearing the danger behind them, thrunke from the fight. On the other fide, the Hungarians, now in good hope of victory, with great and cheerful outcries, as men inspired with fresh spirits, more surjously assailed their fainting enemies afront, than before; encouraging them also that assailed them behind in the waggons, to approchithem neerer : with which double danger the Turks hardly befet, fought diforderly, & doubting to be all inclosed round, first retired, & presently after betook themselues to plaine flight. But they which were L already thut in betwixt the waggons & them that fought before them, perished every mothers fon. They which fought in the left wing also, discouraged with the flight of their fellows, fled likewise: after whom the Hungarians fiercely followed. The Bassa himselfe seeing both the wings of the battel put to flight, & his own battel fore broken also, strucken with despaire fled, with certain companies of the Ianizaries, which he had stil kept about him against all euents, for the fafegard of his person: after whom followed also so many other of the Turks as could; the rest desperatly slying thorow the woods, forrests, & mountains, either there perished with lunger, or falling into the hands of the Valachians were by them flain. Of fo great an army as the Baffa brought into Transiluania, scarce the one halfe returned again ouer Danubius. It is reported by some that waere in that battel, that if Huniades having them in chase, had pursued M them to Danubius, scarcely one of them had escaped ouer the river. But he contented with so great avictory, & to have driven the enemies out of the field, purfued them not far but entring into their camp, with the spoile therof greatly inricht both himself & his soldiers. Beside the great multitude of the Turks here flain, 5000 more were taken prisoners, and 100 of their en-

A furniture, both of men and horses, beside the rich pauillions and tents there standing. In briefe, the wealth there found, was fo great, as that there was no man in Huniades army, which was not thereby for euer enriched. Huniades for this fo great victory, and for his country, delivered from fo great a feare, caused generall praier, with thankinging, for the space of three daies, to be made in all churches of those three provinces, vnto whom that danger was threatned; and at Vascape, where the battell was fought, hanged up certaine of the Turks ensignes, as trophies of the victory there gotten. This was the famous fattell of Valcape, wherein Huniades got the greatest victory that ever any Christian Prince before that time obtained against the Turkish Kings. The fields thereabout lay covered with the dead bodies of the flaine Turks. whose carrion carkasses so infected the aire, that many of the better fort of the inhabitants of B the country were glad for a season to leave their dwellings, and to get them surther off, for feare of infection. Afterwards he in great triumph came to Buda, and there presented vnto King Vladislans the enemies enfignes, with such a part of the spoile, as might both well declare the greatnesse of the victory, and beseeme the greatnesse of so great a Prince, which the King thankefully received, highly commending his great valour, the fame whereof had in flore time filled enery corner of Europe.

Amurath a little before this great overthrow of his army in Transiluania, affuring himselfe of the victory, had fent a proud embassage vnto King Vladislaus into Hungary, offering him peace, vpon condition. That he should deliver vnto him the strong city of Belgrade, or else yeeld to pay him a yearely tribute: vnto which, vpon the first report of the victory, answere C was given by the King, answerable to the proud demand, That according to the issue of matters in Transiluania, he would shortly in person himselfe come and give him surther answere. Withwhich short answere the proud Embassadors were dismissed and gone, a little before the comming of Huniades to Buda.

How much this late overthrow grieucd the great King Amurath, Vladiflaus was not ignorant; either of his power or defire of reuenge, as sufficiently warned thereof by the worthy Humades for the withstanding whereof, he thought it good not to be unprouided. Wherfore calling together the states of his Kingdome, and with them Iulian the Cardinallof S. Angell, the Popes Legat, at such time as they were all assembled, he propounded vnto them the greatnesse of the danger threatned by the angry Turke, leaving it vnto their grave confideration to deter-D mine how the same were by strong hand and plaine force, or otherwise to be auerted. In which most honourable affembly, Iulian the Cardinall, of purpose sent thither by Pope Vrban to stir vp the Hungarians against the Turks, being requested by the King to deliuer his opinion first, ipake vnto them as followeth:

Since the time that the Turkish pestilence began to rage in Europe, no newes was ever more welcome The essetual onto the great Bishop, unto the Apostolicall Senate, and other Princes of Italy (most mighty King, and beech of Indian you other most worthy Princes) than when it was told them, That Vladislaus, King of Polonia, was by in the Larla you also chosen King of Hungary. For a fitter governour of the Hungarian state, and leader of their ment to per Power, could not the Hungarians any where have found: as he in whom justice religion, wisedome; valour, luade the mare E and martiall skill, doth fo abound, that he feemeth rather for the good of this kingdome by God fent from heaven, than here in earth chosen by men. By this happy and fortunat choice, the minds also of all the Italians, which before lay heavy and discouraged, were lightened and remined: and therefore, that this choice might be unto the Christian common-weale both glorious and fortunate, they made their solemne vowes and praiers. At fuch time as the most holy Senate understood of the civile discord of this Kingdome, and the danger of the Turks fast by it sent me hither to deale with you for the appealing of those troubles, and repressing of that mischiefe (as you have oftentimes beard me say.) The Kingdome is by your force and valor, by my mediation, and the death of the Queene, well pacified but yet the other remaineth full of honour full of profit, full of fafety, olory and immortality, best fitting Vladiflaus conduct and fortune, and the valour of the Hungarians. The Turkish tyranny and their proud command (worthy Princes) is 10 be F repressed : yeatheir fernile yoke, hanging even now over our neckes, is to be shaken off, and to be driven away, What you are to dare to do the valour and fortune of Huniades foretelleth you: the fortune faid I, of Huniades? nay the fortune of the Christian common weale, and present mercy of our bleffed Sauiour, which suffereth his people to be up and downe toffed, but not quite drowned. If fo great an army of the enemies was a anguished and put to flight by the power of one of thy captaines, and that but fmall what in G to is hopedef the (mast mighty King) if thou shall leade forththine armiesthy selfe in person winds those own conducts and the protection of Christ lefus. The eics of all Christian Princes are cast wpon thee. of porthe Hungarian and Polonian forces, upon thee have they reposed all their hopes, they all expect that thou bould if he the renenger of the Barbarian cruelty, the defendor of the faith, and protector of Eutope: and that it is for which the Pope doth with his letters dayly follicite and important you. And albestaliat the common cause and quarrell of the Christian religion require it, yet doth the necessity of Honary and Polonia no leffe enforce it of which, the one is most miferably and daily vexed with the Turbe forces and foryout of Servia and Dalmatia; and the other out of Moldavia and Valachia. Now if any there be, whom neither the Zeale of religion, the necessity of the cause, the hope of immortall fame and glas , can moue, let their owne fafety, the profess feruitude of their wines and children, the fafey and of their H wealth and fulflance, the law full revenue of the wrongs done them, fir them up to take in hand this facred expedition. So fit an opportunity it new given unto you, that at one and the felfe fame time you may fet your tohe in perpetual fafery and happin ffe, your foules in quietneffe and reft, and onto both give eternall clary an thappineffe Toulacke not (worthy captains) mony, the finewes of the war, which shall be brought was you from all parts of the Christian common wealth, not lufty and couragious fouldiers, not pelice, not to: tune not the proportious beauchty powers, which have made choice of you for the defence of the true faith and religion : you want nothing (worthy Princes) but will. It is an expedition necessary, religious, profix whe and honourable : wherein are propounded most ample rewards both in this life, and in the life to come. Wherefore (most mighty Prince, and you right worthy Princes all) I pray and befeech you by the faith of Christ tesu, by the love of your children, by the health of your king dome, and deliverance from your prefent destruction, with valsant courage and one confent to take this facred war in hand, and so thereby to emoll your names in the eternall booke of fame. And fith that you are to go, not fo much to a worldh as a forituall war, against the enemies of Christ and his truth, take up your armes with such reale, courace, and cheerefulnelle, as the expectation and hope of men, as your valour, the prefent danger, and the mercies of Godtoward you, seeme of right to require.

The Legat having made an end, forthwith enfued the miterable supplication and tears of the plant of the De foot perfunding them, of the necessity of that expedition to be taken in hand, declaring ynto them the cruelty of the Turks, their torments & ftrange tortures, his fons deprived of their Tab. julius fight, and spoiled of their genetoires, many halfe mangled, and moe cut in funder with sawes; K the transport and price of the general special how much they had need to looke to themselves, told them, That they were but by the river Sauns, druided from the Turks, which in fummer was oftentimes to be waded ouer, and in winter hard frosen, and so to be passed: that the country beyond Danubius lay all open vpon them: and that he fometime the rich King of Seruia, was now driven into exileby the power of the Turks, deprined of his kingdome, of his children, shamefully disgraced, spoiled of his wealth and fortune, glad to fly from place to place, and yet not able to find any fafe place to rest in. First he fled (as he sad) to Ragusium, where by and by he was sought after, and endangered by the Turks: then into Hungary, which was also forthwith by them on every side invested; and L whereof the Barbarian king now asked tribute, to have fome colour for the inuafion thereof: which dreadfull enemy was not far off from it, but still houered euen ouer it:as well witnessed Valachia and Transiluania, two of the greatest and richest prouinces of the Hungarian kingdome, which had not the valour of Haniades, the fortune of the common. weale, and about all, the mercy of God, deliuered out of the hands of this filthy nation, the state of Hungary had now binvtterly forlorne. The euents of war (he faid) were diuers, fortune vncertaine, and that God would not every day be tempted. Wherfore with many tears abundantly running down his aged face, he befought King Vladislaus and the rest, not to let slip this faire occasion, neither by cowardife or negligence to break off the course of their good fortune and victory, but to make choice rather to become reuengers of other mens harmes than of their own, and to sa- 1/1 tisfie the good opinion the world had conceiued of them. He was (as he faid) a fufficient example to al men. Befides that he offred a great fum of mony himfelf towards the defraying of the charge of the war, affuring them also of great supplies both of men & mony from divers other

A Christian Princes. Which opinion of the Legatand Despots being generally liked & approued, a decree was made by a whole court of Parliament there affembled, That the king should himself in person, with all speed possible entertain that honorable war. So that though it were now voon the approch of Winter, yet were men taken vp in euery place, and embassadors sent vnto the Emperor and the other neighbour Princes, to pray of them aid against the common enemy. Who for the most part excused themselves by their own particular affaires, but sent noaid at all. Neuerthelesse many deuout Christians both out of France and Germany, for the zeale they bare vnto Christ and the Christian religion, for faking wife and children, and whatfoeuer they had elfe, came and worthily ferued upon their owne charge. The Spring being some, and supplication made in all places, for the prosperous successe of this religious war. B King Vladiflam the first of May fet forward from Buda; where passing the river Danubius, and marching faire and foftly, & comming to the river Tibifcus, he there flaied three days for the comming of his army. Departing thence, and marching on along it the fide of Danubius, vntil he came within the light of Bulgaria, he there at a place called Cobis, ouer against Sinderouia,passed ouer Danubius with his army, which was now grown very great: & so marched direally to Sophia scituate about six daies march from Danubius, in the frontiers of Bulgaria, so called of a most sumpresses and magnificent temple there built by Iustinian the great emperor. Which city being then old and ruinous & but badly fortified, was eafily taken and afterward Sophia taken for that it was not well to be holden, was by the Kings commandement burnt, as were all the other country cowns and willages thereabouts; to the terror of the rest. Marching thence, he C came unto the river Morana, and there incamped: where the plain country eafily rifeth & falligh in manner of the fea, when it is moved with a little wind. Here 500 horsemen being fent ouer the siner, not to much to feeke after prey, as to view the country, which way the army might most safely and easily passe, happed upon the Turks scouts, of whom they tooke source and understanding by them, that 2000 of the Turks were comming at hand, knowing themsclues too weake to encounter them, they retyred backe again with all speed they could, vnto the river; where many of them for feare leapt headlong from the high and broken banks, and so perished in the deepe, the rest certified with the missortune of their fellowes, stood still, doubtfully expecting what should become of themselves. Beyond the river was another hill vpon the top whereof the King with a great number of horsemen were hunting : whom the D Turks a far off descrying, and doubtful to fall into some ambuilt, of purpose laid for them betwixt themsaid the river, without comming on further, retyred. Which they that before fearefully flayd on the further fide of the river, perceiving, and now encouraged by the comming of the King downe to the river, followed a while after, fo to increase their feare, and so having well feared enounother regired on both fides worfe affraid than hurt. The next day the King passed ours the river, sending out his scours to see if all were cleare before him: by whom he was advertised. That the Turks were at hand, having placed certaine ambushes fast by, expe-Ging but a firsime to fet you him. Whereupon entring into councell with his best and most expert captains, what were best to be done, it was resolved upon. That Huniades the next night with 10000 choice horfemen, should upon the sudden set upon the enemy, then searing no. Huniades with E thing less. Who conducted by the espials, was in the first watch of the night brought very bersen assistance as the state of the night brought very bersen assistance as the state of the night brought very bersen assistance. necrevato them. The Moone by chance, as fauouring his great attempt, did then thine out, technic Turker forhathe might very well discerne how the enemy lay incamped, and which way to charge by night. them for his best advantage, which was by the same way they were most like to fly, if they should be put to the worst : vnto which place he led his men, and there with a most hidious outery entred the campe, as then for the most part buried in sleepe and security : when as the Turks awaked with the sudden noyse, as it were out of a dead sleepe, and dismayed with the horror of the cry, began to betake them forme to their weapons, some to their heeles. Of whom fuch as fled lighting upon the enemies though flanding in their way, ran as fast backe againe : the other scarce yor well awake, and ouercome with feare, and now scarcely themselves, had I much adoc to make themselves ready to fight. Huniades in the meane time riding vp and downe among this men, cheered them vp, still crying out and calling upon them, couragioufly to affaile their fleepy, naked, and fearefull enemies, and not to let flip fo faire an occasion, and so notable a victory now already in their hands. At the first encounter the Turkes the ther madea stirre, than fought; but after that they heard that Huniades was there, as men dif-

maied with his name, they turned their backes and fled, finding, which way focuer they tooke; their fellows halfe dead or wounded : yea, fuch a confusion was raised among it them with the greatnesse of the sudden seare, that thrusting together; with an inconsiderate desire of slight they trod one another under foot, and thrust themselves one upon anothers weapons: the great tel part of them driven headlong into the thickets and other ftreits, & not able in time to ger out thence, were there by the victorious enemy, fiercely pursuing of them, slain. All that night the fearefull Turks were with great flaughter held in chaecibut at foone as it was day, the refe that remained of them, ran alfo the fame fortune with their followes. A far greater flaughter was their made, than a man would thinke that fo few men could have made, when as but with 10000 horfe, 30000 Turks were in one night flain, and 4000 taken, with a number of their en fignes. Of Huniades his menwere not many loft, for the greatnesse of the slaughter : most set H port not aboue 500, for few of them found any enemy to refult them. There was taken all the spoile of a most rich campe, the enemy bauing carried with them nothing out of it. Huntades having in fo fhort time gained fo notable a victory, and inriched his army, returned to the king in great triumph : neither was that day more joyfull vnto these victorious souldiers, than vnto the rest of the army, who most joyfully expected their returne. The King and the Despot heathe meeting of ring of the approch of Huniades from the flaughter of the Turks, with the great applaule and poyfull acclamation of the other legions, went to meet him three miles: and at fuch time asat their first meeting Huniades was about to have lighted so have done him honour, be would in no case suffer him so to do, but taking him by the right hand, joyed with him for the victory thanking God in the hearing of the whole army, that he of his mercy had given him fuch a Captaine, as, without enuy, in all mens judgements was worthy to rule the Roman Empire in briefe, he shewed how much his country, his kingdome, yea the Christian commonweale, was bound and indebted vnto him, gaue him his due praifes, exhorting all others to imitate his glory : the like honour did alfo all the rest of the nobility vnto him. As for the common fouldiers, they could not be fatisfied with beholding of him, but imbracing one another, as if they would have died one in another sarms, welcommed their victorious friends. So with joy joy ning their forces together, & fending the rich spoile, of the enemy, with the prisoners chained together in long ranks before them; the King and Huniades in great triumph returned into the campe, where they caused generall praiers, with thanksgiuing vnto almighty God for sogress a victory, to be made thorowout the army.

The Legat Iulian, Generall of the voluntary Christians, which for denotions take served of their own charge, after fo great a victory most earnestly perfuaded the King and the soft of the great commanders of the army, to profecute their good fortune, and in God his fo great fautr not to loiter, but daily to march forward, and to take in the rest of Bulgaria; Nom had Hunia des by his espials learned, that from Sophia it was but three daies journy to Phillippopolis, a great city of Thracia; and the like distance from thence to Hadrianople; the chiefe feat of the Turkish tyrant; and as much more to Constantinople. The onely difficulty was; how to pass the great and rough mountaine Hemus, which running a matuellous way in length cuenvnto the Euxine fea, and mating almost the skie, divideth the countries of Bulgaria and Service, from Macedonia and Thrace: and for the great height and roughnesse therof, is not to be pass L fed ouer but in two places; the one made by the great Emperor Trajan and the Romans, where as yet is to be seene a mighty strong gate built of great square stone, whereby the passage that way was opened or shut at the pleasure of them that had the keeping thereof the other neets vnto a little river, which the Bulgarians now call Saltiza. By either of these waies, if he should find them open, Huniades vnto whom the King had committed both the leading and the comduct of the army, purposed to enter. Wherefore marching forward, they tooke all such towns of Bulgaria as flood in their way; some by force, some by composition: wherein was no small helpe, the conformity of the Christian religion, the horrible cruelty of the Turks, the great affinity of language, the most effectuall means to win the love of strangers: for the Polonians and the Bulgarians both discended of the Sclauonians, and vsing the same language, the Polo M nian horsemen came to no town, but it presently yeelded. But being come voto the mountain Hemus, to have entred into Thracia, the Winter weather being now very cold, they learned by their espials, that the aforesaid passages, were borh fast shut up with great stones; timber, and fuch other light matter, fo strongly, as that they were very hardly to be forced, Wherfore Har mades leaving the straiter way made by the hand of man (which beside the former fortification at the great gate, the Turks had in many places, with aboundance of water poured downe the free hil in the night, and hard frofen with the coldnes of the weather, made fo flippery, as that it was not possible either for man or beast there to stand, or to get up that way) on Christmas even came to the other, by which the river Saltiza runs, the which he found likewife flut Here they met with many inconveniences: first the difficulty of the passage (which old Amurath had (not without great reason) shut vp, and there placed strong garrisons, so at ease, and without danger of battell (fo often by the Baffa's vnfortunatly producd) to defend his kingdom in Macedonia and Thracis from the inuation of the Hungarians, who now of al nations he most dreaded. Besides that, in the army was such want of all things, as that the souldiers were ready to for lake their enlignes; and to rife up in a generall mutiny; for the country neer the mountain Hemus, rifing high, with broken rocks and inaccessible places, was altogether barren: & vi Quals failing in the camp, they were glad to liue with a little wheat & flesh boiled together, and that to fparingly, as that the foldiers began now generally to grow weak and faint. Befides that, the winter was exceeding cold, & the frost fo great, that many times they could not go out of their tents to feek for forrage or water. So the army inforced with hun. The Hungari. ger and cold, and the difficulty of the passage, began to retyre, and had vindoubtedly bin dif- ant inforced by folued, had it not bin for the often and earnest persuasions of Huniades: for he daily told them the passes that the greatest difficulties were past, that that which remained was with their wonted valor the Mountain and courage to be endured, wherunto nothing was high or difficult: That they should forthwith come into the borders of Thracia, where they should find plenty of all things: that they were now come to far, that if they would go back again, they should in those wast Countries through which they were to passe, find greater difficulties and dangers than in going forward: that thefe streits once opened, remained no more travel, but cheerfully to fall to the fooil of a most rich and pleasant country. They were not (as he said) to stay in the midst of their fortunes, for that it was not alwaies permanent, and for that the contempt of Gods favors caused them oftentimes to be taken from vs. All that was yet don(he faid) was nothing, if they proceeded no further for that what focuer they had already won, was eafily by the enemy to bee recovered, except that those which yet remained (for the most part of them, as he said, were flain, with their houses burnt over their heads) were driven out of Thracia and Macedonia, and so quite out of Europ. So whilst the soldiers heard Huniades speak, every man was wel incouraged, but when they remembred the miferies wherwith they were invironed, they curfed all the rash attempts of ambitious princes. In the mean time news was brought by the scours that the Turks were comming after them: but then began they to rejoice, as deeming it much more honour, manfully to die in battell, than to starue with hunger and cold. Against these Turks was Huntades fent with certain troups of horlmen; who incountring with them, eafily inforced them with losse to retyre. Eight times he incountred them (as the fouldiers there present reported) and as often put them to flight. In retyring backe from the impregnable mountain, the King with the greatest part of the army went before, after whom followed Huniades and the Despot, a good days march: When the Turks that kept the passage upon the mountain, understanding of their return, followed them down the hil, in good hope to be well reuenged of them before they (hould get out of Bulgaria. Caramber Baffa of Romania, and brother to Caly Baffa(a man of all others in greatest fauor with Amurath, and his brother in law, as having maried his fifter) was General of this army, & by him appointed to keep these ftreits; with expres charge, vpon no occasion what soeuer, although it made shew of neuer so affured a victory, to fight with the enemy: for he thought it victory enough, without any loffe to have kept his enemies out of Thracia. Which the old Kings command Carambey for all that neglected, in good hope by a notable victory easily to answer the contempt of that hee was commanded. The Christian army descending down the broken mountains, was come to a great mountain which the Bulgarians call Cunobiza, and part of the mountain Hemus. At some advantage: whom the Christians beholding, could not by their Captains be stayd, but that they would many times by Companies fly forth vponthem, and desperately fight with them in places of great disaduantage; saying, That they had rather die in fight like men, than flarue with hunger and cold. Here Car amber, being himself a man of great courage, and desirous of honor, and by the rashues of his enemies allured to fight; and withal, beside the advance tage of the ground, perceiving himselse to exceed his enemies both in strength and number of men, could not be staid, but would needs give battel, with such a defire as if hee had already bin affured of the victory. Huniades & the Despot had before perceived, that the Turke. prouoked with the brauing of their men, would affuredly fall vpon them, and were therefore much troubled with the absence of the King, who (as is before said) was gon a days march before they faw they could neither shun battel, neither could they have to don, would their defperat foldiers be stayd, for the desire they had to fight. Yet seeing Garambey comming down voon them, they put themselues (though vnwillingly) in best order they could to receive him. persuading their soldiers not rathly in sury to run vpon their enemies, as desperat men prodigall of their lives, but to keep their ranks, and orderly to fight, and fo like valiant men to car. ry away the victory or to leave vnto their enemies a bloudy remembrance therof. Now had Agrees battell Carambey fent his horsmen down the hill, and the battell was begun; whereboth the atmice met together with great fury, and a cruel fight was made both at the foot of the hil, & among Baffa Caram the hils and vallies also: in which hard incounter many were slaine, as well on the one fide as bey, wherein he the other. The Polonian men at arms (whom the King but a little before had left with Hanic) des against all cuents) with the Hungarian light horsmen (of whom the Despot had the leading) fought fo that day, as if they had fought for nothing more than how honorably to die: and the Turks for a space stood hard to it, so that many were there slain : yet at length finding themselues hardly laid to, as by desperat men, resolued to sell their lines dear, they began to faint and to give ground: when as Carambey comming in behind them with fresh supplies, ra. I ted the cowardly, stayd them that were flying, and somtimes with rough speeches, somtimes with fair persuasion, incouraged the wavering, and restored the battel, before almost quite lost. Neither did Huniades and the Despot lesse bestir them : but as soone as they perceived the enemy a little to faint, by and by cried out, Victory, with cheerfull speech encouraging their men, stil calling upon them to keep their ranks strong, & to vrge their present good fortune, affuring themselues that they fought against those insidels under the fauor and protection of the Almighty: who forthwith fent certain companies of footmen, who climing vo the hil among the bushes, with their half pikes and boar-spears panched the Turks horses, as they passed by them. These loose companies did the Turks horsmen great harm, and here began their battel to decline; they which were comming downe, for fear of the danger retyring K back again vnto them that were left aboue for the keeping of the streit; and the bolder fort of them which were come down into the vallies, compassed about with the men at arms, hardly recovered the rifing of the hill. Carambey in the mean time crying out behind them, one while called back them that fled, another while relieued them that fainted, and to the vimost of his power restoring the battell, performed all the parts both of a valiant soldier and worthy Captain, couragiously fighting himself in the thickest of his enemies, and by his own valor stayd for a time the lost battel. At length performing his last indeauour, deceived by the snow, hee fel into a bog, where sticking fast with his horse, and not able to help himselfe, hee was taken prisoner by a common soldier. The rest that escaped out of this bloudy battell, retyred themfelues vnto them that were left aboue vpon the mountain for the defence of the paffage. After L whom the Christians followed, through the vntract & rough places, vntil that hindred from their further pursuit by the approch of the night, and the abruptnes of the way, they were glad to found a retreit, and fo retyred vnto the camp. Many other great men were taken befide Carambey, but many moe flain in the battell, and most of all in the flight; few escaped but such as fled back again up into the mountains. In the retreit, Huniades feeing fo gallant a man as was Caramber (though to him altogether vnknowne) vnworthily bound and led prisoner by common fouldier, asked him if he would fell his prisoner ? Who said hee would; and askedfor him ten ducats, a poor price for fo great a man. Vnto whom Huniades commaunded to be given four hundred, and fo fent him vnto his Tent, comforting of him vp with cheerfull words, and willing that he should be well vsed. The Despot the same night comming vnto M. Huniades his Tent, to confer with him about the remainder of the war, and seeing so braue a man standing amongst the rest by the fire side, began to talk with him in the Turkish Language, wherof he had some knowledge, by reason of the neernesse of the Nation, and such matters as he had somtimes to do with them. And having some guesse by his talke, what

A hewas, and pittying his estate, asked Huniades how he would ransom him who said, That he cost him 400 ducats, but that he valued him at forty thousand : which the Despot offred to pay him. Thus by the strange change of fortune, was Carambey, of late so great a commander. and so neer allyed to the great Turk, valued and prised twice in one day by his enemies, as a mirror of the vncertaintie of worldly blis and felicity. The Polonians report somwhat otherwife of this battel; as that Vladislam should himself therin be present, and the chief that therin commanded. Howbeit the Hungarian Writers, whose credit we herin follow, report it as before, nor to have bin fought under the good fortune of the King, then absent, but under the leading of Huniades and the Despot.

Out of this battel (or as some others report, a little before, out of the battel of Morava) fled Scanderbeg re-B the great captain George Castriot, otherwise of the Turks called Scanderbeg, now seeking to deliver both himself and his native country of Epirus out of the thraldom of the Turks, as prefently after he did. Whose vnwonted flight not a little terrified the rest of the Turks Atmy. and much furthered the Christians victory, whose proceedings he alwaies secretly fauoured, having (as it was thought) secret intelligence with the great Captain Huniades, who not without instructions from him (as some say) gaue that great ouerthrow vnto the Turks at Morava. But of him and his worthy acts don for the deliuerance and defence of his country, more

Shortly after this great overthrow and discomfiture of the Turks, the two great Captains, Hunjades and the Delpot, together with the King, confulted for the removing of the Turkes C garrifons left about for the keeping of the streit passages of the mountaine, and the profecution of the war. Which Pladiflaus (confidering the difficulty of the matter, and his fouldiers necessity) thought it not good further to prosecute, but forthwith to return. But Huniades and the Despot, the one thirsting after honor, and the other in no lesse hope, by the good succes of this war to recouer again his loft kingdom, fald, That the Turks were in any case to be remoued, the passage opened, and the sparks which yet remained, for feare of raising a greater fire, extinguished. Opposing against the difficultie by the King alledged, the invincible courage of his foldiers, wherunto (they faid) nothing was impossible or difficult. To which opinion the King also (less the should seem to distrust the valor of his captains and soldiers) easily yeelded, and fo commanded on Gods name to fet forward. The first that mounted the hil was the viadidaus (e. D Kings battel, which by the roughnes and abruptnes of the mountain hindred, of times flayd. 101 in value to

But Huniades still caried with an earnest desire to prosecute the victory, and leaving nothing of the mount vnattempted, in fearching about found a crooked turning way, wherby he and his men more sain Hemus. easily and readily got up to the top of the mountain, even with their enemies, undescried or molested by reason of the broken couert of the place: from whence they were in good hope easily to have come to their enemies. But being come up to the place they desired, they found fuch a deep and wide gaping of the rocke betwixt them and the enemy, as was neither to bee Ropt nor filled up : yet being come very neer, they attempted by crof-bow shot & great stones cast out of slings, and other such engins, to have removed the Turks from their places. Who were therwith, and with their vnexpected approchat the first so greatly both annoyed & dis-comfitted, that they were almost at the point to have forsaken the passage, had not Alis-Beg (but the night before chosen their General in stead of Caramber) incouraged them, and taught them how by shrouding themselves under the broken rockes, and parapets with tumultuary labor cast vp, to saue themselves from the shot of their enemies. In the mean time also Humiades, by another more high and steep way wherby the enemy was also to be approched, had fent up other companies of foldiers, who fighting at too much disaduantage, were easily by the Turks rejected. So at length, seeing the vain attempt given by himselfe vpon the top of the hil, and the desperat danger of others in climbing the inaccessible mountain, where one might keep down a hundred; dispairing to inforce the enemy, he by the Kings command caufed a retreit to be founded, and fo again retyred down the mountain, to the great rejoicing of

F the Turks. The next day, the winter cold raging, and wants in the army daily more and more increasing the King with the great commanders entred into consultation for the hasting of their return out of that rough and barren country, into places of greater plenty, before the army were brought into any greater extremity. Wherunto Huniades (giving place to necessity which always suffreth not to be regarded what is seemly) now easily yeelded: only the despot spake against it, blaming them, that having taken the General, and put the enemies to flight, G and victory now as it were in their hands, they would not profecute the small remainder of the war, but cowardly turn their backs to their vanquished enemies; promising that he himfelf would find mony enough for the prouiding of all things needfull for relief of the Army. So faid the Popes Legat also. But for a smuch as the wants of the army were great, and the soldiers presently pinched with hunger and cold, they could with no hope of any profit, were it neuer fo great, be perfuaded to flay; openly crying out, that it was not their captains & lieutenants that wanted any thing, but them the poor soldiers that started for hunger. As for the Despot, That he in hope of recouering his kingdom persuaded things impossible, and no way to be performed, neither to be any thing moued with the death of their men and cattel, Need (they faid) could not be vanquished; but that when winter was past, they would willingly re. H turn again vnto the facred war. In the mean time, Winter raging, and hunger commanding, let vs giue ouer (faid they) and depart into more fruitfull places, there to refresh our bodies, spent with labor, cold, and hunger. For which reasons, the King sending his baggage before. retyred again the same way he came. Which the Turks from aboue beholding, and strength, ned with new supplies, followed after them as after men that had fled, oftentimes affailing them in the rereward, & fetting upon them fomtimes on the one fide, fomtimes on the other. with often skirmishes both did and received much harm. Whose maner of fight was to retyre when they were themselues charged, and presently by great troups to charge again their enemies, their backs once turned to them; and so troubled the army, that it was constrained oftentimes to stay: besides that, loded with the rich spoil of the enemy, and much baggage, I The Hangaria it could not of it felf make any great hast. Now was it by the way come into a great thicke ans much tree- wood, full of deep bogs and water-courses hard to be passed thorow: where the rest of the Army going before, in the rereward at the entrance of the wood were left certain strong companies of men at arms, as a wall against the pursuing enemy : whom the Turks with their ready light horsmen fiercely charged; where betwixt them, in the wood was fought a great fight. and a great tumult raised : vnto the noise whereof they which marched before hastily returning, in skirmishing, many of them fel into those deep bogs and queachy places, out of which they could hardly rid themselues again. Besides that, there were many crooked and troublefome turnings and windings, with fudden descents so steep, as that going down the same, their horses came tumbling heels ouer head, and there lay ouer thrown together with their riders: K in fuch fort, as that to avoid these difficulties, they were oftentimes inforced to fight on foot. In which troublesome skirmish about sourscore of the men at arms were lost; but of the Turks, beside them that were slain, were taken an hundred and seuenty, all whom Huniades caufed presently to be slain. In this wood the Christians were more troubsed with the difficulties of the place, than the enemies affaults. Wherfore wants daily more and more increasing in the army, which by reason of the multitude of their cariages, abundance of their baggage, and often affaults of the Turks, was able to make no way; the King for fear his Army should in fo long and flow a march thorow those troublesome and barren countries, bee consumed with hunger and fuch other wants, caused all the carriages and baggage to be brought into the midft of the army, & of it, all such things as serued rather for burthen than vie, to be there L burnt 3 and the arms as wel of fuch fouldiers as he had there loft, as of the enemy, to be buried in the ground, and all the weak beafts that served for burthen, to be killed. So the army well discharged of such vnprofitable burdens, marched much more speedily, neither was so much subject vnto the affaults of the Turks as before. And so at length by long journies Vladisland arrived with his army at Belgrade, where he was of his subjects honorably received. And hauing there staid certain daies, and wel refreshed his army, departing thence, and passing the riuer Sauus, came to the royal city Buda, where he was of all his fubicats joyfully received also: norably receithe Legat and Huniades going on his right hand, and the Despot on the left : after whom followed other colonels, captains and lieutenants with their companies; who at the first meeting

fuch joyfull acclamations and outcries, as that the heavens feemed to resound, and the earth to shake with the noise therof. Before the King, at his comming to the city, went a long company of the notable Turks Captiues; and next before him Garambey bound in chaines, vpon whom all mens eies were fixed. With them were also caried the enemies enfignes, and such with the citifens, more than a mile from the city, in token of their mutuall joy, gaue together M

A spoils as had bin faued. Behind the King came Huniades in a triumphant robe, in the midst bewixt the Legat on the right hand, and the Despot on the left, as he that next vnto the King had best deserved the honor of the triumph. Next vnto them followed the denout Christians that for the zeal of religion had most honorably of their owne charges voluntarily served in those wars : and on both sides of them the civil magistrats and best of the citisens. Behind them came the rest of the legion, and about them both vpon the right hand and the left, the promiseuous common people, doubling and redoubling the praises of the king and Huniades. Before all thefe went the Prelats and Priefts in folemn procession, singing hymns and plaims of thankfgiuing vnto almighty God. Vladiflaus comming to the gate of the city, acknowledging God to have bin the author of so great a victory, alighting from his horse, on foot went B first to the Cathedral church of our Lady, and there giving most hearty thanks vnto almighty God, hanged up the enemies enfigues, and part of the spoile, in perpetuall remembrance of so notable a victory , which he afterwards caused to be most lively depainted in a faire table of most curious work, and there in a fair church to be hanged up; as were also the Arms of all the notable Christians that ferued in that most famous expedition, which remained there a long time after. These folemnities ended, he went to his palace in his castle, and there having giuen to euery man, but ofpecially to Huniades, his due commendation, gaue them leave to depart. Thus the Hungarians, with whom the Polonians in most part agree, report of this notable expedition of their King Vladiflaus. Howbeit the Turks (notable diffemblers of their own losses) confessing the great overthrow, call the Bassa so overthrown, not by the name of

C Caramber, but of Cassames; and the noble prisoner that was taken, by the name of Mechmet-Beg, Sanzack of Ancyra, Amuraths fon in law, and brother to Caly Baffa, Amuraths great counsellor, of some called Caramber, after the name of his father.

Out of this late flaughter of the Turks, where Carambey was taken, scaped that valiant Prince and famous warrior George Castriot (of the Turks called Scanderbee) as is before declared: whose noble mind had long defired to break out of the golden fetters of the Turkish thraidom, and to be reuenged of the intolerable injury by Amurath don to his Countrey, his parents, his brethren and himself. Although he had always most warily diffembled the same, scandarbig for sear of the old tyrant: being oftdntimes solicited and animated therto by secret letters and wifely different messengers from his friends in Epirus, knowing right wel that the least fortune thereof had blot bit different states and the search of the different states are the season of the search of the season of the D bin unto him present death. But finding no fit means for the accomplishment therof, wisely of bimself and diffembled the fame, with all the shews of loue and loyaltie to Amurath that might be evntill bis country. that now in this great ouerthrow of the Turks army vnder the leading of Carambey, and in so great a confusion, he took occasion to put in practife what he had long before in his deep conceit plotted, for the deliuery both of himself and his country from the Turkish bondage and flauery. At which time Scanderbeg (for so we will henceforth cal him) having a little before imparted the matter vnto some of his trusty friends and countrymen, no lesse desirous of liberty than himself, but especially to his cousin Amesa the son of his brother Reposius, a young man of great courage; in great confusion of the Turkish army, when every man was glad to shift for himself, had ever in his flight a vigilant eye vpon the Bassa's principal secretary; whom ac-E companied with a few Turkes, hee with Amela and other his faithfull friends closely followed as he fled from the flaughter: but when he had got the Secretary and his followers in place most connenient for his purpose, he set vpon the Turks and slew them every one, & cartying the secretary away with him fast bound, when he had brought him whither he thought good, with great threats compelled him (fore against his wil) to write counterfeit letters as from the Bassa his master, vnto the gouernor of Croia, commanding him in Amuraths name, forthwith to deliuer vnto Scanderbeg the new chosen gouernor, the charge of the city with the garrison there:cunningly interlacing many other things in the said letters, wherby the matter might seem more probable. Which letters so extorted, he presently slew the Secretary, with as many more of the Turks as came in his way, of purpose that his doings might the longer be kept from Amuraths knowledge, who not hearing what was become of him, might easily conjecture that he was flain by the Hangarians among the rest of the Turks.

Whilst the same of this great ouerthrow is going to Hadrianople, and there filleth the Turks court with forrow and heavinesse; in the mean time Scanderbeg having with him three thousand Epirot souldiers which followed him out of the battell, as men desirous rather to fight for the liberty of themselues and of their country, than in the quarrell of the Turk, was G with incredible celeritie come into the vpper country of Dibra, in the borders of Epirus, a. bout 70 miles from Croia: where was most joyfully received, and staying there but a day, he chose a sew of those 300 he brought with him, to wait voon him when he went to Croia, as if they had bin his domesticall servants: the rest, with other 300 Touldiers which were then come vnto him out of Dibra, he appointed to be led by fecret by wayes thorow the Woods and mountains by perfect guids, vntill they came so nigh Croia as was possible for them to come unperceived; and there to ftay untill hee might find opportunity to convey them into the city to oppresse the Turks garrison. So he with a small company of followers, as if they had bin his privat retinue, took the way towards Croia. But when he began to draw neer to the city, he fent Amesa before with two seruitors attending voon him, as if be had bin his Se. H cretary, to certifie the gouernor of his comming. This yong gentleman, as he was of a sharpe wit and well spoken, so had he framed his speech and attyre, that hee seemed to bee a naturall Turke. Who as foon as he was come into the city, went vnto the Gouernor, whom after hee had faluted according the Turkish manner, he deliuered his message as from Scanderbeg his master, with so good grace, and words so wel placed, that all he said was verily beleeved for truth. But when Scanderbeg himself came, and had deliuered the great Commaunders Letters, the Gouernor made no further question of the matter, but presently delivered vnto him the gouernment of the City, and the next day departed out of Croia with all his houshold toward Hadrianople. Scanderbeg having by this policie got the government of the chief city of Epirus, the next night following found means in the dead time of the night to convey in I to the city the foldiers of Dibra, who were by this time come according as he had before appointed. Most part of them he placed in most convenient places of the city, and for the speedy suppression of the Turks garrison, he with the rest first ser vpon the Turks which kept the watch vpon the wall, and flew them; and afterwards breaking into their privat houses, flew many of them in their beds: the Christian citisens also taking vp arms at the same time, helped to increase the slaughter of the Turks, so that in the space of a few hours there was none of the Turkish garrison left aliue, except some few, which were content to forsake their Mahometan superstition and to become Christians. Many of the Turks might so have faued their lines and would not, chusing rather to die, and (as it is reported) also to kil themselues, than to forfake that their damnable superstition; so small is the regard of life to resolute mindes, K in what quarrel foeuer.

The city of Croia being thus happily by Scanderbeg recovered (wherin appeared both the greatest difficulty, and hope of his good or bad succes in so great an attempt) hee presently ient Amefa back again into Dibra, and other speedy messengers also into all the parts of Epirus, to disperse the news, and to stir vp the people to take vp arms for recourry of their loss liberty. But flying fame, the speediest post, had preuented the messengers by him sent, and already filled every corner of Epirus with report of Scanderbegs comming, and of all that was don at Croia: and the oppressed Epirots who had long wished to see that happy day, were now up in arms in enery place, wanting nothing but leaders; whose comming although they greatly desired, they staied not therupon, but running together by heaps (as the maner of the L common people is in all great tumults) they fet vpon the Turks garrifons which lay abroad in the country, and flew most part of them : wherby it came to passe, that no Turke could stir in the country, but that he was snatched up and slain; so that in few days there was not a Turk to be found in Epirus, but fuch as lay in garrison in strong towns. In this common fury, the Gouernor of Croia with all his retinu was by the countrey people by the way as he went fet vpon and flain, and all his goods taken as a prey.

When Scanderbee had thus recoursed Croia, and scoured the Countrey, yet to remove the garrifons which Amurath had put in euery strong city, was thought to be a matter of greatest importance, and most difficulty. For which purpose he commanded those whom he had appointed for Captains, speedily to repair vnto Croia with all the power they could make. At M which time also divers Noblemen his nigh kinsmen resorted to him with their followers: so that within a few daies he had together at Croia 12000 foldiers well appointed. With this army he marched from Croia to Petrella, a strong City fine and twenty miles distant from Croia, and incamped before it. This City is strongly scituat vponthe top of a steeperocky

A mountain, as all the rest of the cities of Epirus be, and was by the Turks wel furnished with men, munition, and other things needfull; yet Seanderbeg was in hope that the Turkish garifon there, terrified with the fortune of the garrifon of Croia, and the flaughter of the Turks in the country round about, would be glad to hearken vnto reasonable conditions. Which to make proof of, as foon as he was incamped, he fent one of those foldiers which had followed him out of Hungary (a faithfull and wife fellow) vnto Petrella, to offer vnto the foldiers, that if they would yeeld up the city, it should be at their choice, either to continue in service with Scanderbeel with whom they should find most bountifull entertainment) or els to depart with bag and baggage at their pleasure, with an honorable reward to be divided among them. The subtill messenger comming thither, and framing his tale according to the present occasion. R and necessitie of the time, first declared vnto them, how that Amurath of late our come by the Hungarians in a great battel, and looking every day to be fet vpon by divers other Christian Princes, was so busy that he had not leisure to looke into Epirus, or to send them any reliefe. After that he in the name of Scanderbeg Offered them the conditions before rehearsed, setting the same forth with many great words; willing them oftentimes by the way, to consider the dreadful milery that but the other day befel to the garifon at Croia, and others their fellows abroad in the country, whose dead bodies as then lay in every corner of Epirus, as a prey to the hungry dogs and greedy wolues. Which thing was easily beleeved of them of the garrifon, for that divers of the Turks lately fled out of the country into the City, had themselves feen the same to be true. The governor having a little considered of the matter, was content c to give vo the city, voon condition, that he with the foldiers might in fafety depart with fuch things as they had; not communing upon any further reward, because it should not bee favd that he had fold the city. Which when Scanderbeg had faithfully promifed to performe, the Turkish gouernour comming forth with all his garrison, yeelded up the city, and Scanderbeg Vetrella still mindful of his promise, gaue vnto them both meat and mony, and sent them with a sufficient deter. convoy of horimen in fafety out of Epirus.

When Scanderbeg had thus gained Petrella, he placed therin a convenient garrison, and set all things in order as he thought good : but suffered none to enter into the City but the appointed garrison, although it was then very cold and frosty weather. This don, he presently raised his camp, and following his good fortune marched toward Petra-Alba in such hast, as n if the city had bin running away from him. Well knowing, that though time be euermore pretious, yet neuer more than in martiall affaires, wherein the least moment is oftentimes of such power, as to effect or frustrat mens greatest designes. Petra-Alba is a City in the country of Æmathia, distant from Petrella three miles, strongly scituat vpon the top of a mountain, neer vnto the river Æmathus. Scanderbeg had scarsly well incamped himselfe before this City, but that the Gouernor therof, terrified with the fortune of Croia and Petrella, offered to deliuer up the city on the same conditions that were granted at Petrella. Which beeing agreed vpon, the city was forthwith delinered, and the conditions by Scanderbeg faithfully per- Pura-Alba formed.

Petra-Alba being thus taken, and all things fet in order, Scanderbeg carried with the course of his victory, without delay came to Stellusa, which is also a strong city in Emathia, fifty miles distant from Croia, pleasantly (as it were of purpose) built voon the top of an high his, standing in the midst of a pleasant and fruitful vally, with great plains round about it. There Scanderbeg incamped a little before the going down of the Sun, and rested that night. In the morning he sent a messenger to the city, with like conditions as were accepted at Petrella & Petra. Alba: which most part of the garrison soldiers of the Turks would gladly have accepted, but that Desdrot the Gouernor of the city, with some few others, earnestly with stood the test: wherupon a great contention arose among st the garrison souldiers. But the greater part desirous to yeeld up the city when they could by no means persuade the governor and those few which took his part, to yeeld to their defires, they violently fet vponhim, and deliuered Siellufa yest. F him with the reft, to Scanderbeg fast bound, and so yeelded up the city. For which fact, fearing ded by the garto return vnto Amurath, some of them remained with Scanderber, and afterward became Christians. The rest were either honestly prouided for, or els well rewarded, and suffered to depart whither they would All the other weaker places of Epirus, wherin any of the Turkish garrifons lay, hearing that the strongest Cities were already deliucred to Scanderbeg, in short time yeelded themselves upon like conditions: only Sectigrade (otherwise called the Hole c city) remained in the possession of the Turks: which city is placed in the upper Countrey of Dibra in the frontiers of Epirus, you the top of a high steep hill, as if it were an Engles peff Vinto this city came Scanderbeg with all his army; and having placed his tents, he began first to affay if he could gain it by composition as he had don the rest: and the rather to move them by the examples of others, he caused his Embassadors to declare vinto them all that had hanned at Croia, Petrella, Petra. Alba, & Stellusa, specially how he had vsed the garison of Stell Infa which yeelded vnto him, with all bounty and curtefie; and how that on the contrary hee had the governor in bands, with all his wilful partakers, whom they should presently see exel cuted before their faces, if they forthwith delivered not the city. This message troubled the minds of all the garrison, but especially of the gouernour, seeing before his cies in the wofull # example of another man, what might by and by happen vnto himself. Wherefore fearing to deliver his own opinion, and give answer to the Embassadors, for offending the inconstant multitude and voknown minds of the people; he first entertained the Embassadors honourably and afterwards turning himself vnto the citisens and soldiers, said vnto them, Worthy men and most faithfull (oldiers, what is your pleasure, or what shall we answer to these our enemies demaunds & Then one of the fouldiers that flood by, a rough bold spirited fellow, vnwilling for his owne part to give vp the city, and deeming the governor to be of the same mind, in that he termed them worthy and faithfull, and Scanderbeg by the name of an enemy, drawing out his sword. and with his right hand shaking it on high, answered:

Most valiant Governor, this same and the like shall make answer for us. Nothing was to lesse purpose. of a Common than with premeditated words to feek to terrific valiant minds, first with the divers fortune of Croid and Pullity to the then of Stellusa: for as the faces and countenances of men are divers, so also are their manners and dispowit, for the fitions. Enery man wifely directeth his own actions according to his own proper humanur, and by the fame to lang out of playes the fool or bedlam. We prescribe no lawes to them of Petrella, nor to them of Stellusa. neither let them preferibe any unto us. Let neuer fo base examples of cowardly slaues euer enter into the thoughts of couragions men. Braue minds disdain to imitate other men in their honest actions, much lesse in their cowardife, And why? for every man liveth after his own fashion. Wher fore let Scandether proceed in him kil the covernor of Stellufa before our faces, let him facrifice our fellow foldiers; do you therfore think that we shall die in their bodies ? Shall our living spirits be there extinguished ? Shall our bloud there bee x (bils? But o happy bodies of phosis of me ever to be reverenced, which in worthy defence of your liberty and faith have indifferently contemned gold, filuer, death, and torture, and what soever els miserable world. lings hold dear or difmall! Wherfore carry thou back again unto thy master this answer from a commen foldier. If he feek to impose those conditions upon us, let him once more bare that arm of his which men of courage fear not lo much as he thinketh. He may peraduenture inforce we to these conditions of his if God for like vs ; but affuredly, persuade vs unto them shall he neuer. And yet for all that your Master Scanderbeg is not the man we have long fince heard him reported to be of an honourable minde, easie to forgine, and one that will indifferently judge between the enemy and him felf: for why then doth he holding bonds the gonernor of Stellufa, for that he freely justly and honorably stood in defence of his King , his faith and liberty? Why doth he threaten him with death, wheras he hath not defermed the same, although 1 be hath resolutely offered himselfe therunto for defence of his liberty.

was he interrupted by any untill he had faid what he would. Then the fouldiers thronging bout him, and beating their swords and targets together, withall gaue a great shout, in token that they all approued his speech for answer. So the Gouernour incouraged with the cheeffulnes of his fouldiers, returned the Embassadour without other answer than that of the common fouldiers, and prefently appointed every man to his charge, and with great cheerfulnes ordered all things for the better defence of the City. But when Seanderbeg had heard the an-Scandering bis fimiled therat, and faid, He is undoubtedly a valiant fouldier, if his deeds be answerable to his words finit assurer to but if my force failme not, I will also make him happy among it the happy ghosts of them of Stellus.

And by and by after, he commaunded the Gouernour of Stellus with the other Caprines to be brought before him, and there caused some of them which were content voluntarily to

All they which were present listned with great attention to the fouldiers speech, neither fiver that was fent him from the City, deliuered by the mouth of a common Souldier, hee M A forfake their Mahometan superstition, to be presently baptised, to the great griefe of the other Turks. Defare the governor with the reft, to the terror of the defendants, were in their fight Defares gouerput to death : whereupon the garrison souldiers with great indignation gaue a great shout restricted from the wall, and bitterly railed upon the Christians.

Scanderbeg confidering the strength of the city, with the time of the yeare, vnfit for fouldiers to keep the field, for Winter was now grown on, left Mofes Golemus, a most valiant captains with a garrifon of three thousand souldiers, to keepe in the Turks garrifon at Serigrade, and to defend the horders of Epirus, vntill he might at more convenient time himselfe returne againe to the fiege; and fo with the rest of his army repaired to Crois, when he had in the frace of little more than one month, to his immortall praife, regouered his kingdome, and drie uen the Turks our of every corner of Epirus a excepting only Sfetigrade: which city also nor long after was by composition deliucred vato him. During all this time, from his first comming into Epirus, he neuer flept aboue two houres in a night, but with reftlesse labor prosecuted his affairs. He cuon fought against the Turks with his arme bare, and that with such fierceneffe, that the bloud did oftentimes burst out of his lips. It is written, that he with his owner hand flew three thou fand Turks in the time of his warres against them. But of his great and worthy victories obtained against the two mighty Turkith Kings, Amerath, and Mahomet his fonne, more shall be said hereaster in due time and place.

Afterthat Scandenice had thus by great force and policy wrung his inheritance out of Amu. Macedonia fol raths hands and sound the Tueles out of every corner of Epirus; he proceeded further, and tedby scander-C outerran part of Macedonia, making fundry incurfions into the heart of that country, being then in the Turks possession, whereby he so enriched his souldiers, that they desired of him no better pay. Which was for whall a thing with this restlesse Prince as that it began to grow into a proughe in most Princes pourts. That the spoile of Amurath his dominion, was Scanderbegs regenues. Complaint hereof came dayly to Amuraths court, which the crafty aged fire (being then regulated with the Hungarian warres) feemed at the first to make no great account of but as of that he could basily and at his pleasure remedy, although he was therewith inwardly gricued at the heart a Bun when the certaine report of one mischiese as it were in the necke of another, continually founded in his cares, and that he faw no end to be expected of these miferies helfenti Alia Balla, one of his greatest men of war, with an army of forty thousand select Alia Balla with D souldiers an once to subdue the country of Epirus, and to bring it against under his obei sance. an army of for The fetting forth of this great army, under the conduct of fortamous a captaine, replenished fort against the minds of the Turks with stick an affured hope of victory, that a man would have thought standarder. Scanderbeg had bin also adv takemand now brought to execution: yea the common foldiers before their detring forebowere often times at vain contention for the division of the spoile they were neverlake to Hauc': So ready are men to produce wonders to themselves, whilest they conferre but with their own defines. And on the other fide, Fame, the forerunner of great attempts, had filled all the small country of Epirus, with great terror and searc of Alis Bassass comming. The countrymen with their families fled into the strong ciries, and the cirifens within their wals fell to fortifying the fame, and kept continual watch and ward, as if the enemy had even then lien fast B by them: the acted men & women commended themselves and all theirs, first to God by praiers and then to the courage of the lufty foldiers with tears, as in case of extreme peril and danger. Only Scanderheg was nothing moded either with the terrible report of the Bassac comming, or the vain feare of his fubjects; but alwaies kept the same cheerfulnes both of countenance & speech, as he was wone, being well acquainted with the fumult of the Turkish wars, and hauing (as mas supposed) certain intelligence before from his secret friends in the Turks court, of all Amurashs delignos. So that having fet all things in order for the fafety of his country, he began to leasily an army at Croin: at which time most part of his subjects of Epirus, which were able to bear armes, repaired unto him: the confederat Christian Princes also, his neighbors, and for most part his kinsmen, sent to him great supplies : beside other deuout and warlike minded Christians, which voluntarily resorted unto him from far, in great numbers. Out of which multitude of people he chose only 8000 horsemen and seuen thousand foot, when as he might have railed a far greater army : and placing some few in garrisons in the frontier cities where he thought most conuenient, all the rest he sent home agains to their dwellings. At which his confidencie, his friends, yea and his enemies also much maruelled, that when he might have had formany, he would take the field with fo few: with which small army of fifteen of thousand, he marched from Croia, fourescore miles to Dybra; where hearing by his espials. of the approch of his enemies, after he had with cheerfull speech encouraged his fouldiers, he encamped with his army in the lower country of Dibra, neere vnto a wood fide, right in the way where the Baffa must needs passe. In which wood he placed Gnee Musachee, and Amela in ambush with three thousand men: commanding them to stand close, vatill they saw he had throughly joyned battell with the Baffa, and then with all their force to breake forth younhie rereward. The Bassa marching forward, came and encamped neere vnto Scanderbeg, a little before the going downe of the Sun, and there rested that night, making great shew of mirth and iov, with great fires in every corner of the campe, as the Turkish manner of encamping is. Wheras in Scander begs campe, all things were filent, and no shew of any fire at all; for so sean. H derbeg had commanded which made the Turks the more careleffe, deeming thereby the Chris stians as good as already discouraged. The next morning Scanderbeg ranged his army in order of battell, placing Tanufius in the left wing, with fifteen hundred horfemen, and as many foot. and Mofes in the right with like number : and leading the maine battell himselfe, the rereward was committed to Vranacentes, a man renowned in those daies, both for his gravity in councel and for his valour in armes fit to command or to be commanded but afterwards, among it the rest, most famous for the worthy defending of Croia against Amurath, being then there him. felfe in person. Alis Bassa contemning the small number of Scanderbegs army, seeing nothing therein to be feared more than the good order therof, gaue the first charge with a small troup of horfmen:who at the first incounter retired, as if they had fled, of purpose that the Christians hastily pursuing their vntimely hope, might disorder their battel, & so give occasion to their owne ouerthrow. But by the commandement of Scanderbee (who easily perceived the Bafface meaning) their dangerous forwardnes was warily waied, and all with fafety kept in good order. So both armies comming on, the wings began the battel afresh, and Scander beg with great courage bringing on his maine battell in the face of the Balla, valiantly charged him, But by that time that the battels were throughly joyned, Mufachee and Amela fuddenly issued out of the wood, and fiercely fet upon the rereward of the Turks army, where they made great flaughter, and forced many of the Turks for feare to fly. Thus was the Bassaes great army driuen to fight both before and behind, being hardly befet and laid vnto with a small number. The Bassa had placed his best soldiers neerest vnto himselse in the maine battel, as his most assured strength K and last refuge: these valiant men stood fast, and renewed the battell, before almost lost. And here Scanderbegs fortune was euen at a stand : vntill that the well aduised and valiant captaine Vranaconics having received the wearled foldiers into the rereward, and febting all things there in safety, accompanied with certain troups of fresh soldiers which he blought out of the rereward, brake through the Ballacs army with fuch flaughter of the Turks, that he minds way for A great fitteh- Scanderbeg & all the rest of his army. The Turks discomforted with the invincible courage of these old soldiers, and the slaughter of their fellows, which lay by heaps wallowing in their own blood, betooke themselves to flight; whom the Christians fiercely pursued, and slew of them two and twenty thousand: at which time were also two thousand others taken prisoners, with foure and twenty of the Turks enfignes : whereas of the Christians were slain not past an L hundrethand twenty. The enemies tents with all their carriages, were at the same time taken alfo, After this great victory, when Scanderbee had made all his feuen thousand footmen, hoff men, by giving vinto them the borfes of the flain Turks, he brake into the edemics country, and entred farre into Macedonia, where he filled the defires of his fouldiers with the wealth and spoile thereof, sparing nothing that fire and sword could denoure : and so with victory returned to Croia, where he was of his subjects joyfully received. Alis Bassa with the remainder of his discomfitted army, returned to Hadrianople, and there by Amurathwas hardly charged of cowardise and want of discretion, for that he had lost so puissant an agmy to so weak an enemy Whereof when he had cleared himselfe by the modest rehearfall of his former victories, and the testimony of all the other captains present with him in that battell, he was pardoned, and M

so againe received into favour, and that great overthrow imputed to the chance of war. Amurath having received two fo great overthrows, first from Huniades and the Hungarians, and now from Scanderbeg, and seeing himselfe elsewhere beset with so many mischiefs, as that he could not tell which way to turne himselse; tormented with despuire, and desire of reA uenge, whereof he faw small possibility, fell into such a melancholy passion, that overcome with the darke conceits thereof, hee was about to have become the bloudy executioner of himselfe had nor Caly Bassa by his gratie addice comforted up his dying spirits: by whose per Amerality the fuafion (contrary to his liaughty nature) he yeelded by his Embaffadors fent for the fame pur profusion pole, to desire peace of Pladislaus King of Hungary, ving the exiled Despot of Servia (his fa. kin for pare ther in law) then prefent with the King, as a meane therein. Who at the first gaue small credit of K. v. and flague vnto the Embassadors, or vnto such things as they fold him, vntill that at length better persuaded of the true meaning of the Tutke, he fow rought the matter both with the King and the reft of the nobility, and especially with Huniades, that there was an honourable peace concluded. The capitulations whereof were, first, That Amurath withdrawing all his forces and gar- The capitulati. B risons, should clearly depart out of Servia, and restore the same vnto the possession of George and of the con the Despot, the right lord and owner thereof; delivering also freely vinto him his two somes, eval dienvize Stephen and George, who bereft of their fight, he had long time kept in fireit prifon. Alfo, That Valiflus and from thenceforth he fould make no claime vnto the kingdome of Moldauia, nor to that part of Bulgaria which he had in the last wars lost. And finally, That he should not intrade or molest the Hungarians, or any part of their kingdome, during the whole time of that peace : and to pay 40000 duckats for the ranfome of Carambey. Vnto which hard conditions, when the Turkish tyrant had full fore against his will condescended, a peace for ten yeres was forthwith on both parts concluded, and the fame by folemne oath confirmed: King Vladiflaus taking his oath vpointhe holy Eurifigelists; and Amurath (by his Embassadors) vpointheir Turkish Alco-C ran. This was the most honorable peace that ever Christian Prince had before that time made with any of the Turkith Kings, and most profitable also, had it beene with like sincerity kept. as it was with folemnity confirmed.

Amurath with this peace delivered of his greatest feare, converted all his forces against the Amurath inus-Caramanian king, in revenge of the injuries by him don whilest he was occupied in the Hun-dein Caramania garian wars. This King of Caramania knowing himfelfe vnable to withstand so great an enemy, durst neither meet him in the field, nor trust himselfe to the strength of any his cities or ftrong castles, but fled into the mountaines, there fortifying himselfe more sure than in any other his strong holds. Amurath entring into Caramania, made great spoyle in the country as he went, and tooke great booties. At last comming to Iconium, he laid hard siege to the same.

D The poore king feeing his Kingdome thus spoyled, and his chiefe city in danger to be loft, fent Embassadors, and with them his wife also, which was Amuraths sister, to intreat for peace; offering to pay vnto him yearely the double tribute which he before payd, and for the performance thereof to give his sonne in hostage. Vpon which conditions Amurath granted him peace, and fo returned. In this warre, Aladin, Amuraths eldeft sonne died, to the great griefe of his aged father, being flaine with a fall from his horse as he was hunting.

Old Amurath thorowly wearied with continuall warres and other troubles incident vnto reftlesse roomes, resolued now to retire himselse to a more prinat and quiet kind of life; and therefore fent for his fon Mahomet, being then but fifteene yeares old, to whom he voluntarily refigned his kingdome, appointing Caly Baffa his tutor, with one Chofree a learned Doctor of E their law, to be his trusty councellors and chiefe directors. And so taking with him Hamze-

Beg one of his noblemen in whom he tooke greatest pleasure, departed to Magnesia, and there as a man weary of the world, gaue himselfe to a solitary and monasticall kind of life, in the company of certaine religious Turkith Monks, as they accounted of them.

Many great Kings and Princes, as well Mahometans as Christians, glad before of the Hungarian victory, were now no leffe forry to heare of the late concluded peace betwixt King Vladistant and the old Sultan Amurath: as being of opinion, that the profecution of this war so happily begun, would have bin the vtter ruin & destruction of the Turkish kingdom. Wherefore they fought by all possible meanes to induce the young King Vladiflaus to breake the league he had so lately and so solemnly made with the Turke: especially John Palaologus the F Emperor of Constantinople, did by letters importune the King to remember the confederation he had made with the other Christian Princes, for the maintenance of the wars against the commonenemy of Christianity: which Princes were now prest, and ready (as he faid) to affifthim with their promifed aid : adding moreouer, That whereas Amurath had divers times fought to joyne with him in amity and friendship, he had otterly rejected that offer of peace, preferring the vniuerfal profit (like to enfue to al Christendome by that religious war) before his own proper fecurity and profit, being for his part in readinesse to joine his forces with the Kings, if he would prefently enter into armes; which he could neuer doe in better time than now, whileft Amurath terrified with his late ouerthrow, and ftill befet with doubtfull war, had drawn his greatest forces out of Europe into Asia, in such disordred hast, as that it should seem he rather fled for feare of his enemies in Europe, than marched to encounter his enemies in Afia, and now being weary of all, had betaken himfelfe to a privat kind of life, To conclude, he requested the king, not to leave him and the other Christian Princes of small power, as a prey to the Tu, ke, who would affuredly with all hostility inuade them, so soone as he thought himselfe sale from the danger of the Hungarians. At the same time also, and vpon the departure of the Turks Embassadors, for the performance of such things as they had promised, let- H ters came from Francis the Cardinall of Florence, Generall of the Christian fleet, declaring how that Amurath having left almost none in Europe, was with all the power he could make gon ouer into Afia against the Caramanian King, leaving a most faire occasion for the Chris ilians, eafily to recouer what focuer they had before loft in Europe, and that he was in good time come with his fleet to the streits of Hellespontus, according to promise, and there law ready to imbarke the Turks passage backe againe out of Asia. Both these letters being read in the councell, fo much moved the King, with all the rest of the Nobility of Hungary there prefent, as that they were neuer more forry or ashamed for any thing, they had done in their lives, than for the league so lately with Amurath concluded for why, they saw that all the plot they had laid for their immortall glory, was now by this hafty peace that they had made with the Turke, without the good liking and knowledge of the confederats, brought to nought w and that they had thereby most shamefully deceived the generall expectation that the Christian common weale had conceived of them; and that they, of long time called the protectors of the Christian faith, the defenders of true religion, the reuengers of Christs name, and delinevers of the faithfull nations; should now be accounted the breakers of the Christian league. men forgetfull of their confederation both with the Latines and the Greekes, contemners of immortality, and louers of their own profit only. In this doubtfulnesse of minds whilest they she od yet thus wavering, Iulian the Cardinall and Legat, alwaies an enemy to the peace, and by reation of his place, a man in greatest authority next to the King, took occasion to disfluade the fame as followeth:

If any of you, right Worthy (faid he) shall haply maruell that I should speake of breaking the league, and colating our faith let him first understand, That I at this present am to persuade you to nothing else but the faithfull obfiring both of the one and the other led with like repentance with you repentance, I fan, as not forrow, when as I, as from a watch tower forefeeing all thefe things which were decreed against my will, to fort also contrary to your expectation, am not for the duty of my legation, and the Zeale unto the be Grande Christian religion inforced with you to doubt and so much the rather, for that at this prefent the question was anarato is of the loffe and hazard of all our honors and credit in common: which except we by common confent, and wonted valor endeanour to amend o how much is it to be feared, left for shame neither may you go out of Hungary or I return to Rome, where all things are with most deepe judgement censured, Consider I pray L vou into what miferies this hafty resolution hath cast ws. We have entred into league with the Turke, an tafilet, to violate our faith with the Christians, and to breake the holy league before made with the great Ethop and the other Christian Princes our confederats. And that for what, for what profit I fage Forfooth, that lowe might againe reconcr Seruia, long before destroied. Verily a small and wofull profit, which may againe in short time be cut off, and deprineth us of others far greater, and of much longer continuance. tor, what can be more fond and inconsiderat, than in our consultations to have regard to our privat profit only, and not to the publicite, without respect of religion, bonesty or conscience? It is not demanded of you at this prefent, (right Honourable) what you owe unto the perjured Turke : but you are by me Iulian, the great Bishops and the confederat Christian Princes Legat, and Agent, before the tribunal feat of your own consciences, accused of breach of faith, breach of league, and breach of promise; and thereof even by M your owne judgement, rather then by the judgement of God, or other men, I will condemne you. Answere me you noble Worthies: After you had happily fix moneths made wars against the Turks in Bulgaria and the borders of Thracia; and after that triumphantly returning into Hungary, received you not honoursste emballages from almost all Italy, and from the great Emperor, with common rejoycing for your so gloA rious a victory, and exhortations to continue the war? We received them. Didnot you in my prefence, and Ithe author thereof willingly make a most holy league with the Italians and Greeks . That the one should with their aid and power meet you out of Thracia; and the other with a great fleet should come into the Hellesbontus? We made it . If you made it, why breaking this, made you another with the Turks; or by what right can you keepe the same, being made? Wherefore if the last yeare you made a league with the great Billop, (God his Vicar here on earth) if you be men, if you be in your wits, if you be Chriftisms, this lecond league is to be broken left you should visiate the first, and that a most Christian league which except you do I feare least as Indas betraied Christ, so you may feeme to betray his Vicar for that God whom his thertown have alwaies found prefent, propitious, and favourable, you shall hereafter finde him angry, and an enemy to your proceedings. And now I pray you tell me What will you answer unto the Coultanting. B politan Emperour; who according to your appointment, hath now with the first taken the field, and in fo great an opportunity expecteth but your comming? What will you answer the great Bishop? What the Venetians and Genowates, who have their great fleet ready, as was appointed? What the Burgundians, who for their Zcale unto the Christian faith and religion, have long fince passed the Ocean, and so by many dangers of the sea now flote in the Helle spont? Denise (I pray you) if you can some excuse and colour that we may not seeme altogether unlike our selues : if out of your hidden skill you can corne any thing, shew it. Tou promifed with the first of the Spring, that you would be in the field: and now your souldiers both the Spring and Summer, play; so great and so wholesome occasion passing away, thorow your wofull sloth andnegligence. O the great blindnesse of mens minds! O groffe towardise! O detellable League, made to the acstruction of the Commonweale ! Some man happely will blame me, and aske, why I suffered it with C the rest? I was present, I must confesse but as much as in me was, I intreated it might not be, I disliked it. and (as many of you here present can testisic) totterly comdemned it. I was our come by the wisedom and inthority of Huniades, and the compassion of the Despot lest (unhappy man) he should by my intercesson seeme longer to want his Kingdome: and lest any man should call me a contemner or impugner of your good; I, full of forrow, and unwillingly, gaue way enot ignorant, the health of the Christian Commonweale to be therein weakened, the bope of your immortall glory extinguified, and we all (by your leave may I (ay it) accounted breakers both of divine and humane Leagues, for sworne men, and traitors unto all good Christians. Wherefore except before the report of our perfidiousnesse be further bruted, we deliver our selves from this infamy, nothing can be greater, or more miserable, than our shame or villany. If we will to do, we may not to casily, as justly and religiously do it . Having made restitution of Servia and the D captines, what remaineth elfe for you to do, (Noble Worthies) but to repaire your Army, to prepare what lo is needfull for war, and to keepe your first League with the Christian Princes? And to say, That King Vladislaus, after his league made with the Greeke and Latine Princes, could not without the confent of these his Confederates and Allyes (under whose good fortune that common warre was undertaken) conclude any thing, especially with the enemies of the Christian Religion? And that therefore if any thing were agreed upon betwirt him and the Turke, it was frustrate, and the league to be stood upon. Who is so partiall an efficemer of mens actions, that would not eafily judge, That in case, faith were given to both at were rather to be kept with a Christian than with a Turke; with a Beleeuer than with an Insidell? Against a perfidious enemy it is lawfull (as they (ay) for a man to vice all cunning, force, and deceit, deluding craft with craft, and fraudwith fraud. By craft the Turke first passed over into Europe, by little and little he crept into that king dome, he neuer kept faith with any, he grew to this height rather by cunning than by strength: and are you become so blinde, as to thinke it better to keepe your promise with the Turke, deuoid of all faith and humanity, rather than with the faithfull Christians, and especially the most holy Bishop. All great things are done by advice and policy: the Romansour anceftors uprightly and religiously alwaies kept the leagues with their confederates, but deluded the deceit full with their cumning. Ca fat was of opinion, that for sourraignty the Law was sometime to be broken. And Philip (the father and master of of him that conquered Alia) oftentimes wied cunning and descrit for the defire of rule yet were not these men called traitors. It is sometime lawfull for the common weals sake, neither to sland to our leagues, neither to keepe our faith with them that be themselves faithlesse. Lawfull it is to breake whlawfull outhes, and officially fuch as are thought to be against right, reason, and equity. Was it lawfull for Diomedes, vowing forto Cacrifice unto the gods whom soener he first met at his returne into his country, to kill his Sonby that his vow and oath? Verily it was a great impicty. Wherefore a just and lawfull oath is intle Indgement of all men to be religiously kept but such an oath as tendeth not onely unto prinate, but publike d fruttion, that ought not to be vaine and frustrate. Wherefore before your faithlesse dealing be further Pread abroad, I befeech you worthy men, and thee especially, most glorious King, not in any point to violate war fith for the good of the Christian common weale, given unto the most holy father and the other G Charlean Princes. The league you have made with the Greeks and the Latines, faithfully and religiously has the expedition by common confent taken in hand, by the example of your confederates, profecute the tour in son of immortall glory by you laid, build up. Deliner the Christian Proninces, oppressed with the I'm kab (critinde : latisfie the hope conceined of you, and deceine not the expectation the world bath now concerned of you, than which, nothing can be more dishonourable: make no conscience of the league you have made with the Infidell but thinke it a great impicty and wickednesses, to violate the holy league made me their great Belloop and the other Christian Princes: thinking, that if you should doe otherwise, God in buch he of his mercy forbid) would become of that your fallified faith amost (euere and sharpe revenand that you can do nothing more acceptable wnto our Sautour Christ, or more glorious to your selves tions to deliner the oppressed Christian countries from the cruell flauery and bondage of the Turke. Suffer H act this to fit an occasion to slip away, than which, a fitter can neuer be given. Europe is unfurnished of the lark Indied in the Caramanian war their returne is embarred by the Christian fleet, now in the fea of Helle fronting you need but to goe fee, and as it were to take a view of Thracia, Macedonia, Grecia, and Epimosthere is no enemy there left to oppose himselfe against you. Wherefore for God his cause, I request you at one all things to continue the Christian league, and with your happy and victorious forces, to march forward into Alacedonia and Thracia, as is before by you with the other Christian Princes your confederates tulian to literature. In conclusion, having much spoken of the authority and power of the great Bishop, he in of a absolute his name diffamulled the league what focuer, by the King made with the Turke; and abfolchiere was and him, with the rest whom it might concerne, from the oath they had given, and the promise therein take they had made. Which fo well contented both the King and the rest, that there was now no more question of the oath, or of the lawfulnesse of the war, but a decree made for the continuation of the league with the other Christian Princes their confederats, and for the profecution of the wars against the Turks, as was with them before agreed : whom, they could now say, they were not to forfake, and to leave them as a prey vnto the Turke their greedy enemy, now for nothing more in danger, than for that, at their request they had taken vp arms in their quarrell. Vinto which vinfortunat Decree, both the Despot and Huniades (the chiefe authors of the late peace betweene the King and Amurath) eafily conferted: the Defpot, induced with the great hope he had conceined of the good fucceffe of the war, and Huniades, with the defire K of the Kingdome of Bulgaria, promifed vnto him by Vladeflams, and by faire Charteralfo (as tome taid aftured vnto him.

> Of this the Kings refolution for the breach of the peace with the Turks, notice was with all speed given ento the Constantinopolitan Emperour, and Francis the Florentine Cardinall, then lying with a fleet of feuenty gallies at the streits of Hellespontus : for feare least they hearing of the former concluded peace, should alter also, or else quite defift from their former purposes. In the mean time, whilest these things were yet in plotting, the Turke ignorant hereor according to his promife had withdrawne all his garrifons out of Seruia, and other places before agreed upon in the late concluded peace, restoring the same unto the Despot and others the lawfull owners, although it was not done at the very prefixed day at which it should have L beene done. In which time also he fet at liberty great numbers of captiues, and amongst the rest, the two blind sons of the Prince of Seruia; faithfully performing whatsoeuer he had before you his religion promifed in the league with the Christians before concluded, so desirous he was of peace with the Hungarians, Howbeit Vladislaus, by the counsell of Huniades, detained to his own vse certain of the strong holds in Seruia: for which cause, George the Despot cuer afterwards bore a secret grudge against Huniades.

> Now as King Vladiflaus (having by the perfuation of Iulian the Cardinall, renounced the league betwixt him and Amurath) was preparing his forces, the fame of the Epirot Prince Scandering was also (by the recourry of his fathers kingdome of Epirus out of the Turks hands, and by the late overthrow of Alis Baffa) growne great, cuery one speaking of him honour and M praise. Wherwith Pladiflans moved, and reasonably persuaded what a furtherance it would be · vnto his haughty designes (aiming at no lesse than the vtter ouerthrow of the Turks kingdom in Europe) if he might vnto his owne great preparations joyne also the strength of that so fortunage a Prince, by the confent of his Nobility, with all speed dispatched away his Embassa

A dors with letters vnto him, certifying him of his honourable purpose for the rooting out of the Turks, and in that common cause praying his aid against such a dangerous and dreadfull enemy. The purport whereof here followeth:

> Vladislaus King of Hungary and Polonia, vnto the noble Scanderbeg Prince of Epirus, greeting.

It may be that fome good hap hath deferred this our late congratulation wntill this prefent, to the in- The Later of tem we might at this time, together with you, rejoyce in the double successe of your prosperity: first, for hings adillans the happy reconcry of your estate; and then, for that the same hath by your wisedome and valour, of late beene to notably defended. Wherefore in this we rejoyce, not onely in your behalfe, but in the behalfe of all good Christians, that it hath pleased God of his goodn: (fe, by your valour to have given to great an increase and comfort unto the Christian commonweale : for as much as among st others our great enils, the losse of the Albanian people hath not beene to be accounted the leaft, at fuch time as Iohn Castriot, aworthy Prince, your father oppressed by Amurath, and by the vngratefull Destinies taken out of this world had neitler the meanes to leave onto you his kingdome and feepter, (as onto his fonne, then living in his enemies power) either was able yet otherwife to provide for his affaires. And would to God this your father, most happy in such a sonne, might have till now lined : whose felicity had in that surmounted all others if he might have seene you before his death. For as you seeme unto me aboue all other Princes in the world (without offence be it faid) most accomplished with all the good graces and perfections both of body and mind; so are you indowed also with a certaine divine and wonderfull fortune: under the good conduct whereof, not only the whole Kingdome of Epirus may thinke it selfe in security, but all the rest of the other nations also, lately by the detestable fraud and violence of the Othoman Kings dismembred from the realme of Macedon, may also recouer the former beauty of their antient lawes and liberties. For (to lay nothing of those things which even from your childhood having continually made you envied, have heretofore purchased unto you an immortall fame and glory even among st the Barbarians themselves) what can be more glorious than this victory, which (as we have heard, and beleeve) you, to your fingular admiration, have obtained, by the overthrow and otter discomsiture of Alis Bassa, with his so great and mighty apower? but now, o Scanderbeg (God so appointing it, who in his deepe and secret wisedome hathreferued you unto these so dangerous times, for the publike good, and comfort of the Christian Commonweale) there offers it felfe unto you an object of far greater glory, with a faire ond fit occasion for you to revenge your felfe of all the wrongs and injuries both new and old by Amurath the Turkish Sultan done, not in private to the person of your selfe onely, but wnio the whole state and King dome of Epirus also; and northe domesticall and civile miseries of your owne Country onely, but the publike calamities also, and those opprobrious disgraces done against the Christian Faith and Religion in generall, now oppressed (I will not say extinguished:) and that is, if you with your victorious Forces, will succour vs in this extre-mity of our affaires, not yet altogether desperate. Hereunto do ill the Princes of Hungary and Polonia, and all other men of courage inuite you, Iulian the Cardinall of S. Angell intreateth you; with all thofe denout and couragious Christians, which long fince here with vs, and ready in armes, wish for nothing morethan the presence of your victorious ensignes. Which so faire an occasion (by God himself now of-E fered) if you refuse not, will in all mens judgement be a sure meane to vanquish and over throw our common enemy the Turke, and to drive him quite out of Europe, wrongfully by him of folong time poffeffed. Inced not therefore (as I suppose) to wse any kinde of persuasion unto you in this cause and quarrell, the defence we creof both purchase unto us health, light, and liberty : but being negletted, I feare and abhorre to forbode what may ensue thereof. We Christians have beene too too flacke and backeward in helping one another: the slame hath now well neere consumed us all, whilest no manthought it would have come neere himselfe. What do we see of the Greeke Empire? What of the Bulgarians and Seruians? yea, mine owne losses, and many calamities, already, and yet also to be endured, who is able to recount? The brane and most valiant Princes, the furest Bulwarkes and defences of the Kingdome of Hungary, from time to time lost; and the puissant Armies with one and the same fat all chance of war consumed and brought to nothing, F who is able to reckon up? In so much that there is no house, wife, nor matron, in all Hungary, which is not in some measure partaker of this heavinesse. All this do the Christian Princes heare of, and yet the miscrable estate and condition of their allies can nothing move any one of them, but suffer vethus as a sacrifice for the rest, to be on all parts exposed to the rage and sury of the common and mercilesse enemy.

Only Eugenius the most holy Bishop of Rome, and Philip Duke of Burgondy, have not refused to beare G a part of the burthen of this our afflicted fortune : the one hath fent hither his Legat Iulian the Cardinall with notable and puissant succors, and the other with his fleet at fea, and come as far as Hellespontus To much as in him litth, doth notably hinder the Turks paffage into Europe. And one other hope there is not new for from vs, and that is your helpe, whereof we are fo defirous which we require of you, moved thereunto partly by your valour fo well knowne, and partly in regard of the imminent perill and common danger of vs all. And albeit we are not ignorant, how enill you be at leifure to take fuch an expedition in hand, for the late troubled estate of your affaires, and your new recovered King dome, as yet scarcely well effabl | hed : yet notwithstanding let it not with hold you, or keepe you backe : asuring you, that as this expedition cannot be but onto you most honourable, even so this your present defert shall not be bestowed up. or ongratefull and thankeleffe men; but that which you shall now first begin and undertake for our preser. H nation and dignity we will from henceforth and ever continue for your glory, and for the increase of your greatneffe. Fare you well. From our regall city of Budathe fourth of July, 1444.

Of this the Kings motion Scanderbeg liking well, and thinking it farre better now in fo fit a time with his own forces joyned vnto the Hungarians his friends, thorowly to busie Amurath. than in thort time after, himselse alone to sustaine his whole power; by the generall consens of the Albanian Princes his confederates and allies, yeelded vnto his request; in liberall termes promifing him by his letters, in good time to be present with him with thirty thousand good foldiers. The copy of which Letters I thought it not amisse here to set downe also.

Your Letters, most innincible King, I have with like joy and contentment received: which I in the tere and hing generall affembly of my Chiefetaines having caused publiquely to be read, there was not any one of them which was not of one opinion, but that fo just an occasion of war by you offered, was forthwith to be joyfully on our behalfe also embraced. And so every man doth both publikely and privately affirme, That nothing could have hapned onto them more acceptable from God, than that they might by some notable serviceseflific their gratefull minds, and bind wnto them fo excellent a Prince; as alfo to give fo fit fuccors wnto the Christian Common-weale. In which forwardnesse of my people I my felfe tooke great conteniment K and pleasure, both in regard of your selfe, and in the behalfe of the publike and common cause : seeing my men of warre, and all other my subjects, of what estate or degree soener (without any persuasion wied on my part) to be so cheerefully and couragiously minded in defence of the faith, and of the Christian Religion; and so well affectioned toward your most royall Majesty. And to say the truth, Who is he (if he be not hatefull both to God and man) albeit there were no question of Religion, or of the Common danger, that would refuse so just and lawfull awarre? for such a King, as unto whom alone we may andought to attribute, That we Christians do not onely reigne, but even line, breath, and enjoy the liberty of our freech. Who would not willingly take up armes, and adventure himselfe into most manifest and certaine danger for the people of Hungary; by whom in all ages the Christian Common-wealth hath with their so many trauels, and so much of their bloud, beene so mightly supported and defended? Who even from the very L cradle have beene continual enemies vnto our enemies, and have as it were even vowed themselves for the honour of the Christian Religion and name. Would God (most mighty and redoubted Vladislaus) it had beene in my power to have brought onto you such forces to this honourable warre, as were answerable antomy courage and defire : then happily Europe should not longer lie in this ignominious estate, oppreffed by Amurath; neither should the fields of Varna or Basilia so often smoake with the bloud of the Hungarians; nor cuerquorner of Macedonia with the bloud of the Epirots; both nations being as it were become the expiatory sucrifice of others sinnes and offences; we all now by turnes perish, whilest eney mon thinketh himselfe borne but for himselfe alone. But why doe I vato my lelfe poure forth these came complaints. Truely, it neither repentethme of my Forces, neither, as I suppose (if it shall please Golthai our Forces may once meet and joyne together in jo happy awarre) Shall the Christian Common- M weale have any cause to sorrow or be agricued with the issue and event of our fortune. For wnto those fifreent thouland good fouldiers which lately discomfitted Alis Basta on the borders of Macedonia, my purpole is to joyne as many mor wanto them with all which strength as soone as conseniently they may, I will

A beginte fet forward ready to follow your enfignes to all events what soener. And so fare you well. From Croia the third of August 1444.

These letters being dispatched away unto the king, Scanderbeg forthwith began to leav his forces. And first of all he caused with new supplies to be made strong, all those companies wherewith hee had ouerthrown Alis Baffa; not fuffering any one of them to abject himselfe from this expedition. Vnto whom being in number fifteene thousand, all men of approued valor, he joyned other fifteene thousand moe, no lesse valiant than they: such a power as he neuer either before or after raifed for the recouery, or defence of his Kingdome. And fo furnithed with all things necessary for so honourable a war, cheerefully set forward, accompanied B with the vowes and hope of all his most faithfull and louing subjects. But being come to the borders of Seruia, he found the streit and difficult passages of that rough country that up by George the Despot, (Lord thereof, a man adorned with all the graces of nature, but otherwise wicked damned Atheist, and a Christian but in name only) who but lately before restored vnto his king dome by the helpe of King Vlad flans, having changed his mind, did now mightify cleave vnto the Turke his fon in law (by whom he had bin before himselfe exiled) and in fauour of his quarrell, and despight of the Hungarians, but specially of Huniades, had stopped vo the waies and passages whereby Scanderbeg was with his army to passe: who by his Embassage dor fent of purpose vnto the Despot, complained to him of that wrong, putting him in minde of the perjurious dealing of Amurath with him, notwith standing he had married his daughter: C and of the great pleasures the Hungarians had done him; of both which he had good proofe; requesting him if it were but in regard of the common cause of Christianity, to give vnto him (as wnto his friend by whom he was neuer in any thing wronged) paffage; and not to staine himselse with the perpetuals note of infamy, That he being a Christian Prince, and of late so mightily oppressed by the Turke, should now to the great hinderance of the Christian common-weale take part with him against his friends and deliuerers. But what availeth praiers or requests, be they never so reasonable, with a man set downe to mischiese? Scanderbee out of hope by any other meanes to open his way, but by plaine force, refolued fo to do: although it much grieued him to spend those forces vpon a Christian Prince, which he had prepared against the capitall enemy both of himselfe and all good Christians, old Amurath the Turkish Sultan.

But whilest he thus discontented, spendeth his time with his army vpon the borders of Seruia, befer with many difficulties; Vladiflaus prickt forward by the continual folicitation of Iulian the Cardinall, or else drawne on by his owne ineutrable destity, having assembled a great army of valiant and couragious fouldiers out of Hungary and Polonia (yet in number King Vladifarre inferiour to that he had in the yeare before, for that most of the voluntary souldiers were formers as returned home) fet forward from Segedinum; and in the beginning of November (a time vn- gamit the fit for warres) passed ouer Danubius, and entring into Bulgaria, came to Nicopolis, the Me-Tucks. tropoliticall City of that Kingdome (but then in possession of the Turkes) where he burnt the suburbs thereof, and in that fruitfull countrey thereabouts refreshed his people three or E foure daies, where hee also mustered his Army, and tooke a view thereof: At which time Dracula Vayuod of Valachia, a man of great experience in martiall affaires, being then prefent, and confidering the small number of the Kings Army, began to persuade him to retyre; faying, He had fufficiently learned by his owne harmes, to deeme aright of the power of the Turkith Sultan: who (as he faid) was wont many times to carry more men with him into the fields for his disport of hawking and hunting, than was there in the Kings campe: wherefore hee should doe well, not to expose those his small forces vnto so manifest perill, in such vnseasonable time of the yeare, but to referue them vnto a more fit opportunity, when hee might with greater power encounter his puissant enemy. This his counsell most men of greatest experience, and not catried away with other private respects, rhought wholesome: but the Cardinall author of this fatall warre, extolling with great words the last yeares victory obtained against the Turke, with glorious promises of great aid, as well by sea from the Pope, and the Venetians, as by land from the Emperour of Constantinople and other Chri-

succe fleverto thefe warres in Europe: perfuaded the King that Dracula his speech proceeded G earlier of renorance, vpon a funerficiall judgement which he made of the Kings power there present without regard of further firength from his friends; or elfe of the privat respect of his owne fecurity, in regard of a commodious league made a little before betwixt him and the Tanke. So that the poore Prince seeing his counsell mightily impugned by the Cardinall, and not fowell taken, as it was meant by him, stood in a doubt whether to leave him to his owne feature, and himselfe to his quiet peace, or casting off the Turkish league, to joyne with the wing in this chance of war; but at length resoluted as a martiall minded man, preferring the vaccitaine glory of the field before his owne affured rest, said vato the King:

Sacing that either your Princely fortune, which hath ever hitherto favoured your high attempts, or elerbe hope of friends helpe, which I pray God faile you not at your need; or the fecret designement of H your delling, vnable to be anoyded, doth draw your majefly into a different opinion from me : that your refeliation, which I cannot by reasonable persuasion alter, I will as the suddennesse of time, and my small abi-

And therewith presented unto the king his son, with source thousand horsemen well appoint ted, to ferue him in those wars; wishing vnto him such good successe as he himselfe desired. Afterward when he was about to take his leaue of the King, he preferred vnto him two lufty young men, perfect guides for that country, with two horfes of incredible fwiftneffe, and with teares standing in his cies faid vnto him:

were to take this small gift in good part, as a poore refuge to fly vonto, if your fortune hap to faile you, which Twendle to thinke woon : I pray God they be given in vaine, and fo they fhall, if my praires may prevaile. I

And to taking his last farewell of the King, returned into Valachia. Vladiflass marching on from Nicopolis toward Thracia, tooke many townes and forts by the way, which the . Turks for feare yeelded vnto him: at last he came to Sumium and Pezechium, where the Turkish garrifons trufting as much to the strength of the places; as to their owne valour, stood vpon their guard: but the King layed fiege to both the faid places, and took them by affault: where he put to tword five thouland of the Turks. The Turks Baffaes terrified with those vnexpected troubles, aduertised Amurath thereof, · requesting him to leave his obscure life, and to leavy the greatest power he could in Asia, for the defence of the Turkish kingdome in Europe, which otherwise was in short time like tobe K loss blaming also his discretion, for committing the government of so great a kingdom to so young a Prince as was Mahomet his sonne, vnto whom many of the great captaines did hasse icome to yeeld their due obedience. Amurath herewith awaked, as it had beene out of a dead fleepe, left his cloifter, and with great speed gathered a strong army in Asia, and came to the fireits of Hellespontus, where he found the passage stopped by the Venetians and Popes Galhes, and was therefore at his wits end. But marching along it the Sea fide vnto the fireits of Botphorus, he there found meanes to conuey ouer his whole army: vsing therein (as some write) the helpe of the Genoway marchants ships, paying vnto the Genowayes for the pastage of every Turke a ducat, which amounted to the fumme of an hundred thousand duckats! or as some others affirme, corrupting with great bribes them that were left for the defence of L this passage. And being now got ouer, joyned his Asian army with such other forces as his Buffacs had in readinesse in Europe : and so marching on seven daies, encamped within source miles of Varna, a City pleasantly standing upon the Euxine Sea side in Bulgaria, where the Christian army lay: for Vladislaus hearing of Amurath his comming with so great an army, had retyred thither, having but a little before taken the same City of Varna from the Turks, with Calachrium, Galata, Macropolis, and others vpon the sea coast.

Vpon the first report that Amurath was with such a mighty army come over the streit of Bofphorus, Vladiflaus who before was in good hope that he could not possibly have found any passage, entered into counsell with the commanders of his army, what course was now best to take: where many which before had been most forward in that action (prefuming that Amn- M rath could by no meanes have transported his army) was now so discouraged with the same of his comming, that they adulfed the King in time to retire home, and not to oppose so small an army against such a world of people as was reported to follow the Turke. But other captains

A of greater courage, and especially Huniades, faid, It was not for the Kings honor first to invade his enemies dominions, and prefently to turn his back upon the first report of their commings withing him rather to remember the good fortune of his former warres, and that he was to fight against the same enemy whom he had victoriously overthrowne the yere before: as for the multitude of his enemies, he had learned by experience (as he faid) not to be moved therewith, for that it was the maner of the Turkish Kings, more to terrific their enemies with the thew of a huge army, than with the valour of their foldiers, which were nothing to be accounof, but as effeminate, in comparison of the Hungarians. Whereupon the King resoluted to try the fortune of the field.

Vladislam understanding by his espials, that Amurath the night before incamped within B foure miles, was now putting his army in order of battell; committed the ordering of all his forces vnto the valiant captaine Huniades: who with great care and industry disposed the fame, garding the one fide of the battel with a fen or marith, and the other fide with cariages, and the rereward of his army with a steepe hil. Therein politically providing, that the Christian army being far lesse than the Turks in number could not be compassed about with the multitude of their enemies, neither any way charged but afront. The Turks army approching, began to The great barskirmish with the Christians, which manner of fight was long time with great courage main.

self of Varna, fought between tained, and that with divers fortune, sometime one party prevailing, and sometime the other to king V ladiflates. but with fuch flaughter on both fides, that the ground was concred and stained with the dead and Amurath, bodies and bloud of the flaine. At length the battell being more closely joyned, the victory C began to incline to the Christians, for Huniades had most valiantly with his Transituanian and Valachian horimen, put to flight both the wings of the Turkith army, and made great flaughter wherefoeuer he came. Infomuch that Amurath diffinated with the flight of his fouldiers. was about to have fled himselfe out of the maine battell, had he not bin staied by a common fouldier, who laying hands upon the raines of his bridle, staied him by force, and sharpely reproued hiw of cowardife. The captaines and prelates about the King (whom it had better beseemed to have bin at devout praiers in their oratories, than in armes at that bloudy battell) encouraged by the prosperous successe of Huniades, and desirous to be partakers of that victory, foolishly left their safe stations, where they were appointed by him to stand fast, and disorderedly purfued the chafe, leaving that fide of the battell where they flood, open vnto the

D Turks, but they were not gone far, before they were hardly encountred by a great part of the Turks army, for such purpose placed in a vally fast by. In which fight Lesco one of the most valiant captaines of the Hungarians was flaine; and the Bishop of Veradium, a better churchman than fouldier, and the first man that difordered the battell, seeking to faue himselfe by flight thorow the fenne, was there strangled in the deepe mud, after he had with his horse therin struggled a great while. The Bishop of Agria, a man of greatest authority with the King. was at the same time also lost, with many other churchmen more. The Cardinall, with some other of the expert captaines retiring toward their former standings, were hardly assailed by the Turks, who by the comming in of the King and Huniades, were with great flaughter forced to retire, and even ready to fly. Amurath feeing the great flaughter of his men, and all brought into extreme danger, beholding the picture of the crucifix in the displaied ensignes of the vo-

prised, and holding it vp in his hand with his eies cast vp to heaven, said :

Beholdthou crucified Christ, this is the league thy Christians in thy name made with me: which they Amuraib praise have without any cause violated. Now if thou be a God, as they say thou art, and as we dreame, reunge the ethonic chris. wrong now done unto thy name, and me, and shew thy power upon thy perjurious people, who in their deeds deny thee their God.

The King with Huniades furiously pursued the chased Turks, with blondy execution a great space: when as the King in his heat hardly persuaded by Huniades to returne againe into his campe, at his comming thither found the Cardinall Iulian, with Franke, one of his chiefe cap-F taines, and others, ouercharged with the Turks, which had againe made head against that part of the Christian army: and there yet fought couragiously, by reason of their multitude, being also backt by the Ianizaries, which all this while had stood fast with their old King, as his last and most affured refuge, but were now come in. There began a most cruell and sierce fight: in Acros fight the successe whereof, the Turks well saw the whole state of their kingdom in Europ to consist, many were there flaine of both fides: the Turks feeling their loffe leffe than indeed it was, by reation of their multitude, and the Christians, by reason of their courage. A great while the vicrosy flood doubtfull, infomuch, that at length the Turks began to shrinke backe, in that part of the battell where the King and Huniades fought. But in the left fide they prevailed fo vpon the Christians that they were even ready to have fled. Which when Huniades (having a vigi. lant cievato energ part of the army) perceived, he with speed made thither, and there again. with his presence restored the battell, almost before lost. Which done, he returned againe to wards the King, who in the meane time had most valiantly repulsed a great number of the Turks, and now was come ynto the Ianizaries, Amurath his last hope. There was to be seene a thoutand manners of death, whilft both the armies fought more like wild beafts in their rage and fury than wary & politick foldiers. In this confused medly, the yong king Vladislau with H greater courage than care of himfelfe, brake into the battell of the lanizaries: at which time. towardh himselfe was by a valiant Frenchman a Knight of the Roads, first wounded with a pike, and after affailed with his fword, and had there ended his daies, but that he was speedily referred by his guard, by whom this worthy Knight after great proofe of his valour was there flain in the midit of his enemies. Vladiflaus being got also in among them, valiantly performed all the parts of a worthy foldier, till fuch time as his horse being slain under him, he was forthwith oppressed by the multitude of his enemies and slain; his head being strucke off by Ferisee, one of the old Ianizaries, was by him prefented vnto Amurath, who commanded it pretently to be put upon the point of a launce, and proclamation to be made, that it was the head of the Christian King; which was afterwards fo caried thorow the principal cities of Macedo. nia, and Grecia, as a trophey of the Turks victory. Huniades after he had in vaine given divers braue attempts to have referred the Kings body retired with a few Valachian horfemen, and feeing no hope of better hap (for all the Christians being discouraged with the death of the king, had now taken themselves to flight) gave place to necessity, and referving himself to his supposite factor fortune fled over the mountains, into the rhicke woods, from whence with much difficulty, he got ouer Danubius into Valachia, and was there (as fome write) by Dracula Prince of that country taken prisoner: In reuenge whereof, after he was inlarged by the Hungarians, he fo aided Danus against Dracula, that in fine, Dracula and his fon were both flaine, and Danus placed in his roome. Inlian the Cardinall flying out of the battell, was found by that worthy man Gregory Sanofe, lying in the defert forrest by the way side, mortally wounded, and halfe r stripped, by whom he was in few words sharpely reproued, as the wicked author of that perfidious war, and there left giving up the ghost. Many of the Christians which fled out of that battell, fell into the enemies hands, & so were slain: but greater was the number of them which were drowned in the fens, or that by hunger and cold perished in the woods, or else after long and miscrable travel, finding no passage over Danubius, sel at length into the Turkish slavery.

This great and mortall battell, as it was with divers fortune fought, so was also the present report thereof most vicertain: for the Turks that were at the first put to flight, reported in the towns there by as they fled, that the battell was lost: & they which had all the day endured the fight, not altogether affured of the victory, & not knowing whether the Hungarians had retired themselves, whilst they suspected some deceit in the Kings campe, by reason of the great L filence therin, staied two daies before they durst aduenture to take the spoile therof. The number of them that were flain in this battell, as well on the one fide as the other was great; as the mounts and little hils, raifed of the bones & bodies of them that were there buried, do yet at this day declare. Howbeit, the certaine number was not knowne, fome reporting mo, fome fewer. Yet in this most agree, that of the Christian army, being not great, scarce the third part cicaped: and that the Turks bought this victory with a farre greater loffe, although it was of them leffe felt, by reason of their multitude; made leffe by that slaughter, as they that report least thereof affirme, by thirty thousand. Which may well seeme rather to be so, for that Amurath after this victory, neither farther profecuted the same, nor shewed any token of joy at all, but became very melancholy and fad, and being of them about him demanded, Why after to M great a victory he was no merrier; answered, that he wished not at so great price, to gaine many tuch victories. Yet in memoriall thereof he crected a great pillar, in the same place where the Kingwas flain, with an infeription of all that was then done: which, as they fay, is there yet to be feen at this day. This bloudy battell was tought neer vnto Varna (in antient time called

A Dionifiopolis (a place fatall vnto many great warriours, and therefore of them even yet abhorred) the tenth day of Nouember, in the yeare of our Lord Christ 1444.

Some maliciously impute the losse of the battel of Varna, and the death of the King, to Huniades, who (as they faid) fled out of the battell with ten thousand horsemen; but this report agreeth not with the noble disposition of that couragious and valiant captaine, but seemeth rather to have beene deuised, to excuse the soule dealing of the clergy; who as most histories beare witnesse, were the chiefe authors both of the war, and of the lamentable calamity ensu-

From the battell of Varia Amerath returned to Hadrianople, having loft the greatest part Amerath to of his best fouldiers, and there with great solemnity buried the body of Carazia, viceroy of vow, respense B Europe, flaine in that battelliand the nealling together all his nobility, againe refigned up his his kingdome to kingdome vnto his fon Mahomet, retiring himselse vnto Magnesia, where he lived a solitary mer, which he and private life, having before vowed to to doe, in the great feare he was in, in the battell in first time against Vladiflaus: but after he had a short-time performed these his yowes in that obscure gain upon him. and melancholy life, he weary therof, as some suppose, as not a little remined with the late vi ctory, or elfe folicited by Gali Baffa and other great counfellors, returned agains to Hadriano. ple, refuming vnto himfelfe the gouernment of the kingdome, to the great difcontentment of his ambitious fonne Mahomet.

Scanderbee yet sticking in the borders of Seruia, and hearing what had happened vnto king Vladiflaus with the Hungarians, was therewith exceedingly grieved; and having now loft the C hope whereupon hee had vindertaken that fo great an expedition, refolued to returne home againe into Epirus. Neuertheleffe, to be in fome part reuenged of the wicked Despot, he with his army forcibly brake into his country, and there did exceeding great harme. In his returning homewards, great numbers of Hungarians and Polonians, lately escaped from the slaughterat Varna tepaired vnto him, whom he (according to the extremity of their fortune) courteously relieved; and furnished them with such things as they wanted, provided them shipping to Ragusa, from whence they might in safety returne into their own countries. Thus by the difloyalty and trechery of the faithlesse Despot of Servia, was Seanderbeg staid from being present at the bloudy battell of Varna, to the vnspeakeable losse of the Christian common-weale: for it could not be but that fo many thousands of most resolute and expert soul-D diers, under the leading of fo worthy a chiefetaine, must needs have done much for the gaining of the victory. And what more glorious fight could a man haue wished for, than to haue feene fo puilsant an army in the field against the sworne enemy of Christendome, directed by two fuch valiant and renowned chiefetaines, as neuer, either before or fince their time, was seene the like in one battell against the enemy of Christ and the Christian religion? They were both men of inuincible courage, of exceeding ftrength and agility of body, wife, pru-The comparison dent, and subtill; both of long time exercised in the Turks warres, the greatest terror of that adis and Scannation, and most worthy champions of the Christian Religion, being therein both very zea- derbeg. lous. Of the two, Huniades was at that rime accounted the better commander, and the more politicke, as a man of greater experience in martiall affaires, by reason of his greater yeares: E which was well counteruailed by Seanderbeg his perpetuall good fortune, still as it were attending voon him, and by his experience afterwards gotten, as in the course of his History well appeareth.

Amurath advertised of these proceedings of Scanderbeg, as also of the great harmes by him done in Macedonia, and that the frontiers of his dominions bordering vpon Epirus, were by his fury veterly wasted and spoiled, and his people there for most part staine, and that the rest had for feare for faken their dwellings, and left the country defolate and unpeopled: was therewith exceedingly moued. Yet for fo much as he still stood in dread of the Hungarians, and was now himselfe clogged with yeares, and therefore more desirous of rest; considering also the young yeares of his eldest fon Mahomet, as yet what for the government of fo great and F troublesome a kingdome; with the perpetuall good fortune of Scanderbeg, and malice of Huniades: he thought it not best to convert all his forces upon him, but to prove if he could cunningly draw him into some dishonourable peace for a time, that so he might afterwards at leifure be the better revenged of him. For which cause he writ vuto him letters, mixt with grieuous threats, and some feigned courtesies, as followeth:

Amurath

nited the conforted by the first I never wanted honourable preferments to bellow upon thee all the while thou diddelt line in me wifer 1000 court of all others, most wakinde Scandeger, but now I want words wherewith to speake wino thee, the haft to highly offended my minde, and touched mine honour, that I know not in discretion what words to Te unio thee, but of late one of my domeflicall fernants. For neither will hard freech mollifie the natu. rall ficrican feof thy proud disposition, neither are thou worthy of beiter, which hast far exceeded all ho H fility. And because then wouldest admit no occasion to prouble me, hast of late proceeded to that point of folly, that thou halt had thine owne affaires, and the welfare of thine owne subjects; in small received Ly confederating thy felfe in armes with the Hungarians againft me. It grieneth me to rehearle other thy ankindeneffe, and as it were to touch those fores, if my minde would eaer fuffer me to forget the fame. or that thine to manifold and horrible treafons, and strange examples of a most unthankefull minde were to be covered with filence. Tet I thought good to advertise thee (although perhaps 100 late) least that thy vallaced heat do untimely overthrow thee with thy unlucky king dome: and then thou wouldest make bumble contession of thy long transgression, when thou hast lost thy selfe, and left no hope of refuge in the deferancestate. We have hitherto sufficiently suffered thy manifold injuries; thou hast sufficiently pronaked the majefly of the Othoman Empire, with wrong and contumelious despiont; and I with patience I have borne all these contempts. Thinkest thouthat my army by tree betraied onto the Hung arians shall be ome cuenged? I hinkest thou that so many cities and townes in Epirus, by thee rent from the body of my Empire, with my garrifons there flaine, shall be forgotten ? Or thinkest thouwith thy late committed untrages to escape my remenging hands? Remember the destruction of mine army under Alis Baffae the walling and burning of my dominions , and lately, the Hungarian warnes, by thee Co farre as in the mas, countenanced, with the territories of George, the Deflot of Seraia my futher in law, by thee for led. At length amend, thou graceleffe man, and expect not further, whether my indignation will breaks out. Let not these triffing allurements of thy good fortune, so puffe up thy fools he desires, and sharpen thy concits, that thy miscrable fortune afterwards may move, even thy greatest enemies, or my selfets compassion. I would thou shouldest at length remember my courtestes (if any sparke of humanity remaine " anthy faunge nature) and make me not longer forry, that I have so entil bestowed the same. And although it is not the part of an honourable minde, to rehearfe those things which we have in bounty bestowed upon any man, yet is it the token of a most unthankefull nature so easily to forget all kindenesse past, as to need to le put in remembrance thereof: wherefore Scanderbeg, I cannot but bewaile thy hap, and lament three flate : For to let paffe the health of thy (oule (which thou a very reprobate, esteemest us nothing) not tot to speake of the lawes of Mahomet by thee despised, and the holy Prophet by thee contemned, for the Zeale thou half unto the Christian superstition what hast thou (which now holdest thy poore and base king dome in fach price) cuer wanted at my hands of all those things which most delight the desire of ment Diddell thou ener want armour, lorses agreat traincoffollowers and seruants, mony, or other superfluction, the allow ements of all ages? or diddeft thou want matter to exercise thy valor, for increase of thine L honour ? Wast thou cuer denied preferments, dignities, and honours of all forts fit for thine age, both at home & alroad: Was any man in my court dearer onto me, than thy felfe? what growing wit, not of strangers anely, but of them that were neerest unto my selfe, was better welcome unto me than thine? With what carefull instructions did I cause thee to be brought up? When thou wast delinered worso me almost a. h.ld. I dayly cherified and increased thy hoped towardlinesse, with learning and nurture: I have at all times honoured thee with rich rewards, magnificall praifes, and honours of the field (which of all worthy things is most giorious) so that in all feats of armes no souldier was to me better knowne, or captaine of me mere homeword. For all these great benefits, Scanderbeg, thou now sheetest thy selfe such an one, that I may be thought not to have brought up fuch a man as I hoped for, but a very serpent in mine owne bo-Some. But the lone of thy country did move thee , which if thou hadft asked of me, would I have denied M the fame anto thee? which (if thou doeft well remember) & fo oftentimes voluntarily profered unto the? But then had left rather to gaine the fame by trechery, than to receive it of my hands of courtefie. So thine be is therefore on God his name, and that with my very good will. And verily, according tomy accustomedelementy towards all them whom I have once well knowne, and beene familiarly acquainted

A with I now pardon thee all thou hast offended me; not for any thy present deserts, which are none, but becaule in this publique enmitie it pleaseth me to remember my former kindnes in privat towards thee. and the faithfulnes Comtimes in my affairs effectially for that the time was much longer wherin thou for needit me shan the time wherin thou hast offended me . Croia and thy fathers king dom (although thou hast gained the Came by foul trechery) I give unto thee, upon condition thou willingly restore unto mee the other towns of Epirous which by no right belong unto thee, but are myne by law of Arms, by my (elf honourably won. What foeuer thou haft taken from my father in law the Prince of Servia, thou that prefently reflore. and make him an bonorable recompence for the other harms thou halt don unto him and for ever herafter thou shalt as well forbear to offer violence to any our friends, as to aid any our Enemies. So shalt thou for ener avoid the diffleasure of the Turks, and stand in my good orace and favor, as thou half don before. B Except thou hadft rather (being taught by thine own harms) then in vain cry for mercy, when thy furious outrage shall have me in person an implacable revenger. Thou knowest thy forces, thou knowest the Grenoth of myne arms , thou halt before thyne eies the fresh example of the Hungarian fortune so that thru needelt no further admonition: yet I would thou shouldst wrote at large what thou intended to do. Thou mayle ally confer with Ayradin our fernant, our truly and faithfull me flenger of whom I how that understand more than are in these letters comprised. Farewell if thou be wife. From Hadrianople.

To these letters Scanderbeg gave small credit, and lesse to the messenger, but least of all to the old fox himselfe, whom he well knew to have written nothing simply of good meaning. C but only to gain a ceffation from wars, vntill hee might at better leifure fet vpon him with all his forces. Wherfore calling Ayradin the messenger vnto him (whom he rather held for a crasty soy, than an honorable Embassador) after he had many times both publiquely and privatly difcourfed with him, fo far forth as was possible to found the depth of his comming, & had also further entertained him with all honorable curtesies, he shewed him all his campe, with the strength therof; which he did, because the crafty messenger should not think that he was any thing afraid of his mafters greatnes. And at last greatly complaining of Amuraths cruel and perfidious dealing against his father, his brethren, and himselfe; hee fent him away with fuch answer in writing as followeth:

The Soldier of CHRIST TESUS, George Castriot, Syrnamed Scanderbeg, Prince of Epirus, to Amurath Othoman King of the Turks fends greeting.

Hou hast intimes past (as thou writest) exceeded me in many kinds of surtestes; and at this present Scanderbess I will exceed thee in modest and temperat speech : for I think there is no greater token of a base resolut answer mind shan not to be able to forbear to give railing and opprobrious words even unto our most mortall enemies. Wherfore we have with patience received and seene both thy letters and messenger; and to consesse a truth, they have ministred unto me greater occasion of smile than of choler : whilf at the first thou shamest not to accuse me of much ingratitude and treason; and presently following a milder passion, seemest carefull of my fouls health being ignorant of thyne own estate, as a studious defender of a most damnable error. And at last keeping neither law of arms, nor orderly course answering to our affaires, dost most insolently and unaduisedly, as a valiant Conqueror to his vanquished enemie, propound many conditions of peace, of fuch qualitie and condition that myne ears scorn to hear the same. Truly, Amurath, although thy immoderat railing might mone a man of greatest patience to intemperat speech : yet I impute the same partly to thy great age and partly to the waiwardnes of thy nature, and the rest, to thy conceined griefe, which I know theu canst hardly moderat : and the rather, for that I have not set down my self to contend with thee in foul and unfeerly language, but with arms and the just fury of war. Yet I pray thee, wherefore dost thou so exclaim against me before God and man? as though thou hadst first suffered wrong and I injury from me, and that thou hadft not in truth first don the same. Dost thou call my necessary departing, a perfidious trechery? my native country by my policy and valor recovered, dost thou object to me as a villimie? object the same still and spare not; charge me with such crimes for ever, I care not. The long catalogue of thy kindnes toward me, which shou rehearfest, I could willingly remember if it drew not with it the fad and wofull remembrance of my greater miseries. Which if they were equally weighed, and G aprightly compared together, the greatnes of thy good deferts would be quite ouerwhelmed with the mulitude of thy greater tyranses, which I had rather thou shouldst count with thy felf, than blush while I repeat them, Every manthat knoweth them, may maruel how I had power to endure them, or that thou wall not weary at last of thy cruelty and secret hatred. Thou tookst away my fathers King domby force. thou didly murther my brethren, and my felf thou didly most wickedly vow to death, when I little feared any fuch crucky. And doth it now feem frange to thee, o Amurath, that an invincible mind defirous of liberty, should feek to break out of the bonds of so great and insolent slavery. How long didst then thinke at length I would endure thy proud bondage ? which for all that I many years endured, and refuled not thy command : I exposed my self to publique and privat dangers both voluntary, and by thy deficiment: freeches were quenout daily by thy felf and the admonition of my friends concerning thy deep trecherie w was rife in myne cars. Yet for all that, of long time I simply beleeved both thy words and deeds to have bin denoid of all fraud, untill thy cankered malice began too too apparantly to shew it self. Then began I also to glofe with thee, wholly metamorphofed into thype own conceits, whil I found occasion to recover my liberty. Wherfore there is no cause thou shouldst now grieve if thou be well beaten with thy own rod. But thefe art but trifles, Amurath, in comparison of those things which I have laid up in hope and resolution of mind. Therfore herafter cease thine angry threats, and tell not ws of the Hungarian fortune : energy man hath his own resolutions, and enery man a particular governor of his actions; and so will we with patience enclare such fortune as it shall please God to appoint us. In the meantime, for direction of our offairs we will not request counsell of our enemies, nor peace of thee but victory by the help of God. Fare. well. From our Camp.

When Amurath had read these letters, and further conferred with Agradin, he was filled with wrath and dignation, wondring at the great resolution of so small a Prince, presently casting in his mind (as was thought) the difficulty of that war. Yet because he would give no token of fear oftentimes floking his white beard as his manner was when he was thorowly approximately with a diffembling cheerfulnes of countenance faid,

Then desires (wicked man) thou desirest the title of some honorable death: Wee will give it thee (behereof camp lecue as) we will a unit thee we our selues will be present at the buriall of our softer Childe, and in person (though wibidden) honor the funerall pomp of the great King of Epirus, that thou shalt never complain & among the damned a hofts, that thou didft die a bale or obscure kind of death.

> And because at that time, by reason of many great occurrents, hee could not convert his whole power into Epirus, he fent Ferifes one of his best captains, with 9000 choice horsmen, to keep Scanderbeg in doing, and to spoil his country as much as he could. Which was with fuch speed don, as it was thought Ferifes would have bin in the heart of Epirus, before Scanderbeg could have had knowledge of his comming. But for all his haft, he could not fo preuent the flying fame, but that Scanderbeg hearing therof, and having his men alwaies in readines, placed 1500 good footmen in ambush vpon the rough mountains leading into the vally of Movea, wherby the Turks must needs passe into Epirus; placing also 2000 horsmen as he thought most fit & convenient for the purpose, Ferifes descending from the high mountains full of woods and bushes, by the broken and stony waies leading into the Valley, was in that troublesome and intricate passage fiercely set upon by Scanderbegs ready sootmen, suddenly arifing out of ambush; where the Turks having no vie of their horses, but rather by them incombred, were flain as Deer inclosed in a toil. In this conflict 760 Turks were taken prisoners, and a great number flain, and Ferifes himself with the rest inforced to fly, crying still out as he fled, Better some saued than all lest. Scanderbeg having thus overthrowne Ferises, pursued him into Macedonia, and with the spoil there taken rewarded his soldiers, as he had also many times before done.

> Amurath grieved with the overthrow of Ferifes, presently sent Mustapha a politique and hardy Captain, with a new supply of fix thousand souldiers to take the charge from Ferifes; M commaunding him in no case, nor vpon any occasion to enter far into Epirus, but onely to burn and spoil the frontiers therof, faying, That he would account it for good feruice, if hee might but understand that the trees and fruits of that country had felt the force of his anger.

A Mastapha having received his charge, when he began to draw neere to the borders of Epirus. continually fent out feours before his army, to fee if the passages were clear, and so warrly entred the vally of Mocrea, where Ferizes not long before was ouerthrown. In this fruitful vally (being the frontiers of Scanderbegs dominion) Mustasha intrenched his army voon the rifing of a hill and placed espials upon the top of the high mountains round about, by them to discouer the comming of the enemy, and to have notice therof by fignes into the camp: then referuing 4000 horsmen with himself to keep his camp, he sent forth the rest of the Army, about good horfmen to forrage and spoil the country; giving charge before, that every man voor pain of death should presently retyre vnto the Campe, vpon signe given from thence as vnto a place of fafety and refuge. The Turkish army ranging over that rich and pleasant Valley, B hurnt the villages cut down trees, spoiled the vineyards, and made hauock of all things that fire and fword gould destroy: in that point executing Amuraths command to the full. At length Scanderbee drawing neer to this vally with 4000 horfemen and 1000 foot, was aduertifed of all the enemies doings by an Epirot foldier, who grieuoufly wounded, had hardly efcaped from the Turks; of him he vnderstood what number of Turks were burning and destroying the country, of the Camp also kept by Mustapha, and how espials were placed upon the mountains. Scanderbeg having well confidered Mustapha's wary proceedings, and seeing no policie to be viced against fo carefull an enemy; resoluted to vanquish him by plaine force, by affaulting him fuddenly in his trenches, before his dispersed soldiers could repair to the camp, valiant resolu-And having to this purpose with effectuall persuasions incouraged the minds of his valiant time of Musilafoldiers, ready of themselves to follow him thorow all dangers; when he had set all things in phainbucamp order for the affaulting of the enemies camp, speedily entred the vally, and was presently discoursed by the enemies espials from the tops of the high hils, and a sign given to the Camp. from whence also the appointed fign was given for the dispersed soldiers to retyre; but most of them being strayd from the camp, and busied in taking the spoil of the country, heard not or faw not the fign given. Those which were within the hearing therof, retyted to the Camp; after whom followed Scanderbees fouldiers, terrifying them with calling upon the name of Scanderbee. Many of the Turks were by the Christians flain in the entrance of the camp, with their booties in their hands, and presently the Turks trenches were now by Scanderbeg's foldiers couragiously affaulted, and the Turks beaten from the top of them. They having won the

D trenches, preuailed stil vpon the Turks, filling all their camp with fear and slaughter. There was no vie of thot in that medly by reason of the streightnesse of the place, for they were now come to pel mel, Mustapha seeing his soldiers put to the worst, & that the camp was not long to be defended, took horse and fled by the port which was farthest from the enemy. The rest of the foldiers fled alfo, making such poor shift for themselves as they could. In this battail 5000 Turks were slaine, and but 300 taken: for the Christians inraged with the spoil of the country, reuenged them felues with the flaughter of the Turks. Scanderbeg loft in this conflict but 20 horsmen and 50 footmen. The rest of the Turks army dispersed in the country, hearing the tumult in the camp, misdoubting the fortune of their fellows, fled also yet many of them were in that flight purfued and flain.

After this misfortune, Mustapha returning to Amurath, the better to excuse the misfortune of himself and the other captains before sent, greatly commended the innincible courage of Scanderbeg, and his wonderfull skil in feats of Armes; persuading Amurath either to send a greater power against him, or els none at all : saying, that to send such small Armies, was but to administer matter to the increase of his glory, and the infamy of the Turks; and to vse policy against him the master of policie, was but meer folly. It grieued Amurath to hear the praifes of his enemy, although he knew the same to be true, by the continual! fortune he had alwaies against his great captains. Alia Bassa, Ferizes, and Mustapha: wherfore he determined for a time not to prouoke him further, but to suffer him to live in peace: yet commanded Musta-Pha to renew his army for defence of the borders of his kingdome toward Epirus, against the

F innovation of Scanderbeg; but freitly commanding him, in no case to invade any part of Epirus, neither upon any occasion offered, or conceiued hope of victory, to join battell with Seinderbeg, for fear of such euil succes as before.

At this time also the Grecians of Peloponesus (now called Morea, having before fortified the Arcit of Corinth from sea to sea, with a perpetual wall which they called Hexamylum, and deep trenches about fix miles in length, had also built five strong castles in the said wall. 6 of purpose to take away all passage by land into that rich country; and began now not ones to deny the yearly tribute they were wont to pay vnto the Turkith King , but allow thinks fuch Princes of Achaia their neighbors, as were content to remain feil the Turks enburated Among whom, Niceus Prince of Athens, and Turacan gouernor of The finite for the warm bleds. ted not by continuall complaints to infence him against them of Peloponelus it Who has the his Army in readines, although it was now winter, and he himfelf very aged, fet forward from Hadrianople, and marching thorow Theffalia, came into Achaia, where most of the Greeinste were before fled for fear into Peloponefus. So passing on with his army, he carne to the streit commonly called Istmus, where the famous city of Corinth fometimes stood guid there in camped his army neer unto the firong wall and caftles lately before built: hoping that the fi Grecians of Peloponefus, terrified with the multitude of his army, would without refiftance inbmit themselves. But when he perceived them to stand vpon their gard, & to trust to their fireigth, he laid battery to the wal four daies, and having made it faultable, brake thorow the fame with his army. The Grecians having loft the wall (their chief strength) fled formevnto one firong hold, and some to another, as their fortune led them the Turkes at their pleasure spoiling and destroying that rich and pleasant country sometime the nurse of worthy wits and lamous captains, where they found wonderfull riches, and took prifoners without number infomuch that they were fold among it the Turks at most vile price. There Amurath for his pleasure cruelly facrificed six hundred Christian captions to the hellish ghost of his dead father Mahomet. And afterward imposing a yearely tribute upon the Peloponesians and other I Grecian princes now again yeelding vnto him, as an induction to their further flauery vnde his Turkish tyranny, he returned, taking in his way the two famous cities of Patras and Siege one. Thus the rich country of Peloponesus, and all the rest of Grecia, somtime fountain of all le arning and chiualry, became tributarie to the barbarous and cruel Turks, in the year of our Old Amurath now clogged with years and wearied with long wars, was content to take his neagation tell at Hadrianopleiduring which time, BajaZet the fon of Mahomet was born in the year 1446; 1446 who afterwards of long time with great glory gouerned the Turkish empire at Constanting

ple as in his place shall appear.

The Hungarians after the calamity of Varna (wherein they had together with Pladiflate & their King, lost most part of their nobility also) in a general affembly of the State, made choice of Ladeflans the posthumus son of Albertus (and then in keeping of Frederick the emperor) for their king. But forafmuch as he being then but a child of fine yeares old; and chofen king more for the remembrance of the emperor Sigismund his grandfather, and Albert his father, and the good hope conceined of him, than for any other thing prefently to be expected from him; it was thought more than necessary, to make choice of some notable and worthy man, to whom they might during the time of the Kings minority, commit the government and protection of that to great and turbulent a kingdom. Many there were in that honoursble affembly wel thought of both of themselves and others; but such was the glory and valor of Humades, and fo great the remembrance of his noble deferts, both of the kingdom of Hun-L gary, and of the Christian commonweal, as without his seeking procured him the general sanor and suffrages of all : yea so far, that they which most enuied his honor (as ouers hadowing their own) were glad to hold their peace; for that without him, as it was commonly thought, the flate of that thaken kingdom could not long fland. So by the general confent of all the hageneror of States there affembled, he was with the great applause of the people chosen and proclaimed The Rough Bon. Gouernor; as of all others most fit for so great and heavy a charge. Wherin he quietly spent fome tow years in deciding of civill controversies, in composing the quarrels of the Nobility: not forgetting in the mean time the indifferent administration of justice to all men, ending many controuerfies far from the place of judgment, and that without any suspicion of corruption; ving therin fuch expedition and neuer-weatied patience in hearing enery mans M caufe, that fitting, going, standing, riding, he dispatched many great and weighty matters: alwaves thewing himfelf affable and curteous, as wel vnto them of the poorer fort, as others of greater calling that had any fuits unto him. So that it was of him truely faid, That no man was than hee vnto his friends more friendly, or vnto his enemies more croffe and contrarieA In time of peace he was alwaies prouident for War, heaping vp great treasure and such other things, as without which the wars could not be maintained. But about all things he was carefull for the good agreement of the Nobility, taking great pains in reconciling their difpleafures conceived one against another; and that with such dexteritie, as that hee was both of them and others generally both beloued and feared.

In the mean time, whilft he was thus bufied in disposing the civil affairs of the Common. 1448 monweal, and the administration of justice, he was aduertised by his espials, how that the old Hamadas go.

Sultan Amurath was raising great forces both in Asia and Europe, and that as the common the against the Turks. fame went, for the inuation of Hungary. For the with standing whereof Hunjades not ynprouided, as never vimindfull of fo dangerous an enemy, or of any thing more defirous than in B some fort to be reuenged of the great losse received at Varna; in the fourth yeare of his gouernment, and in the year of our Lord 1448, accompanied with most part of the Nobility of Hungary, and the Vayuod of Valachia his friend and confederat, let forward against the Turk with an army of two and twenty thousand choice soldiers. So having passed the river Tibiscus or Teise, and trauelling thorow Valachia, a little beneath where the River Morava running thorow Servia, falleth into Danubius, he with most part of his army passed that great riuer the rest in the mean time taking passage ouer at a town called Severin, Huniades with his Army being thus gotten ouer into Servia by his Embassadours requested the Despot, as hee had oftentimes before to put himfelfe into that most Christian VVar, and remembring the great benefits he had received from the Hungarlans, not to shew himself therfore vngrateful, C than which, nothing could be more dishonorable. And to encourage him the more, certified him both of his own ftrength, and of the ayd brought vnto him by the Vayuod; and that for the good succes of the War there wanted nothing but his presence and direction, with such troups of light horfmen as he knew he had alwaies in readines; wherewith he requested him with all speed to follow him. But he being a man of no religion, and better affected vnto the Turk than to Hunsades: the more cleanly to withdraw himself from this war, pretended many excuses: first, The league hee had with Amurath his son in law, which he said hee might not break, for fear that if things chanced not well, he might therby fall again into his old mifery. Then, The vnseasonablenes of the time, Autumn being now past: which difficulties in those cold Countries they had to their cost too much felt in the late Warres. These with many D other such like he alledged in excuse that he came not : but the truth was, the malice of the man, beeing much grieued to fee Huniades preferred to the government of the kingdome before him, and disdaining to serue under his ensignes, being himself Despot and King of Servia, descended of the royal race, was the cause of his backwardnes. So that blinded with envy, he could not there rightly judge of himfelf, or what was fit for him in this cafe to have don. But Huniades angry with his vnkind answer, threatned with his own hands to be reuenged vpon him, and to give away his kingdom to one more worthy therof than he, if hee should with victory return. So passing thorow Servia as thorow the enemies country, hee came vnto Bulgaria. After whose departure, the false Despot by speedy messengers aductifed Amurath The false Des both of the comming of the Hungarians, and of their strength; yea he certified him of everie for information E dayes march, and how that Huniades was but with a small company of his own, and some weak Amurath both fupplies of the Vayuod, come ouer Danubius: whom if he should not presently meet, but suffer him to come on farther, and so with his army to get betwixt him and home, he might so bu freegeb. shut him in, as that he should be hardly able to escape his hands. All which he did, partly for envy, partly to gratifie the Turk, and the better to keep friendship with him. So Amurath not contemning the Despots counsel, suffred Huniades without resistance to enter a great way in-

to his country, and comming two or three daies march behind him, so stopped the passage, as that he could not possibly retyre but that he must needs fight. And now they were both come vnto a great plain in Bulgaria, which the Hungarians call Rigomezu; and the Rascians, the plain of Costova: through the middest wherof the Riuer Schiebniza rising out of the mountains of Illyria, running, at length falleth into Morava, and so into Danubius. This Plaine is about twenty miles in length, and in bredth fiue, environed on each fide with pleasant moun-

to be done. The valiant he commended, the coward he reproued, and as a careful General, was G himselfe in every place present. Wherby the battel became so fierce and terrible, that in evenery place a man might have seen all fouly foiled with bloud and the quarry of the dead. A. murath in like maner still fent in new supplies, nothing discouraged with the losse of his men. prefurning voon his multitude, as fully resoluted orderly to fight, and to make vse of his forces, in hope at length, by continual fending in of fresh supplies, to weary his enemies, whom he law he could not by force ouercome. Wherin he was not deceived; for one battalion of the Hungarians was oftentimes inforced to weary four or fine of the Turks before they could be relieved, they came on fo fast. That day they dined & fupt in the battell, refreshing them. felues with fuch thort repast as they could eat standing, going, or riding. The Turks Army was that day in energy place put to the worft, and oftentimes with great flaughter inforced by H the Hungarians to retyre almost to their trenches; yet was the battel still again renued, and fo fought on both fides, as well appeared they were resoluted either to ouercome, or there to die. This cruel fight, maintained al the day, was by the comming on of the night ended, both the armies retyring into their own trenches, but with purpose the next day to renew the battel, and not to give oner or turn their backs, vntill the victory were by dint of sword determined. So with little rest was that night spent, both armies keeping most diligent Watch. all The basical her carefully expecting the next day, as by battel, therin to try whither they should live or die. It gua gradue the was yet fearle fair day, when both the armies in good order ranged began again the battaile. which at the first was not by the Hungarians fought with such force and courage as before: for there was none of them which had not the day before spent their whole strength; wheras I there was yet 40000 of the Turkes which either had not fought at all, or but lightly skirmifhed. Yet Humades exhorted his fouldiers, not by faint-hearted cowardife to break off the course of the victory by them the day before so well begun, but couragiously to prosecute the fame; be feeching them not to be wanting vnto themfelues and their country, but to remembe show they had fought the day before, how many thousands of their enemies they had flain and not now at last to give ouer and so shamefully to frustrat all the pains and dangers by them endured: for that they (as he faid) were to be thought worthy of honour, not which began, but which ended honorable actions. He wished them to set before their eies the calamittes like to enfue, if they should as cowards be ouercome: first, the divers kindes of death and torture; then the flauery of their wines and children, the rauishment of their virgins and K matrons; and last of all, the vtter destruction of their kingdome, with the horrible confusion of all things, as wel facred as prophane: all which were by that one daies labor (faid hee) to be avoided. And therfore he belought them for the love both of God and man, with their wonted valor, that day to fet at liberty for euer, them felues, their country, their wiues & children, and what socuer els they held dear. In like maner also did Amurath incourage his souldiers with great promifes and threats, perfuading them rather to endure any thing, than by that daies overthrow to be quite driven out of Europ. He carefully viewed his army, ordered his battels, and with many great reasons persuaded them to play the men. But after some light skirmithes being past, both the armies were fully joined, the battel was fought with no lesse force and fury than the day before. Of the Christians many then wounded came now againe L into the battell, there either by speedy death or speedy victory to cure their wounds before received, and there did right good service. Great was the flaughter in every place, neither could the valour of the Hungarians bee withflood; whose furious impression when the Turks could not by plain force endure, began with their fresh horsmen cunningly to delude their desperat sercenes: at such time as the Hungarians began most hardly to charge them, they by and by turned their backs, fuffring them to follow after them, far scattred and disperted: who allured as it were with the hope of prefent victory, eagerly purfued them, and in the purfuit flew diuers of them: and they again vpon a fignal given, clofing together, and turning back upon the differred troups, wel reuenged the death of their fellowes, and with their often charges and retreits wonderfully wearied the Hungarians, notably deluding their furious M attempts with that vncertain kinde of fight, all the day long. Many of the Hungarians were flain, and the Turks had that day the better. And so both Armies beeing wearied, night and wearinesse ended the fight, both retyring into their trenches, there keeping most carefull watch. The next morning by the dawning of the day the battel was again begun. Huniades his

A brother! General of the Valachians, with his light horimen fetting first forward after whom infeemly order followed the rest of the nobility with their Companies. Where for certaine The hand beauthbeau hours the battel was hardly fought with like hope on both fides, and a great flaughter made; third day, but foecially of the Hungarians, who wearied with the long fight, & most part of them wounded were now all to endure this third daies labor, Zechel (Hilliades his fifters fonne) valiantly fighting in the front of the battell; was the first of the Leaders there slaine in the thickest of the Turks. Emericus Marzalus, and Stephen Bamffi, both great Commaunders, inclosed by the Turks, there died also, Amurath seeing the formost ensignes of the Christians, which stood in Zechels regiment, taken, and his fouldiers, discomforted with the death of their Colonell, turning their backs; presently commanded all the Companies (which were many) yet left in the trenches for new supplies, to iffue forth, and at once to ouerwhelm the Christians, being (as he faid) but few and outerwearied with three dales continual fight. Vpohwhich commaund they fiercely breaking out, presently ouerthrew both the wings of the Christians, before wauering; and in a great battel (wherin most of the chief commanders were flain, and their Enfignes taken) discomfitted the rest, and with a great slaughter put them to slight. Hunindes seeing his brother now flain, the enfignes taken, & the battel quite loft, betook himfelf to flight Huniades flies alfo, leaving behind him his tents and baggage, all which thortly after became a prey to the Turks, who from noon until night fiercely followed the chase with most cruel execution but at length stayd by the comming on of the darknes, they returned again to their trenches. The rest of the Turks army that followed not the chase, compassing in the Hungarian campe, were there by the wounded foldiers, the wagoners, and other drudges of the army, kept out to long as they had any thot left; but yet were in the end enery mothers fon flain, though not altogether vnreuenged, two or three of the Turkes in many places lying dead by the body of one Hungarian. Amurath to couer the greatnes of his losse there received, commanded the bodies of his captains there flain, to be forthwith buried; and the bodies of his common fouldiers to be for the most part cast into the river Schichniza: for which cause the inhabitants of the country there by, of long time after abstained from eating of any fish taken in that river. The plain by this great battel made once again famous, lay neuertheles many years after couered with dead mens bones, as if it had bin with stones: neither could be plowed by the country people, but that long time after armor and weapons were there still in many places turned vo D and found. Thus albeit that this bloudy victory fel to the Turks, yet was their loffe far greaterthan the Hungarians, having lost (as was reported by them that say least) 34000 of themfelues, for 8000 of their enemies. Howbeit they themselves report the losse to have been on the tracks and both fides far greater; as that of the Christians were slain 17000, and of themselves 4000: Christians which in so long and mortal a battel is not vnlike to have bin true. In this vnsortunate battell coffice. fel most part of the Hungarian Nobility, all men worthy eternall fame and memory, whose names we wil for brevities fake passe ouer. Many in the chase taken, & the next day brought to Amurath, were by the commandement of the angry tyrant flaine. Such as escaped out of

of all they had. Neither was the fortune of the noble Huniades much better than the fortune of the rest; who having on horseback all alone by vncoth and vntract waies travelled three days without meat or drink, and the fourth day tyred his horse and cast him off; being himself on foot and difarmed, fell into the hands of two notable Theenes, who indifpoiling him of his apparell, finding a fair crucifix of gold about his necke, fell in strife among st themselves for the same: wherby he took occasion to lay hand vpon one of their swords, and with the same presently thrust him through, & then suddenly affailing the other, put him to flight also. So delinered of this danger, trauelling on, and almost spent with thirst and hunger, the next day hee light vpon a shepheard a sturdy rough knaue, who hearing of the Hungarians ouerthrow, was in hope of prey roaming abroad in that defolat country who at the first meeting, strucken with the majest vof the man, stood at gaze vpon him; as also did Huniades, searing in his so great weaknes to have to dowith him. Thus a while having one well regarded the other, they began to enter talk; the shepheard bluntly asking him of his fortune; and he for Gods sake cra-

When as the shepheard hearing of his hard hap, mooned with c his chate, and hope of promised reward, brought him vnto a poor cottage not far off, causing to be let before him bread and water, with a few onions. Who in the pleasant remembrance of that forepassed misery, would oftentimes after in his greatest banquers say, That he never in his life fared better or more daintily, than when he supped with this shepheard. So wel can hunger featon homely cates. Thus refreshed he was by the shepheard conducted to Sindero. via: wherof the Despot having intelligence (whose Countrey was all laid for the staving of him) caused him by the captain of the castle to be apprehended and imprisoned. But after certain daies frent in talk about his deliuerance, it was at length agreed, That all fuch strong rowns in Rascia and Servia, as had by the Hungarians bin detained from the Despot, at such time as his kingdom was by Vladiflaus restored vnto him, should be again to him deliuered. H and that Matthias, Huntades his yongest son, should for the confirmation of further friendshin marry the Despots daughter: with some other such conditions as it pleased the vngratefull Prince for his own behoof to fet down. For performance wherof, he required to have Ladi. flaus, Humades his eldest son, in hostage. All which Humades was glad forthwith to yeeld vnto. for fear the false Despot should have delivered him into the hands of Amurath his mortall enemy. So the hostage being given, Huniades was again delivered. Who vpon Christmas day comming to Segedinum, was there by all the nobility of Hungary, and great concourse of the people, honorably received. This ingratitude of the Despots no lesse grieved this worthy man, than the dithonor received from the Turk. Wherfore vpon the fudden raising a great ar, my, he inuaded the territory, long before given to the Defpot by the Emperour Sigifmend in I Hungary, in exchange of the strong town of Belgrade, destroying the country before him.and burning the villages, neuer refting vntil he had got into his power what focuer the defpot had in Hungary; and not fo contented presently entred Raicia, where the Despots Embassadours met him, bringing with them Ladiflaus the hostage honorably rewarded, and humbly craving peace at his hand, which he at the request of the nobility easily granted, with forginenes of all former wrongs or injuries; and so having with him concluded a peace, returned back against into Hungary. But fortune neuer long suffereth the valiant man to rest, but stil keeps him bufied, left he thould at too much eafe attain vnto honors glory.

The year following, Amurath certainly informed. That George the Despot having of late The The profession. Humandes in his power, had againe fet him at liberty; was therewith exceeding wroth: bla- K moded by Amus ming him of great ingratitude, That for a kingdome which he had at his hands received, hee and of Handa had not delivered to him his enemy, in ful recompence therof whom of al others he most feared, & therfore likewife wisht to have had him perish. In revenge of which injury as he took it, the melancholy tyrant fent Fritze beg and Isfe. beg, two of his most expert captaines, with a firong power to inuade Rascia the despots country who accordingly entring therinto, strongly fortified Chryfonicum a town before ruinated, vpon the fide of the river Morava, and from thence with fire and sword destroicd the country both far and neer. The Despot dismaid with this fudden and vnexpected invafion, wift not wel which way to turn himfelf: the angry Turk he wel knew was not to be appealed without yeelding to some great inconvenience; and to pray aid of Huniades, without which he was not able to withstand the Turks, he thought but L vain, for the wrong he had before don him. So that what to do he wist not; yet had he rather to endure any thing, than again to suffer the heavy bondage of the Turk. In this extremity he thought best to make proof of Huniades, of whom he humbly, and not without great shame, craued aid. Which the curteous gouernor, according to his honourable nature, forgetting all former injuries, easily granted, and the rather, for that he desired nothing more, than to be of the Turks in some part reuenged of the ouerthrow from them of late received in the plaines of Cossova: as also for that he wisely foresaw, that the Despots country being lost, he should haue the Turks still brauing him cuen as it were in the gates of Hungary. Wherfore hauing with great speed raised a convenient power, he forthwith in person himself set forward, and at Synderovia passing ouer the river of Danubius, into Rascia, there joined his forces with the M Despots, which he found there ready. And so marching forward with such expedition that he preuented the fame of his comming; and the weather also at the same time as it were fauoring his purpose, (and couering the Countrey with a thicke mist) hee was the fourth day vpon the Turks before they were aware of him. Who beeing wonderfully dismayed with

A the fudden comming of the Christians, and vpon the breaking vp of the mist discouering also Huniades his enfignes (alwaies vnto them dreadfull) thought now no more of refiftance, or of the ordering of their battel, but as men discouraged, betook themselves to speedy flight. After whom followed the Hungarian and Servian light horsemen with most bloudy execution. having them in chase all that day; Huniades with his mon at arms following stil after in good order, for feare the Turks should again make head upon the light horsemen that had them in chase. And had not the comming on of the night ended the slaughter, sew of the Turkes had there escaped: but by the approch thereof, many of them got into the Woods, and so faued themselues. Fritze Beg the Generall, with most of the Turks best commanders were in that flight taken. Huniades after this victory entring into Bulgaria, came to Budina the metropo-B litical City of that Country; which (as the cause oftentimes of great wars) he burnt downer to the ground. And so having well revenged himself, and cleared the Country of the Turks. he returned back again into Servia, and there gaue to the Despot for a present all the prisoners he had taken; and contenting himself with the honor of the victory, returned with triumph to Buda, there to find no leffe trouble with the Bohemians and some of the discontented Nobilitie of Hungary, than he had with the Turks, to the great hurt of the Christian

All this while that Amurath was thus troubled with Huniades and the Hungarians, Mu-Mustaphalying still voon the borders of Macedonia, as Amurath had commanded sit chanced that a great quarrel grew betwixt the Venetians and Scanderbeg, about the inheritance of Lech C Zachary a nobleman of Epirus, then shamefully murthred by his vinaturall kinsman Lech Duchagne; part of whose inheritance lying in the frontiers of Epirus, the Venetians claimed, as belonging to their feigniory: and having got possession of the city of Dayna, part thereof by force held the same against Scanderbeg. Vpon which quarrell great wars arose betwixt the Venetians and him, who had before bin very good friends; infomuch that in the end they joined battel at the river of Drine, where the Venetians were by him in a great battel overthrowne. O which troubles Mustapha daily understood, and how that Scanderbeg so busied, had left but a small garrison upon the borders of Epirus. Wherfore being desirous to redeem his former difgrace with some better hap, he would fain have taken the opportunitie now presented, but that his great masters command lay so heavy vpon him, as that he durst not without his leave D attempt the same: knowing that the danger of his euill fortune, if it should so fal out, would far exceed the vicertain glory of his better fuceds. Yet ceased hee not from time to time, to gine Amurath intelligence of thefe troubles and wars in Epirus, erneftly requesting him not to let flip fo fair an opportunitie, but to give him leave to enter into the country, in maner affuring him before hand of the victory yet the fulpitious old King was long in refoluing what to do, stil fearing the fortune of his enemy. At length discharged of the fear of the Hungarians, and commending Must apha's forwardnes, he sent unto him a messenger with letters of this purport, answerable to his desire.

Thewars thou sogreatly desirest, behold Mustapha wee grant unto thee: the glory therof (if those Amarathiles-E things be true which we hear of the Venezian war) thine own valor and worthy right hand shalging thee. ters of aluer Tes thou must warily deal with that enemy, and not rashly take up Arms, which thou maist be inforced Mustapha.com. Shamefully to cast away, when thou thinkest least. Peraduenture the counterfeit shew of war and falling cerning his goout among the Christians do too much allure thee; for the common saying is, There is no quarrell sooner Epirus. ended than betwixt the father and the sonne. We in person absent, can neither aduise thee as present, nor commend a foolish forwardnes in arms. Thou must before thou put on arms, dispose of all things, and consider of energ particular which is to be put in execution when thou art in the field. Thou hast a great army of fresh and lusty soldiers, thine enemies are with continual war wearied and spent in that remains do as thou thinkest good, for I forbid thee nothing which thou thinkest may be for advancement of our honor.

Mustapha having thus obtained leave, and well appointed, with all his forces entered into Epitus, hoping in one battell to end that War. Which hee (prefuming vpon the strength of his army) many times offered in the plain field. News herof was brought to Scanderbeg (then lying at the siege of Dayna against the Venetians) from his garifons lying vpon the frontiers of Epirus; to whom he addressed a speedy messenger, commaunding them in no wise toen- c counter with the Enemy, but to keep themselues within the safegard of their strong Holds. and to protract the time untill his comming. Afterwards felecting out of his army 500 horf. men, and 1500 choien footmen, all old beaten foldiers, he with that smal number marched to the place where he knew his garrifons lay intrenched, in the upper country of Dibra; leauing Antia his nephew at the fiege of Dayna. Mustapha having many times in vain sought to draw the garrison souldiers out of their trenches, by offering them many opportunities of aduantage, and now out of hope that way to circumvent them, began to spoil and burn the country round about : but when he vnderstood by his scouts of Scanderbegs comming, he speedily called together his army, and incamped within two miles of Scanderbegs camp, at a place called Oronoche, in the voper country of Dibra. Scanderbeg had there in his Camp, of the garrison the toldiers and those he brought with him, 4000 horsmen and 2000 foot, all old expert souldiers, where after he had made his trenches strong, he left therein 300 of them, and brought the rest into the field in order of battell. Mustapha likewise on the other side likewise brought on in good order his army alfo, But whilft both armies thus ftood ranged one within view of an other, expecting nothing but the fignall of battell, fuddenly a man at arms in gallant & rich furniture, issued out of the Turks army, into the midst of the plain betwixt both armies, and from thence with a loud voice challenged to fight hand to hand with any one of the Christian army: this Turk was called Caragufa. At the first Scanderbegs souldiers vpon this challenge flood still one looking upon another; for as they were all ashamed to refuse so braue an offer. to the danger to fuddenly offered staid every mans forwardnes for a while:vntil that one Paul 1 Manificaccounted the best man at arms in Seanderbegs army (vpon whom every mans eve was now cast as if hee had beene by name called out by the proud Challenger) not able longer to endure the Turks pride with great courage and cheerful countenance came to Scanderbee, requesting him that he might be the man to accept that challenge. Who greatly commended him, and willed him on Gods name to fet forward, first to win honor to himself, and then to give example of his valor for all the rest of the army to follow. Paul staying a while wrill he had for that purpose most brauely armed himself, presently mounted to horse, and riding forth into the plain, called aloud vnto the Turk, that he should make himselfe ready to fight. Whom Caraga (a required to stay a while, that he might speak vnto him a few words, indifferently concerning them both.

The victory (faid he) our force and fortune shall determin; but the conditions of the victory we are now to appoint our felues. If the Destinies have assigned unto thee the honor of this day, I refuse not but that thou mailt by law of arms, when I am our come, carry away with thee my rich (poiles, and at thy plea-(ure diffele of my dead body. But if thou Shait fal under my hand I require that I may have the same right and power over thy captive body; and that the Generals will grant, that no man hall move out of either army to better the fortune of either of vs in the time of the combac, or after.

Wherunto Manchi answered; That he agreed to those conditions of the combat, which hee upon a needleffe fear had forequired to be kept : faying, That where the fierce foul had yeelded, there of good right all the rest ought to be the Conquerers. And that therfore he should fight without fear of any more Entmies than him felf, whom so soon as he had deprened of life, he should have free power to doe with his dead L body what he would. Which if thou wouldft give ((aid he) to the tears of my fellow fouldiers, yet would not worthy Scanderbeg suffer the carkaffe of a vanquished coward to be brought backe againe into hu

Caragusa maruelled to heare his so brave resolution, and as it was thought repented him of his challenge. But after both the Generals had vpon their honors confirmed the lawes of the combat before rehearfed, both the champions were left alone in the middest of the plain betwixt both armies, with all mens eies fixed upon them. Now both the Armies betwixt fear and hope, flood in great expectation of the event of the combat, prefaging their own fortune in the fortune of their Champions. In which time they both having withdrawn themselves one from another a convenient distance, for the making of their course, and after with great M violence running together, Caragusa was by Manessa at the first incounter struck through the head and flain. Manefit alighting, difarmed the dead body & struck off his head; and so loded with the armor and head of the proud challenger, returned Victor to the Army, where he was

A joyfully received and brought to Scanderbeg, of whom he was there prefently honorably both commended and rewarded. Scanderbeg feeing his men by this good fortune of Manefit, greatly encouraged and the Turks as men difmaied with the death of their Champion hanging their heads. like an inuincible Captaine, himselfe set first forward toward the enemy, as it were in contempt of their multitude; and had charged them as they flood, before they had fet one foot forward, had not Mustapha to incourage his foldiers, with certain difordred troups oppo- The battell befed himfelfe against him; which the whole army seeing, faintly followed: but as they fet forward with small courage, so were they at the first incounter easily driven to retire. Which when Mustapha fay, he called earnestly upon them to follow him, and the more to encourage them by his own example, put fours to his horse, and fiercely charged the front of Scanderbies B army, as one refolued either to gaine the victory, or there to die : after whom followed moft of the principall captains of his army, which would not for shame for sake their Generall; thus by his valor the battell was for a while renewed. But Moses preuailing with great slaughter in one part of the Army, the Turks began to fly in which flight Mustapha the Generall, with twelue others of the chiefe men in that army, were taken priloners, but of the common foudiers few were faued. There was flaine of the Turks army ten thousand, and fifteene ensignes taken; whereas of the Christians were slaine but three hundred. The Turks tents and campe, with all the wealth thereof became a prey to Scanderbees foldiers: wherewith although he had fatisfied the defires of them all, yet to keep his old cuitom, he entred into the confines of Macedonia, and there burnt and spoiled all that he could. And afterward leaving a garrison of C two thousand horsemen and a thousand foot for desence of his frontiers, returned agains with the rest of his army to the siege of Dayna,

Not long after, the Venetians made peace with Scanderben, and Amurath defirous to redeeme his Captaines, about the same time sent great presents vnto Scanderbeg, with flue and twenty thousand duckats for the tansome of Mustapha and the other chieftaines; whom Scan-Mustapha rank derbeg so honorably vsed, as if there had never been any hostility betwixt him and them : and somed lowith a fafe convoy fent them out of his country. The ransome of Mustapha and the other Turks he divided among ft his foldiers. When Sounderbeg had thus made peace with the Venetians, he forthwith led his army againe into Macedonia, with the spoile of that country to make his foldiers better pay, as his viuall manner was. And to do the greater harme, he divi-D ded his army into three parts, wherewith he ouer-running the country, wasted and destroied all before him, putting to the fword all the Turks that came in his way. As for the Christians that there lived among them, he spared, but left them nothing more than their lives: the buildings of the Countrey he veterly confirmed with fire, so that in all that part of Macedonia which bordereth upon Epirus, nothing was to be seene more than the bare ground, and the thews of the spoile by him there made. Which vomercifull hauocke of all things he made, to the end that the Turks should finde no reliefe in those quarters, when soeuer they should comecither to lie in garrifon in that country, or to inuade Epirus. The spoile he made was

logreat, that it was thought he left not all that country, so much as might relieue the Turks

Of all these great harms by Scanderbeg done in Macedonia, Amurath was with all speed aduertised; and therewith exceedingly vexed: how beit he resolued with his great counsellors, no more to fend any of his Baffa's or captains, but to go himfelfe in person, with such a royall army as should be sufficient not to conquer Epirus, but if need were, to fill every corner theref. Wherefore he commanded Commissions to be speedily directed into all parts of his Kingdomes & provinces, for the lenying of a great army for Hadrianople:yet whither he intended to imploy the fame, was not knowne to any in the Turks court, more than the Baffa's of the councell. Which caused all the bordering Christian Princes to make the best preparation they could for their own affurance, every one fearing lest that growing tempest should break out against himself. But Scanderbeg of long; acquainted with the Turkish policy, easily percei-F ued all that great preparation to be made again thint: which he was the rather induced to think, by reason of the vnaccustomed quietnes of Amurath, who all that while had neither sent any army to reuenge Mustapha's ouerthrow, nor formuch as a garrifon for defence of the borders of his kindome, but had let all things negligently passe, as if he had bin in a dead sleepe. Besides that, it was also thought that he had secret intelligence from some of his old friends and acquaintance in Amuraths court, who probably suspected the matter. Wherfore Scanderbeg G fetting all other things apart, gaue himself wholly to the preparing of things necessary for the defence of his small kingdome against so mighty an enemy. First, he by letters and messengers aductifed all the Christian Princes his neighbors and friends, of the greatnes of the danger of that war : wherein Amurath (as he faid) fought not only his destruction, but the veter ruine of them all:exhorting them therefore to confider, how far the danger of fo great an army might extend, and therefore to fland fast vpon their guard. Then he fent Moses and other his expercaptains into all parts of Epirus, to take vp foldiers, and all the prouision of corne and victuals that was possible to be had. Wherin he himself also busily travelled day and night, nor resting vntill he had left nothing in the country, whereupon the enemy might shew his cruelty. Most part of the common people, with their substance, were received into the strong cities, thereft H tooke the refuge of the Venetian and other Christian Princes towns and countries farther off. vntill this fury were ouerpast: all such as were able to beare armes, were commanded torepaire to Croia; where when they were all affembled, they were ynow to have made a right puissant army. But out of all this multitude, Scanderbeg made choice only of 10000 old expert soldiers, whom he purposed to lead himselfe, to incounter with the Turks great army, as he should see occasion, and placed 1300 in garrison in Croia. The citizens also themselves were thorowly furnished with all manner of weapons & other provision meet for the defence of their city. Then proclamation was made, That all the aged men vnfit for wars, with the women and children, should depart the city, and none to be therein left, but the garrison soldiers, and fuch citifens as were willing to tarry, and able to beare armes. This city of Crois I was the chiefe city of Epirus, and of the fortune thereof feemed to depend the flate of all the other strong townes and cities, and so consequently of the whole kingdome : for which cause, The lamentable Scanderbeg had the greater care for the defence thereof. It was a miferable fight, to fee the ladeparting of the mentable departure of this weake company out of Croia; all was full of weeping and wailing; no house, no street, no part of the city was without mourning: but especially in the churches was to be seene the very face of common forrow and heavinesse; where all forts of people in great numbers flocking together, poured forth their deuout praiers, with fountaines of teares, ringing their hands, yea, and some in the impatiency of their griefe forgetting themselues, seemed to expostulate their griese with God, But when their forrow was with tears assuged, and their hearts somewhat eased, the aged mothers kissing their sons, gaue them many a fearefull K commandment, fometime rehearfing, how louingly and tenderly they had brought them vp, and other fometimes shewing vnto them their feeble lims and hoary haires, willing them to be mindfull of them. The wines presented their children vnto their husbands, bewailing to leaue them as childleffe widowers, and their houses desolate. The old men mute with forrow, and carefull of their children, durft neither incourage them, for feare of making them too forward, neither diffuade them from aduenturing themselves, lest they should seem to love them more than their natiue country. In the middest of these passions commandement came from Scanderbeg, that they must now depart, that the souldiers might take their places and charge. Then began their forrows afresh, with preceous scriching and tears: a man would have thought the city had even then bin presently taken by the Turks. They could hardly be drawne from L the imbracing of their friends, all now defiring to remain fill with them in the city, partakers of their common danger. But when they faw the officers begin to be earnest vpon them, and to hasten their departure, then with heavy hearts they took as it were their last farewell, and departed out of the city, fetting their feet many times they wist not where, for defire they had to looke backe againe vpon the city. This great multitude was conucied also into the Venetian cities and other places free from danger: whither all the country people which were not before received into the strong cities, resorted also, with all their subjects and cattell; leaving nothing in all the country of Epirus, but the bare ground for the Turks to prey vpon. After this multitude was departed, and all well quieted, and none left in the city but men fit for feruice, Scanderbeg thorowly flored it with all things needfull for the defence thereof, and for the induring of M a long fiege: befides that, he gaue to euery foldier convenient armor, with fome small reward.

of the city. And so having set all things in order for the safegard thereof, after he had in sew

A ring and deceitful charms, he departed out of the city vnto his army, then lying within view. and began presently to march toward Dybra. But he was not farre gone, before he met with Moses with a gallant troup of horsemen comming from Secrigrade, a strong city of Dybrascituate in the confines of Epirus, bordering vpon Macedonia: which city was Scander be his fecond care, for that it was like to be the first that should indure the angry tyrants fury, standing first in his way, as it were the fortresse of that country. Moses had there set all things in like order, as had Seanderbeg in Croia, and had there placed one Peter Perlat (a grave and politique man) Gouernour, with a strong garrison of soldiers chosen out of all the country of Dybra, which were alwaies accounted the best men of war in all Epirus, and was for so doing greatly commended of Scanderbeg. Who delivering vnto him all the forces he had prepared for the defence of the other castles and cities of Epirus, sent him with divers others of his Nobility and Captaines, to take order for the fafety of those places, appointing voto enery man his charge. As for himselfo, he with a small troupe of horsmen went to Sfetigrade, carefull of that seanderhee city about measure, as it were before dittining the ensuing danger. Being come thither, and comments to all the foldiers affembled by his commandment into the market place, he there in open audience spake vnto them as followeth:

Almighty God could not this day offer onto you (worthy foldiers of Sfetigrade) better matter, neither the effectual could a fairer occasion be presented unto brave minds and soldiers desirous of honour than that which now beech of Scanhath caused you to take up most just armes. Wherein you may for ever, by worthy example, make knowne folders and ci-C your constant faith and worthy valour, both towards me in prinate, and the people of Epirus in generall, tizens of sect-Hitherto we have borne armes for the honour of our king dome, but now we must fight for our lines, our grace to encouliberty, and the wals of our country. You must now force your sclues, that you do not by reproch and cowar- the comming of dife staine the worthy praises you have already descrued by the great wittories by you obtained under my Amurain. conduct. The greatest part of the fortune of this war dependeth upon you. For the first passinge of Amutath into Epirus (that I my felfe may be wnto you the first me flenger of that danger) will be this way the first fury of the Turks will affaile you, that having here as it were broken downethe strongest fortresse of Epirus, he may afterwards breake into the country, more subject to danger. The first fruits of this war is yours, you (if you beare the hearts of couragious men, mindfull of your liberty) may beat downe the proud frength of the baughty enemy, and difcouer his high conceits. The Othoman King shall have his beginning both of his hope and feare: if he shall see you so minded, as I now see you gallantly moved, and wish joy heare your violent indignation; he will in enery place feare a great force of danger, and therby learne to abstaine from the other cities of Epirus. Neither will be lie here long at avaine siege, except the way. wardold manwill foolishly hereupon zage all his whole forces: for such is the scituation and strength of this city that it may casily set at nought an angry enemy. Wherefore resolute with your selues (worthy soldiers and citizens onely by constancy and faithfulnesse, without bloudshed, to gaine wnto your selves an honourable wittory. Of your valour (which I willingly (peake of) dependeth for the most part the faithfulnesse of all the rest; they will locke a ponyou, whom they may praise or accuse, and whose example they may follow in the fortune of these warres. But to what purpose should men of worth in their actions pretend the necessity of faith, or chance of fortune? whereas by Reason, things are both best begun and accom. E plished. It seldome chanceth, that fortune faileth the second advice, or is not obedient to vertue : and you have all things which most politique care could provide for your safety. You want not armour you want not plentifull provision of victuals, you want not valiant men: the superfluous multitude of vanecessary people, the pittifull lamentation of women, and troublesome crying of children shall not withdraw you from your publique charge, from your service and defence of your country; I have left you alone to your selves, for defence of your city, your Religion, and dwellings, that you might be encouraged only with the prouocations of honour and liberty, with the emulation of adventure and danger, and the very light one of another, and I my selfe will not be far off with my couragious sold:ers, a silent beholder and encourager of your vertue: where although I may not anert from you all the force of the cruell enemy by rash aducature, nor try the whole fortune of this war in plaine field; yet will I turne a great part of your danger upon my felfe, F and trouble the enemies designes with many an hot skirmish. For as much as there is no better manner of fight, nor safer kind of war for vs. among st such a multitude of men, & so many thousands of soldiers, than neuer to offer battell unto the enemy inplaine field, neither to aduenture all upon the fortune of one confliet, although a man did see apparant signes of wittory. G trife our raffineffe, allured with the fweet baits of good fortune but the crafty denices of the Othoman Kings are by great policy and consideration to be frustrated: this mighty enemy is by little and little to be cut off as time and place shall give occasion. For truly that willory shall be with me lamentable, which I Shouldbuy with the bloud of my foldiers: and beleeve me, it would be voto me a more forrowfull than plea. funt fight to fee eight or ten thousand of my enemies flaine with the loffe of a few of you. I praise and honer my subjects of Epirus for valiant conquerors, if they shall not suffer themselves to be conquered of the Turkish King. The rest I had rather you couragious soldiers of Dybra should consider with your selves. than that I hould seeme to distrust of your assured faith, by giving you a carefull and tedious admonition.

When Scanderbee had with cheerefull perfuation thus encouraged the minds of them of H Ssetigrade, he departed thence, and visited divers others cities of Epirus; where finding all things politiquely ordered by Moses and the other captaines, whom he had put in trust, he re.

turned to his army, then lying neere vnto Croia. Whilest Scanderbeg was with great cheerfulnesse yet thus prouiding for the safegard of his Kingdome, in the meane time Amurath his army was affembled at Hadrianople, to the number of an hundred and fifty thousand men, whereof many were pioners, and men appointed for other base services necessary at the siege of townes. Of this great army Amurath sent forty thousand light horsemen before him to Ssetigrade; who according to his command came and incamped before the city. The newes of their comming, with a great deale more than truth, was forthwith brought to Scanderbeg, then lying with his small Army neere Crois: 1 whereupon he with foure thousand horse, and a thousand foot, tooke the way toward Sfetigrade, and strongly incamped his Army within seven miles of the city. Where having set all things in good order, he, accompanied with Moses and Tanusius went by certaine blinde wayes thorow the mountaines and woods, vntill he came so neere vnto the city, that from the place where he flood, he might eafily discouer in what fort the enemy lay incamped : and so returning backe agains to his campe, role with his army in the night following, and drawing as necre vnto the Turks army as he could, vndiscouered, placed all his army in the couert of A consider first the woods and fecret vallies, unperceived of his enemies. After that, he fent forth Moses and Atufachi his nephew, with thirty of his best horsemen, apparelled as if they had beeste but common fouldiers, but passing well mounted, driving before them certaine horses laden with K we come, by a by-way, as if they had fectually appeared by the corner by a by-way, as if they had fectually appeared by the corner by a by-way, as if they had fectually appeared by the corner by a by-way, as if they had fectually appeared by the corner by a by-way, as if they had fectually appeared by the corner b corne, by a by-way, as if they had secretly purposed to have got into the city. The day then breaking, they were discoursed by the Turks scours, and set vpon : where at the first Moses and the rest began of purpose to fly; but when hee saw that they were pursued but with like number to themselves, he turned backe vpon the Turks, and slew five of them, and chased the rest vnto the campe. The Generall seeing what had hapned, sent forth source thousand horsemen to pursue these supposed victuallers: whom they quickely recoursed fight of, for that Messes of purpose had made small haste to fly: but when the Turks began to draw nigh, Messes of purpose had made small haste to fly: but when the Turks began to draw nigh, Messes of purpose had made small haste to fly: fix left the horses laden with corne, and fled; yet so, that he still drew on the Turks with hope to ouertake him, untill he had brought them where Scanderbee with his army lay in wait: by whom they were suddenly assailed on euery side, and with great slaughter put to slight. In I this conslict two thousand of the Turks were slaine, and a thousand of their horses taken : of the Christians were lost but two and twenty. This was the first welcome of the Turks army

About eight daies after, came Amurath with all his army, in the beginning of May, Anno 1449 Dom. 1449, and having made the greatest shew he could with his huge army to terrifie the de-Amurathism fendants; he incamped the baser sort of his footmen at the foot of the hill whereon the city reth to Shii- stood, and lay himself with his Ianizaries, & other his most valiant soldiers, about three quarters of a mile further off:where after he had lien still one day, and well considered the strength of the place, toward euening he fent a messenger to the city, who requested to speake with the Gouernour Perlat. Whereof he hearing, came to the wall: of whom the messenger requested, M That he would command the fouldiers standing by, to goe further off, for as much as he had fomething in secret to say vnto him from his master. Vnto whom Perlat merrily answered; It is like indeed to be some great secret, that you would have kept not onely from the heaA ring of my fouldiers, but from the very light of the day, and therfore have chosen the night: but I have not learned of myne elders, to hear any meffage from myne enemies by night neither at any time els out of the hearing of the garrison soldiers, to whom Scanderbeg hath committed the defence of the City, and I the safegard of my person. You must therfore at this time pardon me, and to morrow if your master so please, I wil hear you at large; And therwith commanded him to depart from the wall. So he returned at that time without audience as he came. It grieued Amurath not a little to see his messenger so lightly regarded; yet forasmuch as he had more hope to gain the City by large offers, or fome reasonable composition, than by all his great force; he diffembled his wrath, and the next day fent the messenger again with one of his Bassa's, a grave and wel spoken man, himself born in Epirus. This Bassa, with three foldiers and two feruitors was by the Gouernors command, by one of the ports received into the city, and brought into S. Maries Church, where after he had with great eloquence fought to infinuat himfelf into the minds of the Gouernor and hearers; and afterwards augmented the terror of Amuraths power beyond all measure, laying before them the great victories by him obtained against the Hungarians and the other Christian Princes; in fine hee exhorted them to yeeld the City vnto him. In whose name he promised first, that the citisens should in all respects under his government line as they had before don under Scanderbeg. Then, That the Gouernour should receive at Amurath his hands most honourable preferments, with many rich and princely gifts. And, That it should be lawfull for the garrison souldiers to depart in fafety whither they pleafed; and to have three hundred thousand Aspers divided a-C mongh thom in reward. But when the Baffa had ended his speech, the Gouernour in this fort replied.

If you had not delinered this speech unto resolute men, denoted unto the desence of their liberty, perhaps Therefolius it might baut wrought some effett; and we (faid he) might peraduenture listen unto your offers, if wee answer of Perwere either afraid of the Othoman King, and the vain threats of our enemies, or els were weary of the lat the govern gonernment of the noble Scandetbeg. But for a fruch as no enill defert of his, nor good defert of your Masters, hathyet passed, for which we should prefer a stranger before our naturall Soucraign, an enemie before a friend, a Turk before a Christean; let your master proceed first in his action begun les him proque hu fortune, let him by force terrifie vs beat down our walls, make hanock of our men, and by frong hand D drive us to humble our selves at his feet, and to sue for peace. But it more a great dishonor, year thing almost to be laughed at if we should cowardly accept of these conditions by him offered, before any assault given before one drop of blond filt, before any foldier did fo much as once groun for any wound received. before one from were shaken in the wall or any small broach made. But your master should do bester to raise his siege and get him back again to Hadrianople, sherk to spend the small remainder of his old yeares in quiet; and not to proughe us his fatall enemies, whose courage in defence of our liberties, and sidelitie towards our Reince he hath so oftentimes proued to his great dishonour, and losse of his armies. The faith I have once given to my Soveraign for the defence of this city, I will never forget, untill the effusion of the last drop of my bloud. It shall be unto me reward and honor enough, if I either living defend this city, or with losse of my life shall leave my guiltlesse soul at liberty, and my carkas among the dead bodies of wor-E thy soldiers, when I shall find a way into a far better place,

The General having given this resolute answer vnto the Bassa, bountifully seasted him that day at dinner, and afterwards led him thorow the midst of the city; where he saw great store of victuals, by the gouernor commanded of purpose to be set in shew, to put Amurath out of hope of winning the city by long fiege. And so sent the Bassa out by the same port whereby he came in, much discontented with the answer he was to returne to his Master.

When Amurath understood by the Bassa, of the governors resolution, he was therewith exceeding wrath, and thereupon with his great Ordnance battered the city three daies without intermission. And having by the sury of his artillery made a small breach, he forthwith gaue thereunto a most terrible assault, laboring first to win the same by sorce and multitude of ssengrade his common foldiers, which the Turks call Asapi, whom he forced by great numbers to that affailted. feruice. Of these souldiers the Turke in his wars maketh no great reckoning, but to blunt the fwords of his enemies, or to abate their first fury, thereby to give the easier victory to his Ianizaries and other his better foldiers: which the Otheman Kings hold for good policy. Whilft

these forlorn soldiers without respect of danger pressing forward, were slain by heapes at the G breach the lanizaries at the same time in another place attempted to have scaled the wals of the city; but whill they with much labor and difficulty first crawl up the steep rock whereon the city was built, and afterward desperatly mount up their scaling ladders, they were by the defendants, with huge stones & weighty pieces of timber cast vpon them, beaten down, wherwith they were driven headlong to the bottom of the rock, and so miserably slaine: Many of them together with their scaling ladders, were by the Christians thrust from the wall, and tumbling from the rock, violently caried with them others comming vp behind them, Some few got to the top of the ladders, and taking hold of the battlements of the walls, loft fome their fingers, some their hands, but most their lines, being beaten down as the other were. Many of them which stood farther off, were then wounded also, and with shot from the Wals H flain. With this miserable slaughter, and no hope to preuail, the Turks discouraged, began to withdraw themselves from the assaults but the Bassa's and Captains standing behind them forced them again forward, exhorting fome, threatening others, and beating the rest forward with their truncheons. By which means the affault was again renued, but not with like courage as before, though with no leffe flaughter: which the defendants feeing, gaue from the Walls, great tokens of joy and triumph. Amurath feeing his discouraged fouldiers ready of themselves to forsake the assault, presently sent Feri Bassa (one of his most valiant Captains) with a new supply of 2000 chosen soldiers to renew the fight. The Christians well aware of their comming ceased not with continuall shot to beat them from the wals, but such was the forwardnes of that herce captain, that without regard of danger he brought his men vnto the wals, where the defendants from about outswhelmed them with stones, timber, wild-fire, and fuch other things as are viually prepared for the defence of towns belieged. For all that, Feri-Buffa gaue to great an affault, that he flew divers of the defendants your the wals. & had there forcibly entred, had not the governor, perceiving the danger, with a company of fresh souldiers come with speed to the desence of that place; wherby the enemy was presently repulsed and driven again from the wals. Amurath feeing the great loffe of his men, and no hope of fucces, caused a retreit to be sounded, & so leaving the assault, retyred again into his camp. The great loffe and dishonor at this assault received, much troubled his waiward minde, who for all that yet ceased not to give the like vain attempts. At length the captain of the lanizaries perceiting that part of the city, which was farthest from the camp, to be commonly but slen- K derly manned, by reason that it seemed a place impregnable, both for the height and seepnes of the rock; told Amurath that he would affay (if it so pleased him) secretly in the night to attempt by that place to enter the city; wheras they thought nothing was more to be feared The Tanizaries than the hight therof, which they, supported with the wings of desite, doubted not to mount definity at vnto. This his device exceedingly pleafed the King, and was the next night with great filence put in execution. But such was the carefulnes of the gouernor ouer enery part of his charge, that nothing could bee done against the same, but that it was forthwith by him discouered. The governor advertised by the watch, of the Turks attempt, with great silence presently repaired to the place with a great company of the garifon foldiers, and standing close, from the top of the wal beheld the Turks, as it had bin a swarm of Emmets, climing up the high rocks, L and one helping up another, by such a desperat way, as was in reason to be thought no man would baue attempted. But when they were come to the top of the rock, and now even ready to enter, they were from aboue fuddenly ouerwhelmed as it had bin witha (hour of shot, and The Janifaries fo violently forced down that steep rocke, that most of them which had got up to any height, were miserably crushed to death, either with the weight of themselues, or with others falling vpon them, and many of the rest slain with shot from the top of the rock. Wherof Amurah presently understanding, was therwith exceedingly grieued.

During the time of this siege, Scanderbeg neuer lay long still in one place, but removed continually from place to place as best served his purpose, breaking somtime into one quarter of the Turks camp, and somtime into another, & straitway so suddenly gon again, and as it were M vanished out of fight, that Amurath many times wondred what was become of him. At this time, being the later end of Iune, he was come with his army within eight miles of Amuraths camp: and from thence fent Mofes his greatest Captain, in the attyre of a common fouldier, with two other, to take view how the enemy lay incamped. By which trufty Espials he was

A informed. That the Turks lay in great fecuritie as men without feare, keeping but neuligent watch. Of which opportunitie Scanderbeg rejoicing, the night following suddenly assaulted one quarter of the Turks camp: whose comming, although it was a little before by the Turks scouts discoucred, yet his furious assault was so sudden and forcible, that he slew 2000 of the Turks, and filled every corner of that great camp with fear and tumult, before they could wel arm themselves or make resistance. After which slaughter he safely retyred, carrying away with him two hundred and thirty horse, with seven of the Turks ensignes, having in this skirmith lost of his men but 42: whose dead bodies the Turks the next morning, in revenue of their flain friends hewed into finall pieces. Vnon these great disgraces one following in the neck of another, Amurath having no other object but the city to shew his fury vpon, hercely a faulted the same thrice one after another. and was alwaies with loffe both of his men and honor repulfed. But the more he loft, the more he burnt with defire of reuenge-perfuading his foldiers, that as the strongest cities & fortresfes were built by mens hands, fo were they to bee ouerthrowne and laid euen with the ground by resolute and valiant men: incouraging them to a fresh assault, with greater promises of reward than ever he had done before in all his wars, from the first beginning of his reign. And because he would with more safety give this his last and greatest assault, he commanded Feri Bassa with 12000 horsmen and 6000 foot to attend upon Scanderbeg, if hee should hap to come (as he thought he would) to trouble the affault by affailing of his camp. Feri-Baffa glad of this charge, wel hoping now to redeem his former overthrow with some great victory, and C leading forth hisarmy a little from the camp, as he was commanded, fo lay, wishing for nothing more than the comming of Seanderbeg; vainly boafting, That he would feek him in the field, and there try his force and fortune with him hand to hand; which he did (hortly after to his cost. When Amusa had thus set in order all things requisit, as wel for the siege as for the fafegard of his Camp, the next morning he compaffed the City round about with his army, and couered the ground with his men of war, purposing at that rime to gage his whole forces vpon the taking therof. The wals he had before in fome places battered, to much as was poffible; and yet but fo, as that they were not without scaling ladders to be affaulted; partly for the naturall defence of the place, and partly for that the defendants had with great diligence continually repaired and filled up with earth what the fury of the cannon had thrown downe. D This affault Amurath began first with his archers and finall shot, who delivered their arrows and bullets upon the top of the wall, and into the city, as if it had bin a shour of hail, thereby to trouble the tumultuary foldiers. In this heat ladders were clapt to the wals in every place where any could possibly be reared, and the Turks began desperally to scale the wals. But the Christians nothing dismaid therat, with great courage resisted them, & with shot from their fafe standings wounded & slew many of them: yet others still pressed up in the places of them that were flain, so that the affault began most terrible in many places at once, but especially neer the great gate of the City, where the Turks had vpon the fudden, with ladders, timber, and planks clapt together, raised close vnto that tower, as it had bin a wooden tower, equall in hight to the wall: from whence the Turks greatly distressed the Christians in that place, figh-L ting with them as if it had bin vpon euen ground, still fending vp fresh soldiers in stead of them that were flain: and therby prevailed fo far, that they had fet up certain of Amuraths Enfignes vpon the wal, to the great comfort of the Turks, and aftonishment of the besieged Christians. The Gouernor feeing the imminent danger, hasted to the place with a company of fresh and valiant foldiers, by whose force the Turks were quickly repulsed from the wal, their enfignes taken and fent into the market place; and the tower of wood, with many ladders and much timber by the Turks brought to that place, was quickly confumed with Wild fire cast upon the same from the wals. Perlat having delivered the City of this fear, presently placed fresh foldiers in stead of them that were slain or hurt, and so worthily desended the city.

Whilst Amurath was giving this great affault to Sfetigrade, Scanderbeg to withdraw him F from the same, came with nine thousand fouldiers to assail the Turks Camp, as Amurath had scanderbeg before suspected, and was now come very neer the same. Feri Bassa glad of his comming, op trouble the posed his army against him: which Scanderbeg seeing, retyred a little, of purpose to draw the assault, is met Bassa farther from the camp, and then forthwith began to join battell with him. The Bassa by Feri Bassa. confidering the small number of his enemies, and his own great power, withdrew four thou-fand horfmen out of his army to fetch a compaffe about, and to fet vpon the rereward of Scanderbees army: floping to to inclose him that he should never escape thence, but there either to be flain or taken aliue, and his army vtterly defeated. But the expert Captain perceiuing his purpose, to meet therwith, left Moses to lead the main battel, and he himself with 2000 hors. men fo valiantly charged those 4000 of his enemies before they were wel departed from the rest of the Bassa's army, that they had now more cause to looke to their own fasety, than how to circumvent others. In this conflict Feri Baffa hand to hand, as he had oft times before defired, encountring with Scanderbeg, was by him there flain. All this while that Scanderbeg was in fight with Feri Baffa in the right wing of the army, and Mufachy in the left, Mofes flood fait. receiving the affault of the enemy without moving any thing forward, expecting the fucces of the wings. But Scanderbeg having discomfited the right wing, and slain the Generall, com. H ming now in, he fet forward with fuch force and courage, that the Turks not able longer to abide his force, turned their backs and fled, of whom many were flain in this chafe, although Scanderbeg doubting the great power of his enemy fo nigh at hand, durft not follow them too far, but founding a retreat, put his Army again in good order, for fear of some sudden attempt from the camp, and atter appointed some of the meanest of the souldiers to take the spoile of the flain Turks. When Amurath understood what had happed to Feri Baffa, hee was so overcome with anger and melancholy, that for a while he could not fpeak one word. But after the beat was a little patt, he commanded certaine small pieces of ordnance which hee had before vied against the city, to be removed into the camp, and there placed upon that fide which was most in danger to the enemy. He also presently sent thither 4000 souldiers to join with the remainder of Feri Baffa's Army, for defence of the Camp, with ftreit charge that they should not issue out of the trenches. Neuertheles he himself continued the assault of the city all that day:but when night drew on, and no hope appearing for him to preuail, he caused a retreit to be sounded, and leaving the assault, he returned again into his camp. At this assault Amurais loft 7000 men, beside many that died afterwards of their wounds : but of the garison soldiers were flain but feuenty, and ninety more hurs.

The terror of the Turkish army began now to grow in contempt throughout Epirus; and Scanderbeg was in good hope, that Amurath after so many ouerthrows and shamefull repulse, would at length raise his siege and be gon: yet hee sent spies continually to discouer what was don in the Turks camp, and he himself with two thousand soldiers would oft times shew K himself vpon the sides of the mountains, neer to Amuraths camp, of purpose to draw the Turks out, that he might take them at some advantage. But the old King had given commandment vpon pain of death, that no man should go out of the trenches without leaue, or once to speak of giving battell or affault. So that he lay certain daies in his camp, not like a King befreging a city but more like a man besieged himselfithe which his stillying Scanderbeg had the more in distrust, searing greatly that he was hatching some mischiefe, which so soon as it was ripe,

Amurath confidering with what cuil fucces he had many times affaulted the city, & holfactor to comple ding it as a great dishonor to raise his siege & depart, having don nothing worth the rememib carriles of brance; thought good once again to proue if it were possible to onercome the mindes of the L garrison soldiers with gifts, whom he was not able to subdue by force. For which purpose he were confined fent an embassador vnto the city, offering vnto the besieged and garrison soldiers easie conditions of peace, with such large gifts and rewards as had not bin heard offered to any garrison in former time. Al which his magnifical promises were lightly rejected by the common confent of the whole garifon, preferring their faithfull loyaltie before all his golden mountains. For all that, Amarath was in hope, that among so many some would be found, into whose minds his large offers might make fome impression. Wherein he was not deceived; for one base minded fellow among the rest, corrupted with the Turks great promises, preferring his own privat wealth before the welfare of his country, waiting his time, had secret conference with the Turks of pials, promifing vpon affurance of such reward as was before by Amurath M profered, to find means that in few days the City should be delinered into his power. This corrupted traitor had layd many mischieuous plots for the effecting of this horrible treason: but the first device he put in practise, which of all others a man would have thought to have bin of least moment, served his wicked purpose in stead of all the rest. All the garrison soulA diers of Sfetigrade were of the upper country of Dybra, put into that city, by Moles, for their approved valor aboue all the other foldiers of Epirus. But as they were men of great courage. fowere they exceeding superstitious both in their religion and maner of living, putting nice difference betwixt one kind of lawfull meat and other; accounting some clean, some vnclean, abhorring from that, which they fondly deemed vncleane, with more than a lewish superstitition, chufing rather to die than to eat or drinke thereof: fuch is the fitting delufion of blind error, where it hath throughly possessed the minds of men. The city of Stetigrade (as is aforefaid) is scituate upon the top of a great high rocke, as most of the cities of Epirus now be, and was then watred but with one great well in the midft of the city, which funke deepe into the rock, plentifully ferued both the publike and privat vse of the inhabitants. Into this common B well the malicious traitor in the night time cast the foule stinking carrion carkasse of a dead Thecarkas of a dog knowing that the conceited garrifon fouldiers of Dybra, would rather indure the paines the trailer into of death and starue, or els yeeld vp the city, vpon any condition, than to drink of that polluted the common water. In the morning when that stinking carrion was espied, and drawne out of the well, the intering report therof was quickly bruted in every corner of the city, & that the well was poisoned: fo that all the people were in maner in an vprore about the finding out of the traitor. The citizens were exceeding forry for that had happed, but the garrifon foldiers detefted that loathforn and vnclean water as they accounted it) more than the Turkish feruitude protesting that they would rather perish with thirst than drink therof. Wherupon some of them defired to set sire vpon the city, and while fother had yet strength, to breake thorow the enemies camp or there C manfully do die. And they which thought best of thematter, requested that the city might be yeelded vp; for now, they discouraged with a superstitious vanity, could be content to hearken to the former conditions of peace, yea, they were ready enough of themselues to sue to Amurath for peace, though it had been you harder tearmes. The Gouernour troubled with The Gouernour that had hapned, and aftonied to fee fo great alteration in the minds of his fouldiers upon fo in vain feekells final occasion: could not tell whether he might thinke it to proceed of a superstitious conceit, garrian sudar the or of some secret compact made with Amurath. But the better to pacific the matter, he came the muce of into the market place, and there in the hearing of all the garrison, with many effectual reasons, the well, exhorted them to continue faithfull vnto their Prince and country in that honorable feruice: and in a matter of fo great confequence to make small reckoning to vie that water, which D would eafily in fhort time be brought again to the wonted purity and cleannesse: and to perfuade them the rather howent prefently to the well himself, and in the fight of them all drunk a great draught of the water, whose example the citizens following, drank likewise. But when it was offered to the captains and foldiers of the garrison, they all refused to taste thereof, as if it had bin a most loathsome thing or rather some deadly poison, and with great instance cried unto the Gouernour, to give up the city: for which cause many thought they were corrupted by Amuraths great promises. Howbeit none of the garrison (except that one traitor) did ener afterwards revolt to the Turkish king, or yet appeared any thing the richer for any gift receiued, whereby such suspition might be confirmed. When the Gouernor saw that the obstinate minds of the garrison were not to be moued with any persuasion or reward (whereof he spared not to make large promise) nor by any other means which he could deuise; he called vnto him his chief captains, with the best fort of the citizens, & resolved with them ful fore against his wil, to yeeld up the city to Amurath, on such conditions as they themselves there agreed vpon: which were, That it should be lawfull for all the captains and soldiers to depart in safety with their armor and all other things; and that fo many of the citizens as would flay, might there stildwel in the city, in such fort, as they had done before, under the government of Scanderbeg; the rest that listed not to remain there still might at their pleasure with bag & baggage depart whither they would. Glad was Amurath when this offer was made vnto him, and granted them all that was defired, fauing that he would not confent that the citizens should continue in the city, yet was he content that they should line under him as they had done before, F quietly enjoying all their possessions, but to build their houses without the wall of the city: which condition some accepted, and some for saking all, went to Scanderbeg . When all was thorowly agreed upon, the keys of the gates were delivered to Amurath, & the governor with the captains, & all the garrison soldiers suffered quietly to passe thorow the Turkish camp as the King had promised. Howbeit, Mahomet the son of Amurath, a Prince of a cruell disposition, carneftly perfuaded his father, to have broken his faith, and to have put them all to the fword: c taving it was one of their Prophet Mahomets chiefe commandements, to vie all cruelty for the destruction of the Christians. But the old King would not therein hearken unto his son faving. That he which was defirous to be great among men, must either be indeed faithfull of his word and promise, or at leastwise seeme so to be, thereby to gain the minds of the people, who naturally abhor the government of a faithlesse and cruell Prince. The traitor which corrupted the water, remained still in the city, and was by Amurath rewarded with three rich suits of apparell, and fifty thousand aspers, and had given vnto him besides a yearely pension of two A traiter were thousand duckats. But short was the joy the traiter had of this euill gotten goods: for after he had a few daies vainely triumphed in the midst of Amurath his fauors, he was suddenly gone. and neuer afterwards feene or heard tell of; being fecretly made away (as was supposed) by the commandement of Amurath, whose noble heart could not but detest the traitor, although the treason served well his purpose. Amurath entring into Sfetigrade, caused the wals to be forthwith repaired, and placed one thousand two hundred Ianizaries in garrison there. And raising his campe the first of September, departed out of Epirus, having loft thirty thousand of his Turks at the siege of Sfetigrade; much grieued in mind for al that, that he could not vanquish the enemy, whom he came of purpole to fubdue. In his returne, the viceroy of Afia marched before him with the Afian fouldiers; in the rereward followed the viceroy of Europe with his Europeian fouldiers: in the middest was Amurath himselfe, compassed about with his [anizaries and other fouldiers of the court. Scanderbeg understanding of Amurath his departure. tollowed focedily with eight thousand horsemen, and three thousand foot, and taking the adnantage of the thicke woods and mountaine streits (to him well knowne) whereby that great army was to passe, oftentimes skirmished with the Turks, charging them sometime in the vaward, and sometime in the rereward, sometime on the one side, and sometime on the other, and flew many of them: whereby he so troubled Amurath his passage, that he was glad to leave the viceroy of Romania, with 30000 to attend upon Scanderbeg, that he himfelfe might in the meane time with more fafety march away with the rest of his army. Seanderbeg perceiving the thay of the viceroy, ceased to follow Amurath further, fearing to be enclosed betweenethose two great armies. The viceroy seeing that Scanderbeg was retyred, after he had staied a few daies, followed his master to Hadrianople, and so Scander beg returned to Croia.

Shortly after the departure of Amurath out of Epirus, Scanderbeg left two thousand soldiers K vpon the borders for defence of the country against the Turks. These souldiers so streightly kept in the Ianizaries left in garrifon at Sfetigrade that they could not looke out of the city, but that they were intercepted and flaine. And within a few daies after came himfelfe with an army of 18000, and laid fiege to Sfetigrade the space of a moneth, which was from the middle of September untill the middle of October. In which time he gaue two great affaults to have recovered the city, but was both times repulsed, with the losse of five hundred men. Amurath understanding that Scanderbeg lay at the siege of Ssetigrade, sent with all speed torecall his army but lately before dispersed. Whereof scanderber having intelligence, considering also the difficulty of the enterprise, with the approch of Winter, raised his siege, and returned to Croia: where he fet all things in the fame order he had done before the comming L of dmurath to the fiege of Sfetigrade, and put two thousand of his best souldiers there in garrifon, under the charge of the famous captaine Franacontes, and flored his city with fufficient victuall for a yeares fiege, wherein he had great helpe from the Venetians and other Christian Princes, for that there was then great scarcity of all things in Epirus, by reason of the late wars. The like care he had also of all the rest of his cities, being continually aduertised from his fecret friends in the Turks court, of the great preparation intended against him by the Turkish King, against the beginning of the next Spring.

Amurath understanding that Scanderbeg was departed from Sfetigrade, changed his former determination for the calling backe againe of his army, and appointed it to meet againe at fembleth again Hadrianople, in the beginning of March following: whither the Baffaes; and other great com-M manders, at the time appointed, affembled with their companies, according as Amurath had before commanded. So that by the latter end of March, he had there in readinesse an army of an hun fred and threescore thousand men strong. Of which great multitude, he after the manner of the Turkish wars, sent forty thousand horsemen, under the leading of Sebalyas a politick

A captaine as his vaunt courriers into Epirus, in the beginning of Aprill, in the yeare 1420. The valiant captaine with great speed and no resistance entred into Epirus, as was given him in charge, and without let came to Croia: where, after he had aduitedly confidered of the feituation thereof, and of the places thereabouts, he strongly encamped himselfe neere thereunto in the pleasant plaine called Tyranna: and there with his trenches kept his fouldiers closes attending nothing more, but that no new supply of men, munition, or victuals, should be conueied into the city, more than was therein before his comming. For he was not able with his horsmen to do any thing against the city: and Scanderbeg had left nothing abroad in the country subject to his fury. Besides that, he was expresly by Amurath forbidden, to attempt any thing against Scanderbeg himselfe.

After Sebalyas had twenty daies thus lien encamped before Croia, neither doing nor taking harme: Amarath by reason of his great age, having marched oftentimes but five miles a day, came thither also with his whole army, wherewith he filled all the country round about: the very fight whereof had bin enough to have discouraged the small garrison in Croia, had they not been men both of great experience and resolution. Where after he had spent foure daies in settling of his campe, he sent two messengers into the Gouernour (as the manner of the Turks is) offering him if he would yeeld up the city, that it should be lawfull for him with all his fouldiers in fafety with bag and baggage to depart; and the Gouernour himfelfe to receiue in reward two hundred thousand aspers, with an honourable place amongst the great Baffaes of his court, if it would please him to accept thereof: and further, that the Citisens

C should enjoy all their antient liberties as in former time, without any alteration, with promise also of greater. These messengers comming to the gates of the city, could not be suffered to enter, but standing without, were commanded there to deliuer their message: which when the Gouernor had heard, he scornefully rejected their offers, and returned the messengers shamefully derided by the fouldiers which stood upon the wall. Amurath more offended with this contempt, than the refufall of his offers; and feeing no other means to gaine the city, converted all his deuises vnto the siege thereof. VVherefore he first commanded ten great pieces of artillery to be forthwith cast, for he had brought with him none ready made, because of the difficult passage ouer the high mountaines of Epirus; whereby it seemed to be a matter of infinit trouble to have brought his great ordnance; and therefore carried with him great flore

D of mettall in masse, whereof at his pleasure to make his great artillery as he saw cause. In sisteen daies this worke was brought to perfection, and ten pieces of huge greatnesse were ready mounted vpon carriages. Six of them he placed against the East side of the city, towards the plaine of Tyranna, and the other foure against the gate: in which two places only, Croia was subject to battery, being on all other parts naturally defended with impregnable rockes, ypon the tops whereof were built faire battlements, more for beauty than needfull defence. These two places Amurath battered foure daies continually, and with the fury of his artillery had cross battered, in both places bearen downe halfe the wall, and fore shaken the rest. Wherewith the Turk's were exceedingly encouraged, & with great cheerfulnes made all things ready to affault these breaches, when foeuer Amurath should command, striving among themselves who should shew E himselse most forward in that dangerous enterprise. And Mahomet the yong Prince, the more to encourage the foldiers, befides the great rewards by his father proposed, promised of himfelse to give an hundred thousand aspers vnto him that should first set up an ensigne upon the wals of the city. The garrifon soldiers on the other side, considering that the whole state and welfare of Epirus was reposed in their valour, and that the cies of most part of Christendome were as it were fixed upon them, were nothing dismaied with the breaches made, but manfully comforted and encouraged one another to endure all manner of perill and danger that might possibly chance: but especially the worthy Gouernour Vranacontes, who going through the middest of his fouldiers, and shaking some of them by the hands, withall said:

These, these are the fortresses of our City, these are the innincible bulivarkes, these are the irremo- The enterina nable flones and furest sement. What honour? what praise? what triumph should we hope for? if these successes the wals flanding whole and strong, we should lie shrouded under the defence of them, and not they defens Gournour to ded by us? So can cowards defend cities, and sheepe feare not the wolves rage, when they are safely encourage but shut up within the wals of their sheepecoats: But that is the praise of the wals, and not of the men. Suidier.

Worthy Castriot our Prince hath commended this his city to be defended by vs, and not vs by it. Ho. G nour is attended upon with danger, and fostered up amongst perils venery base mariner may be a mafter in faire weather : and firme things stand of themselnes, and need not our upholding. Wherefore men of worth foun fuch things, which being kept or loft, yeeld like praise. Things ready to fall, need shoaring, and this her hasteth honour, and there (worthy souldiers) appears th courage and valour. Wherefore let our valiant right hands defend thefe broken breaches, and in stead of these dead mals, couragiously on. pose our lusty and linely armed bodies against the force of our enemies. If these wals stand stell sirme. and unbattered, you should then fight from the top of them like women; but now that they are something baken, you hall as men fland upon somewhat more even ground, and encounter your enomies hand in hand, the better to fatisfic your furious defire. Where talfo in the thickest, shall easily view and judge of enery mans prinate courage in particular, and of all your valour in common. And yet if we well confider # of the matter, the place it felfe doth yet notably make for vs , and our former good hopes are little or no. thing by these small breaches diminished : for, this rising of the hill (not possible to be taken from us) although it be not so high as it is in other places, yet, doth it not serve us sufficiently at great advantage to charge our enemies, and hinder their affault? The steepnesse whereof, as it will be troublesome unto them, fo will it keepe we most fresh in strength, and make our shot more forcible. Wherefore this had beene a thing of wis to have beene wished for, if we desire the saughter of our enemies at this siege, or if we wish for perpetual bonour and glory by this warre. For this breach of the wals will encourage thefe barbarians, and allure their armed men to clime up in greater multitude than if the wals were whole; whereof to many shall on every side be easily staine, as we shall but aime at : except you had rather sit still, holding your hands together in your bosome as cowards. Their dead bodies shall fill up the breaches against f yoube men mindfull of your liberty. What is there (worthy captains and fouldiers) that letteth our viclory? or memorable flaughter of our enemies? by whom only thefe two places of the city can be affaul. ted: all the rest is out of danger and feares no enemies force. Here only is the pains to be taken, this onely is left for you to defend, and here shall you all be: the courage, force, and strength of you all shall in this place appeare. How will you fo many morthy captains, and valiant fouldiers, in so tittle roome befrom your selucs i we are too many defendants for so small breaches. Yet let us play the men, and do our endenour: let us in one conflict weaken the tyrants strength, and burst his proud heart; he will forsake this city, and raife his fige unfortunally begun, so soone as he shall see his first assault to cost him the lives of so many thousands of his men.

When Vranacontes had with this comfortable speech thus encouraged his soldiers, against the affault which he expected the next day; and had with great care and diligence fet althings in order for the same, & repaired the breaches as wel as was possible in that case, he gaue them leave for that night to take their rest. In the morning Amurath commanded the assault to be given to both the breaches, which was forthwith by the Turks cheerefully begun, and every man busic to perform the service he was appointed vnto, But by that time that the assault was well begun, a fudden alarum was taifed throughout all the Turks campe : for Scanderbig with five thousand valiant soldiers, had suddenly broken in vpon one side of the Turks great camp, and at the first encounter had slain six hundred of the Turks, & was now spoiling their tents. The rumor whereof troubled the whole campe, and made the Turks with leffe courage to af- L fault the breaches, for feare of the danger behind them. Amerath although he had great confidence in them whom he had before left for the safeguard of his tents, yet for more surety fent Seremes one of his greatest captains, with foure thousand fouldiers backe into the campe, for more furety, faying, that nothing could be too fure, against that wild beast: meaning the fury of Scanderbeg. Mahomet also the yong prince, hasted thither in great choler with his guard, much against his fathers will. But Moses, Scanderbegs lieutenant, knowing himself too weaketo withstand the multitude that was swarming thither (contenting himself with that which was already done) had before Mahemets comming, speedily retired with all his army into the safegard of the mountains, from whence he came: having done great harme in the Turks campe, with the loffe but of ten men. Scanderbeg in the heat of this skirmish, forgetting himself had so M far ingaged himfelf among the Turks, that he was by them on every fide inclosed, & in great danger to have bin slaine or taken: yet valiantly breaking through them, he escaped the danger, and recoursed the mountains, and with much ado came at length to his camp, to the great joy and comfort of them all, being before in great feare he had bin loft. This was accounted

A the greatest oversight of Scanderbeg in all his wars; for so much as the office of a good General confisteth not in adventuring of his person to manifest danger, but in the politick government of his charge. During the time that Scanderbeg thus affailed the Turks camp, Amurath by faintly affaulted the breaches, expecting the successe in the camp but when he understood than Scanderbee was retyred, and all quieted, he brought all his forces to the wals and first with the institude of his archers and small short labored to drive the defendants from the wals, oucrwheming them with arrows falling as thick as haile. And likewife at the same time other common oldiers of baser account, brought scaling ladders and other things needfull for the scaling of the walls. After whom also followed the Ianizaries and other chosen foldiers, ready to mount the ladders fo foone as they should be fet to the wals. But whilst they climb up the high hils in his order, the garrison soldiers made such slaughter of them with thot from the wals and out of the city, that they would have prefently retyred, had they not bin forced forward by their captains, who spared neither stripes nor wounds, when words would not serue: by this tyrannical means, the scaling ladders were with great flaughter of the common foldiers fet vp against the wals, and the Turks climing vp, came to handy blowes with the defendants at the breaches:nothing was to be heard but the crying of the people, the clattering of armor, and the instruments of warre, which was terribly redoubled with the eccho's from the mountains round about. The Turks doing what they might to win the breaches, were by the Christians worthily repulsed, and with their ladders tumbled headlong down the mountain, with such horrible slaughter and discomsiture, specially of the common soldiers, that none of them would fet one foot forward again toward the wals, although they had fmal hope to faue themfelues by retiring backe: for the fierce young Prince Mahomet even then making thew of his cruell disposition, caused them that returned, to be slain, by the terror thereof to drive others forward. These common soldiers, whom the Turks make small reckoning of, are for the most par miserable Christians, which lived in such countries as had sometimes received the faith of Christ, but are now under the Turkish slauery; of which fort of wretched people the Turkith tyrants draw with them great multitudes in their warres, most commonly vnarmed, because they dare not well trust them in wars against the Christians: these carry all the baggage of the camp, these serve to fetch wood and water for other souldiers of better account; these terue in stead of pioners to cast trenches and raise bulwarks; and when battell is to be given, if D it be in plaine field, these have their weapons put in theirr hands, and thrust into the fore front of the battel, to blunt the enemies swords: but if a city be to be besieged, these serves fit matter to fil vp the breaches with their dead bodies, or to make bridges for other foldiers to passe ouer vpon : and if they shrinke to attempt any thing they are commanded then are they more cruelly vsed by their commanders than by their enemies. When Amurath saw his souldiers so di couraged, he stood in doubt whether it were better for that time to sound a retrait, or to send a new supply: but being inraged with the losse of his men, and desirous to be in some part reuenged, he feat divers companies of his better foldiers, for the incouragement of them which were before discouraged, and so gauca fresh affault : but with as cuill or worse successe than before; for Vranacontes had withdrawne from the breaches all those souldiers which had endured the former affault, and placed other fresh & lusty men in their stead; who encouraged with the former victory, and loth to be accounted inferior to their fellows, repulsed the Turks with double flaughter:vntill that the aged King not able longer to behold the endlesse losse of his men, caused a retrait to be sounded, which all his souldiers were glad to heare, and so returned done vnto the defendants worth the remembrance. This shamefull repulse much grieued all the captains and commanders of Amuraths army, Mahomet this but especially Makomet the young Prince, whose violent nature unacquainted with mishap, king to deceive burnt impatiently with reuenge. Wherefore understanding that Scanderbeg lay intrenched on himses by him the mountaine of Tumenist, not far from his fathers army, he drew most of the best and readiest soldiers of all the whole camp, into that quarter which was neerest vnto Scanderbeg. of purpose that if he should againe assaile the camp in that place (as it was most like he would) he should be encountred with so many braue and valiant men there in readines, as that it should be hard for him either to do any great harme, or for himselfe to escape. Of all which, scanderbeg by certaine fugitiues had intelligence, as also in what order the camp lay: wherupon he

into his camp, having lost in those two assaults eight thousand men, without any notable harm

left Moses with five hundred soldiers in the place where he lay; taking order with him before his departure, that he at a certain appointed houre in the night following, should affaile the Turks camp in the quarter next vnto him where Mahomet lay; and having there raifed fome tumult, speedily to retyre again vnto his assured strength in the mountaine. Scanderbeg his. felf with the whole strength of his army, in number about 8000, in the mean time torkea compas, and by certain fecret by waies through the woods and mountains, came to the farther fide of the Turks camp, to a place called Mountecle. The night following, Moss at the appointed hour, with his 500 foldiers affailed that part of the Turks camp next to him, with fuch noise and tumult as if it had bin some great army : by occasion whereof, alt the Turks camp was in alarm, and drew in hast to that place where they heard that great tunult, as was before by Mahomet commanded. When at the same instant Scanderbeg with all he army brake H into the other fide of the Turks army, where he was least feared or looked for, & from whence the best soldiers were before drawn by Mahomet; and there made such slaughter and hauocke of the rest (not knowing which way to turn themselves) that the losse a little before received under the walls of Croia was now forgot, as a small thing in comparison of this. Moses hauing raifed a great fear, and don little harm, returned in fafety to his wel known ftrength; and Scanderbee having made great spoil in the Camp, searing to be oppressed with the multitude of his enemies, if hee should there longer stay, returned in good time, having scarce lost one

Amurath after this great loffe and trouble of his Camp, withdrew the greatest part of his small Ordnance which he had before bent against the City, into his Trenches, placing them 1 as commodiously as he might, for the defence therof against the sudden attempts of Standerbeg. Yet for as much as he could not in that hot feafon of the year fo closely incamp his Army, but that fome part therof would still be in the like danger as before; he therfore appointed Sebalias with fixteen thousand soldiers to attend upon Scanderbeg, that he should no more trouble the Camp. After which order taken, he battered the Walls of Croia afresh, and with his great Ordnauce ouerthrew whatfocuer the Citifens had with great labour repaired, making the breaches greater and more faultable than before, intending once againe by a new affault to proue his fortune and the force of his foldiers; which he appointed to be the next day. But when he faw no fign of courage or good hope in the heavy countenances of them discouraged; and that they yeelded unto him their consents rather for fear and shame, than K for hope of victory : he called them Cowards, discouraged with the least frown of fortune; and faid,

Eucry weak castle is able to hold out one assault; but if you wil draw these wild beasts out of their dens, you must arm your selves like resolute men of invincible courage to endure what thing soever shal happen. Great Captains with their puissant armies have grown old under the walls of their enemies, upon light and small displeasures and will you, having received so many dispraces of these persured Epirots, trave them all unreversed ? What great victory was ever yet by any man gained without bloudshed? Remember the most geterious victory of Varna. It is hard without blondy hands to put the yoke won the sierce enemics neck. All honorable things are brought to passe with adventure and labor; and the end of this War L dependeth upon the taking of Croia: if it were once won, all this war were at an end a which if Scanderbeg lofe (being the strength of his kingdom) he will not tarry one day longer in Epirus. Wherfore bee of good cheer, and couragiously fet upon it : there is not more uncertaintie in any thing than in matters of war. Fortune is to be proved, and oftentimes provoked of him that will wed her. And yet I wil not deny, but that we must go more warily to work against this enemy, and hasard our selves with better adulement, and not without reason like wild beasts to run headlong upon our own death. At length we shal wear them out, if we kill but ten of them at an affault; yet are they daily to be affailed that they may have no leifure to refresh themselves, and to make up their breaches; and peraduenture if force may not prevail, fortune may find some meanthat we look not for, as it fell out at the siege of Sfetigrade, beyond all our expectation. Treafen is ingenious, and mens desires great where rewards are propounded.

With these and the like speeches old Amurath incouraged his captains & soldiers, and the next morning early began the affault; which the Turks valiantly attempted, and without any regard of danger, came vnto the gates of the City, affaying, but with vain and desperat laA bear to have broken them topen. In this wildly live was call into many places of the city and the great Artiflery oftentimes discharged into the breaches, whereby many of the Talks themselves were flam with their own great theo, together with the Chinstians : for A. marine despotantly feet was consume to buy the life of one Christian with the losse of twenty of his Turksu Burche Christians fill valiantly repulfed their enemies, so that of them that cainerto the dates, none efcaped all tiet and of them that affanted the great breach, the forwardeft were file fish, and they which flood farther off were fore wounded with great fhor. Yet for all that, Amurath still maintained the assault by sending in of new supplies delighted to fee them go forward but grieued at the heart to fee them fo flain; until ac laft, weary with beholding the flaughter of his men, lie caused a retreit to be sounded, and so ended the affault, The Turkiriperfeaded by his Baffa's, not wilfully to caltaway his valiant fouldiers where there was no

murath thomout of hope to win the city by a Mille, thought good to produc what might Amurath feels bedon by widermining the fame: during which work he caused small alarms daily to be gi. to undermine uen so the bity, to the listely that the defendants buffed therwith, should not perceive the feexequork of the marie About which time his proutition of combegan to fail in his camp; for which cause the fent his pureyors for Corn to Lysia, a City of the Venetians with whom he was then in deagne, and bought of them great store of corn. But as his officers were conveying it to the damp, Sanderbee Hauing intelligence therof, flew the Oppuoy, and carried away with himall that prouision dittiding it among his own foldiers. Howbeir not long after, Amarath received great abundance of corn and other prouifion out of Macadonia. Befide that, the Venetian merchants afterwards furnished him with plenty of corn, oil, honey, and other necessarian ries i which Schnderbee might wel have hindred, but that he would not in fo doing offend the Venetians who were also his fecree friends; confidering that Amurath might have had all the same prouision out of the further part of Macedonia, Thracia, My sia, and such other places, if he had not otherwise had it from the Venerians.

Mild Amurath thus lay expecting the fucces of his mine, 400 of the garifon foldiers of Oroia fallying out of the crey chafed divers of the Turks that were come forth, back again to the Camp; Wherof Amurah was glad, hoping that they, incouraged with that good hap, would to their further losse give the like attempt afterward. But the staid discretion of the D governor deceived that his expectation who confidering the danger, would not fuffer his foldiers any more to fally out of the city. Scanderbeg also at this time having increased his army with a new supply of 2000 soldiers, divided the same into three parts, delivering one part 20 Moses, another to Tamesie, and referuing the third vaco himself. With this Army of 9000 thus divided the determined by night at one instant to assail the Turkes great Camp in three diners places, appointing in which quarter enery one should charge. But as Scanderbeg in the night appointed was comming toward the Turks camp, he was discouered by their Scouts; wherupon a sudden alarm was raised in the camp, and all mens minds turned that way, & soldiers appointed with all diligence to gard that fide of the camp. But while the Turkes were all at gaze this way for fear of Scanderbeg, Moles & Tanufic in the dead of the night at one time affailed the Turks Camp in two divers quarters, as they were appointed, where they flew a number of the Turks, and made great spoil. At which time Scanderbeg did also what he might, but by reason he was before discouered, did not much harm. Vpon the approch of the day Scanderbeg tetyred again to the hile, and by that time it was fair day light fate down upon the side of a great mountain about 20 surlongs off, in the open sight of all the Turks camp: which hedid of purpose, that Wases and Tanusie, which were by night retyred into the mountaines, might see which way to hold, to meet with him again, But the Turks thinking that he stood there to braue their whole camp, and as it were to out face them, to the great incouragement of the befieged; divers of them earneftly craved leave of Amurath that they might go vp to him, and at leastwife beat him out of fight: which he granting, 12000 of his best soldiers, of F which 7000 were horimen, and the reft foot, presently set forward to incounter them. Scanderbeg seeing them all the way they came, vpon their approch softly retyred a little farther vp into the mountains, ftil expecting the comming of Mofes & Tanufie. The Turks vnacquain-

Dains wel wearied of the moleures but wild only mende one a great may into the mountaines. G they perceived by the rising of the duft, that some greater forcewast at hand rand fon after they might plainly fee the formost of their enemies Wherfore leating so beginglosed they began to retyre : in which remoit Scandardeg hardly purfued them and having the advantage of the ground, flew many of them, but of pecially with his archery, Myles also comming afreils on another fide caused them to fly down she hil amain, & belide the flaughter them ade. mok divers brildness. Afterwhich victory by Scanderber obtained in the fight of America and his whole army he retyred again into the mountains. Yet for all that, down the fill me

How some we agree (faid he) upon other matters we come for, we brought not their wifts of harpofts Fin Amurath deceive any : for fomen we to deal with their children and erwants and not with men of courage and of lour. And albeit that enemies gifts are ener to be suspected, (as you have right wifely fail) and wetter ue nor, and to felues know) yet we durft not for thame come with fo worthy a Governor (withercommon laying is joingly handed. Take this prefent in good part, which shall no way inforce or hinder you so determin on disposed your affairs otherwise than shall feem unto you good : neither shall wee once abiect worth you these gifts which we fo frank and freely offer in the great Sultans name, whether you neiet or admit his deminid and meffage: wherin there is (perhaps) no leffe regard had of nonr good, than af our to Ton there is me greater token of a base mind, than to give, in hope to receive ad ain. We come, unto you frankely, (morthy Governor) I feak it from my heart, wee goe not about with filed feech and rich rewards to six cumum thee whose innincible minde we have so often in vain proded with our forces, and power . That it it for which Amurath loweth thee. He doth wonderfully admire the vertues of his onemies 3: and if it will posible desireth to have them with himself. There verily with somight a Mondoch might shy inwind ble mind and pregnant courage find a better way unto the highest type of Fontunes blaffen Not that condemn Scanderbeg (whom we his enemies do highly commend) for his Countrey for met resenered and so oftentimes worthily defended, yet chiefly by your help; but you are worthy of another manner of Soutraign, and of another maner of calling, and not to spend all the daies of your life, and such beneficial versues in observitic, and (without offence be it said) in contemptible basenes . Besides that Scanderbegs estate & M but momentary, the Destinies have assigned unto him too too mighty an enemy , his destruction may wh be deferred but not by any means avoided. Amurath hath conceived against him an implacable disting fure, and prepared his forces accordingly: he hath fiver to pare no colt, no labor, no danger : and that he

A neuer whill be liveth depart out of Epirus, before he have imposed a deadly yoke upon his neck, And behold the first of his misery beginneth at this city, and open your selues. We daily hear his paulions sound with these and such like speeches, That he will neuer depart out of this place before he have taken this city and latisfied his angry mind with the torture of your bodies : no, not if he should therfore lote Hadrianoble nea and that more is, his whole king dom. And verily he will do it, which I fear to divine or think voon: For although I withothers bear against you the mind of an enemy, yet am I a man, and mooned with human compassion. Beleeue me, ye men of Croia, beleeue mee, my eies would fearfely endure to behold the borrible feetacle of your miserable fortune. I tell you again, he will do it, except you change your purpose, and now receive health, i fe, liberty and peace, whilst it is so freely offered. For albeit that this notable Brong place, thefe impregnable walls, and especially your own valour, do yes defend you : how lone will it B hold out? Verily no longer than you have victuals, no longer than you have ment to fuft ain your bodies: Do you think that Amurath wil raife his siege in the middle of the heat of this war and be gon? No no. if force will not premail, if all his attempts fail, yet shall you see and feel these enemies continually to your hurt ; you shall alwases have these tents in your cies, and at your gates, untill long famine, which mastreth all things, tame your courage also. I pray you, what hope have you left ? from whence arifeth in your refolute minds fuch desperat contempt of danger ? Can Scanderbeg victuall you being fo streitly besieged ? who hideth himself (poor man) in the woods all day, and flieth over the tops of the mountains, loden with travell and care, scarse able to relieue his own misery. Or will the Venetians relieue you, who daily bring untows, and store us with too too great plenty of all things for this war against you. Wherfore repent your too much hardines, and eather your wits together : behold, I your enemy aduife you : you have long enough C continued in your obstinacy : your country and liberty is not so far to be defended as that you should therfore fight against God. But wherfore do I call this, liberty ? you must give place wnto your fortune, and learn to obey them that be too firong for you. You shall find affured liberty, rich rewards, perpetuall rest with Amurath. Prouide for your felues, if you be wife, whill all things are yet whole for you to determine of whilst wa your enemies exhort and request you, and had rather have you our voluntary companions; than our inforced fernants and flanes.

This the Bassa spake with great graultie, and no lesse vehemencie, expecting some great motions to have rifen in the minds of the foldiers. But when he perceived that his speech had rather filled them with indignation, than with fear; and that it was but a vain thing to go a-D bout to terrific them with words, whom all the power of Amurath could not make afraid with weapons, he requested to talk alone with the gouernor in secret, which was also granted. For all men had no leffe good opinion of the worthy governors fidelitie, than of his wisdom and valor. The crafty Baffa having him by himfelf, began with great cunning to deliver his more secret message. When Pranacontes perceiuing by a little, what the whole tale meant, interrup- wranacontes ted him in the middle of his speech, and without more ado commanded him to depart, streit. Tiesteb Amuly charging him, that neither he nor any other should after that time presume to come from and libratures his matter to the city, to speak with him about any such dishonorable matter, for if he did, he the safe, would in detestation therof cause their hands, nose, and ears to be cut off, and so return them difmembred in flead of answer. And so the Bassa was with his presents turned out of the city, E and no man suffered to receive any thing of him in reward; although the foldiers could have bin wel content to have cased him and his servants of that cariage, if the governor would but haue winked therat.

Great was the expectation in the Turks camp, of the Bassa's return; but when they saw the presents were not received, they easily ghessed that all went not as they wished. But when Amurath himself vnderstood the gouernours resolute answer, he in great rage commanded all things to be made ready for a fresh assault : which he did rather to fatisfie his anger, than vpon any hope he had to prevail therin. The next day he caused a furious affault to bee given crois agains in to the city, but with greater loffe to himself than before; the Christians stil valiantly defen-van affaulted. ding the city against the Turkish fury. In this assault many of the Turks were slaine at the F breach with their own great thot : for whilest Amurath fought therwith to drive the Christians from the defence of the breach, he flew a great number more of the forwardest of his own men, than he did of the defendants. But wearied at length to behold the endles slaughter of his men, he gave ouer the affault, and returned into his camp, as if he had bin a man halfe fran-tick or distract of his wits; and there sate down in his Tent all that day full of melancholy G puffions, fomtimes violently pulling his hoary beard & white locks, complaining of his hard and difafter fortune, that he had lived fo long to fee those daies of difgrace, wherin all his former glory and triumphant victories were obscured, by one base town of Epirus. His Bassa's and grave counfellors laboring in the meane time with long discourses to comfort him vo. fomtimes recounting vnto him his many and glorious victories, and otherwhiles producing antient examples of like euent. But dark and heavy conceits had so overwhelmed the melan. choly old Tyrant, that nothing could content his waiward mind, or reusue his dying foirits. so that the little remainder of naturall heat that was now left in his aged body, now oppres. fed and almost extinguished with melancholy conceits, and his aged body dried up with for. row he became fick of griefe. Wherupon by the counfell of some of his Bassa's he sent an H Embaffador to Scanderbeg, offering him peace, if he would yeeld to pay him a yearly tribute of ten thousand Duckats: thinking by that means his honour to be well faued, if before his departure out of Epirus, hee could but make Scanderbeg his Tributary. This Embassadour was by Scanderbeg honourably entertained in his Campe; but the offered peace at the same time veterly refused. The Embassadour returning vuto Amurath, declared vnto him the cuil fuccesse of his Embassage, which greatly encreased his melancholy sicknesse. And scander. bee to grieve him the more, understanding that he was dangerously sicke, and that the great Baffa's were more carefull of the Kings health, than of the fuccesse of the wars; divers times affailed the Turks Camp. Which thing though the Baffa's kept from his knowledge with all carefulnesse; yet he oftentimes suspected the matter, by the often alarums and tumults I in the Camp, and with the grief therof languished. So feeling his ficknesse daily to increase, and that he could not much longer live, lying upon a pallet in his paullion, grievously complained vnto his Baffa's, That the Destinies had so blemished all the former coutse of his life with fuch an obscure death, That hee which had so often repressed the fury of the Hungarians, and almost brought to nought the pride of the Grecians, together with their name, should now be inforced to give up the ghost under the walls of an obscure Castle (as heetermed it) and that in the fight of his contemptible enemy. After that, turning himselfe to his fon Mahomet, he emeftly commended him to the faithfulnes of his Baffas, and gave him many graue aduertifements, for times in fecret betwixt them felues, and fom times in the hearing of others: want of ftrength, and abundance of tears running down his aged face (vpon the fight of his fon) oftentimes interrupting his speech. Yet fick vnto death as hee was, and drawing fast vnto his end, he forced himselfe, to warn his son of such things as now at his death grieued him most.

Let myne example (quoth he) be a warning unto thee, my fon, neuer to contemn thine enemy, be het Mener so weak : of which one thing aboue all others I have repented my self too long, and shall do after my his fan Naho death, if any feeling of human things remain in the dead. And that I was so foolish and inconsiderate w mi won his foster up as it were in my bosom this my domesticall and neglected enemy, wherby I have purchased une my felf this calamity, and for ever blemished the honor of the Othoman kings; whilft I so basely ending my daies under the walls of Croia, shall become a by word unto the world and all posterity for ener. This L Traitor should cuen then have bin oppressed, when he by treachery first resourced his wicked king dom:in that newnesse of his estate, and before the minds of the people were assured unto him, then it had been an easie matter, without bloud shed otterly to have extinguished the wretch, together with his name. Alis Balla, whose entil fortune was the first beginning of his good; nor the other Generals, who by him slains or taken prisoners, increased his strength or credit unto his subjets, should not have bin sent against him? athing which I have oftentimes thought upon, but would foar fe have beleeved, that ever I hould have therby received such difgrace, together with the ignominious renting of my kingdom, if I had not beene taught the same by myne own experience, to my great loffe and hearts grief. We entred into Epirus, and here in amped an hundred and threescore thousand men strong : now if leisure serue you, take view of them, examin the matter, you shall find a great want of them. The fields could not contain our regiments M and the multitude of our men : but now, how many tents fland empty ? how many horses want riders? I ou shall go to Hadrianople with our forces much impaired. As for me, the Destinies have wowed my spirits to this country of Epirus, as unto me fatal. But wherfore do I impute unto my self these impediments

A and chances of fortune? for then first began this seed of mischief in Epirus, when the Hungarians and other the Christian princes rose up in arms against us; at which time we fought not with them for sourraignly bus for the whole state of our king dom, as the bloudy battels of Varna and Costova fill witnes to the world. So whill I had neither leisure nor sufficient power to take order for all my important affaires at once in the mean time this enemy grew as you fee. But how or in what order you are herafter to wage war against him, you may not look for any direction from me, which have in all these matters so evil directed my felf. Fortune never deceived my indeavors more than in this : but haply they Mahomet my fon may ft proue a more fortunat warrior against him : and for (o many honors already given wonto me, the de-Stinies have reserved the triumph of Epirus for thee. Wherefore, my son, thou shalt receive from me this Scepter and thefe royall enfignes: but aboue all things, I leave wnto thee this enemie, charging thee not to B leave my death unrevenged. It is all I charge thee with, for forgreat and stately a patrimony as thou are to receive from me : it is the only farrifice that my old departing ghoft defireth of thee.

Shortly after he became speechles, and striuing with the pangs of death half a day, he then Amurath his breathed out his gastly ghost, to the great ioy and contentment of the poor oppressed Chri-death. stians. He died about the middle of Autumn, Anno Dom. 1450 when he had lived 85 years, as most write, and therof reigned 28, or as some others report 20; about five months after the

Thus lieth great Amurath, erst not inferior vnto the greatest monarchs of that age, dead al- Amurath an most in dispair: a worthy mirror of honors frailty, yeelding vnto the worldly man in the end example of the C neither comfort nor relief. Who had fought greater battels who had gained greater victo. woulds bonor. ries or obtained more glorious triumphs than did Amurath? who by the spoil of so many mighty Kings and Princes, and by the conquest of so many proud and warlike nations, again restored and established the Turks kingdom, before by Tamerlane and the Tartars in a manner clean defaced. He it was that burst the heart of the proud Grecians, establishing his Empire at Constantinople, even in the centre of their bowels; from whence have proceeded so many miseries & calamities into the greatest part of Christendom, as no tongue is able to expres. He it was that first brake down the Hexamile or wall of separation on the street of Corinth, and conquered the greatest part of Peloponesus. He it was that subdued vnto the Turkes so many great countries and provinces in Asia; that in plain field and set battell overthrew di-D uers puissant kings and princes, and brought them under his subjection; who having slaine Vladiflans king of Hungary and Polonia, and more than once chased out of the field Huniades that famous and redoubted warrior, had in his proud and ambitious heart promised to himfelf the conquest of a great part of Christendom. But ô how far was he now changed from the man he then was ! how far did these his last speeches differ from the course of his forepasfed life! full of fuch base passionat complaints and lamentations as bescemed not a man of his place & spirit; but some vile wretch ouertaken with dispair, & afraid to dy. Where were now those hauty thoughts, those losty looks, those thundring and commanding speeches, at which so many great Captains, so many troups and legions, so many thousands of armed soldiers were wont to tremble and quaker. Where is that head, before adorned with fo many trophies and triumphs? Where is that victorious hand that fwaied so many scepters? where is the majestie of his power and strength, that commanded ouer so many nations & kingdoms? O how is the case now altred ! he lieth now dead, a ghastly filthy stinking carkasse, a clod of clay vnregarded, his hands closed, his eies shut, and his seet stretched out, which erst proudly traced the countries by him subdued and conquered. And now of such infinit riches, such vnmeasurable wealth, such huge treasures, such stately honors and vain-glorious praises as he in his life time enjoyed; his frail body enjoyed nothing, but left all behind it. O the weake condition of mans nature! ô the vain-glory of mortal Creatures! ô the blinde and peruerse thoughts of foolish men! Why dowe so magnific our seluces why are wee so pust up with pride, why do we so much set our minds upon riches, authority, and other vanities of this life? F wherof neuer man had yet one daies affurance, and at our most need, and when we least think, quite forfake vs; leaving even them that most fought after them, and most abounded in them, shrouded oft times in the sheet of dishonor and same.

That his death is otherwise by some reported, I am not ignorant; the Turks saying that he died miraculously forewarned of his death at Hadrianople. And some others, That hee died in Afia, strucken with an apoplexy proceeding of a furfet taken of the immoderate drinking G of wine. But Marinus Barlefius, who lived in his time in Scodra fast by Epirus, whose author ritie in the report of the wars betwixt him and Scanderbeg we follow, fets it down in fuch maner as is before faid.

Amazath bu. Prefently after his death, Mahomet his fon, for fear of some innovation to be made at home. m.d at Profa. ratied the fiege and returned to Hadrianople: and afterward with great folemnitie buried his dead body at the West side of Prusa in the suburbs of the city, where he now lieth in a channel without any roofe, his graue nothing differing from the manner of the common Turkes. which they say he commanded to be don in his last will, that the mercy and blessing of God (as he termed it) might come vnto him, by the shining of the Sun and Moone, and falling of

He whilft he lived mightily inlarged the Turkish kingdom, and with greater wisdom and policie than his predecessors established the same. Insomuch that some attribute to him the first institution of the Ianizaries and other soldiers of the court (the greatest strength of the Turkish empire) before indeed begun in the time of Amurath the first, his great grandfather, (as is before declared) but by him greatly augmented, and the policy of that state, wherein it euer fince in his posteritie flourished, euen by himselfe plotted. For the better establishing where f in his own house, & to cut off al occasion of fear, as also to leave all such as he thought might rife against him, naked & bare of forces to resist (but especially the other antient and noble families of the Turks, stil secretly repining at the great honor of the Otheman kings) he as a man of great wildom and judgment to keep them under in the beginning of his reign by manifold fauors began to bind to himfelf men of strange and forrein countries, his servants, and by ordering his most weighty affaires by their authoritie, purposed so by little and little to cast off the service of his natural Turks: they in the meen time little or nothing at all low king into this his practife. And wheras the Othoman Kings his predeceffors had for the most part or rather altogether raised their Ianizaries and other soldiers of the Court, of such children of the Christians as were taken in the Wars; hee seeing by experience how seruiceable those new kind of soldiers were, began forthwith to plot in his head, how to make himself an army altogether of fuch able persons, his own creatures, and so to bring in a new kind of Warfare, wholly depending of himfelf. And to that end, by his officers appointed for that purpole, took from the Christians throughout his dominions, every fift child; the fairest and aprest of K whom he placed in his own Seraglio at Hadrianople, and the rest in other-like places by him built for such purpose: where they were by sufficient teachers, first instructed in the principles of the Mahometan religion, and then in all maner of activity and feats of arms. Of these being grown to mans state, he made horsemen, gaue them great pensions, and forting them into divers orders, appointed them also to gard his person, honoring the better fort of them with the name of Spahi-Oglani, that is to fay, his fons the Knights; and of these began to make his Bassa's, his Generals of his armies, and the gouernors of his provinces and cities, with all the great offices of state. The rest, & far the greatest part of these tribute children, taken from their Christian parents, and not brought vp in the Seraglio's, hee caused to be dispersed into euery city and country of his dominion in Asia, there for certain years to be brought up in all L hardnes and painful labor, neuer tasting of case or pleasure: out of which hard brood so inured to pains, he made choice of the most lusty and able bodies, sittest for service, as hee thought good; who kept in continual exercise, and by skilfull men taught to handle all maner of weapons, but especially the bow, the piece, and the scimitar, were by him as occasion serued, added to the other lanizaties, and appointed for the garding of his person; commonly calling them by the names of his Sons. The remainder of these Tribute children, as wnsit for the Wars, he put vnto other base occupations and ministeries. But vnto those martials men of all forts fo by him ordained, he appointed a continuall pay according to their degrees and places: and by great liberties and benefits bestowed upon them, bound them so fast unto him, as that he might now account himfelf to have of them fo many fons as he had foldiers. M For they, together with the Christian religion, having forgotten their parents and Countrey, and knowing no other lord and mafter but him, and acknowledging all that they had to come and proceed of his free grace only, remained euer bound and faithfull vnto him, and fo kept others also, as wel the natural Turks themselues, as the other oppressed Christians, withA in the bounds of obedience and loyaltie. A great policie proceeding from a deep judgment. first to weaken the Christians, by taking from them their best children, and of greatest hope; Agreat policie, and then by them depending wholly of himfelf, to keep in awe and dutifull obedience his natural subjects also: having them alwaies as a scourge ready to chastise the rebellious or disloval. Now the other Othoman Kings and Princes (the successors of Amurath) keeping this custom, and also increasing it one after another, have therby not onely kept the empire still in their house and family, where it was first gotten, but also so maintained the majesty of their state, as that they are of their subiects seared, obeyed, and honored not as Kings, but as Gods. For the naturall Turks their subjects losing courage continually, and daily growing more base and dastardly, by reason they are not suffered to practise the knowledge of arms; and the B foldiers in whose power all things are, knowing nothing of their own, but holding & acknowledging all that they have to come of their Lord, account them as Lords and Kings of all ru-ling much after the maner of the Pharaohs the antient Kings of Egypt; who were absolute Lords and masters both of the publique and privat wealth of their subjects, whom they kept under as flaues and villaines And herof comes it to passe, that the better part of them whom we cal Turks (but are indeed the children of Christians, & seduced by their talse Instructers) desire to be called Mululmans, that is to say, right beleeuers; holding it a reprochfull & dishonorable thing to becalled Turks, as it were peculiarly and aboue other people. For that they knowing right wel, that there is not one natural Turk among all those that bear authoritie and rule, and are had in greater honor and reputation than the rest (such as are the men of war and the courtiers) but he is born a Christian either of father, or at the least of his grandfather; auouch them only to be Turks who live in Natolia, all of them either merchants, or of base and mechanical trades, or poor laborers with the spade and pick-ax, and such like people unfit for the wars, the rest (as I say) holding it for a title of honor, to be descended of Christian parents. Yeathe grand Seignior himself, although by the fathers side hee be come of progenitors such as were naturall Turks born; yet many of them had Christian mothers, which they accounted in the greatest part of their nobility and honor. Thus by Amaraths wisdom was the Order of the Ianizaties and other foldiers of the Court greatly advanced, though not by him begun; and the politick state of the kingdom (to say the truth) quite altered : the natural Turks (more than the Sultan himfelf) now bearing therin no sway, but only these new D souldiers, all of them descended from Christian parents, and by adoption as it were become the fons of the Turkish Sultans, and under them commanding all. By whom they have ever fince mannaged their estate, and by their good service wonderfully, even to the astonishment of the world, increased and extended their empire. But of them more shall be said heraster. This great King was of his subiects while he liued, wonderfully beloued, and no lesse of them after his death lamented. He was more faithfull of his word than any of the Turkish Amurabel. Kings either before or after him:by nature melancholy and fad, and accounted rather politick differences. than valiant, yet was indeed both : a great diffembler and painful in trauell, but waiward and tefty about measure, which many imputed vnto his great age. He had iffue fix fons, Achmetes, The four of Aladin, Mahomet, Hasan (otherwise called Chasan) Vrchan, & Achmetes the youger, of some called Calepinus. Three of whom died before; but the two yongest were by their

THE LIFE OF MAHOMET, SECOND OF THAT NAME, SEVENTH KING, AND FIRST EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKS, FOR HIS MANY VICTORIES SYRNA. . MED THE GREAT.

HE report of the death of old Amurath the late King, was in short time blowne thorow most parts of Christendome, to the great joy of many; but especially of the Greekes and other poore Christians which bordered upon the tyrants Kingdome; who were now in hope, together with the change of the Turkish King, to make exchange also of their bad estate and fortune : and the rather, for that it was thought, that his eldest some Mahomet, after the death of his father, would have imbraced the Christian Religion, being in his childhood instructed therein (as was supposed) by his mother the daughter of the Prince of Servia, a Christian. But vaine was this hope, and the joy thereof but short, as afterward by proofe

it appeared: For Mahomei being about the age of one and twenty yeares, succeeding his father in the Kingdome in the yeare of our Lord 1450, embraced in shew the Mahometan Religion, abhorring the Chaistian; but indeed making no great reckoning either of the one or of the other, but as a meere Atheist deuoyd of all Religion, and worshipping no other god but Keligion; good Fortune, derided the simplicity of all such as thought that God had any care or regard of worldly men, or of their actions: which graceleffe resolution so wrought in him, that he thought all things lawfull that agreed with his luft, and making conscience of nothing, kept no league, promise, or oath, longer than stood with his profit or pleasure.

Now in the Court men stood diversly affected towards the present state: the mighty Bassaes, and others of great authority, vnto whom the old Kings gouernment was neuer grieuous, inwardly lamented his death; doubting lest the fierce nature of the yong King should turn to the hurt of some of them in particular, and the shortning of their authority in generall, as indeed it shortly after fellout. But the lusty gallants of the Court weary of the old King, who in hope of preferment had long wished for the government of the yong Prince, were glad to fee him fet vpon his fathers feat. And the vulgar people (neuer constant but in vnconstancy, and alwaies fawning vpon the present) exceedingly rejoyced in their yong King. The lanizaries also at the same time (according to their accustomed manner) took the spoile of the Christians and Iews that dwelt among st them, and easily obtained pardon for the same: whereupon he was by the same lanizaries and other fouldiers of the Court, with great triumph saluted King. Which approbation of these men of war, is vnto the Turkish Kings a greater assurance for the possession of their Kingdome, than to be borne the eldest son of the King, as in the pro-F cesse of this History shall appeare: so great is the power of these masterfull slaues, in promoting to the kingdome which foeuer of the Kings fons they most fauour, without much regard whether they be eldeft or not.

This yong tyrant was no sooner possessed of his fathers kingdome, but that he forgetting the Mahomet murlawes of nature, was presently in person himselfe about to have murthered with his owne derest his bre-

hands; his youngest brother, then but eighteene moneths old, begotten on the daughter of C Sponder beim. Which vnnaturall part, Moses one of his Bassaes, and a man greatly in his fauour perceining, requested him, not to embrue his own hands in the bloud of his brother, but rather to commit the execution thereof to some other: which thing Makomet commanded him the author of that counfell forthwith to do. So Mofes taking the child from the nurse, strangled it. with pouring water downe the throat thereof. The young lady understanding of the death of her child(as a woman whom fury had made past feare) came, and in her rage reuiled the tirant to his face, (hamefully vpbraiding him for his inhumane cruelty. When Mahomet to appeale her fury, requested her to be content, for that it stood with the policy of his state: and willed her for her better contentment, to aske what focuer the pleased, and the should forthwith have it. But the defiring nothing more than in some fort to be reuenged, defired to have Moses (the H executioner of her fonne) deliuered vnto her, bound : which when the had obtained, the prefently struck him into the breast with a knife (crying in vaine vpon his vnthankfull master for beloe;) and proceeding in her cruell execution, cut an hole in his right fide, and by piecemeale cut out his liver, and cast it to the dogs to eat. At the same time also he caused another of his brethren, committed by his father to the keeping of Caly-Baffa, and now by him betraid into his hands to be likewise murthered.

Thus beginning his tyrannous raign with the bloudy execution of them that were in bloud seb the Ture necreft vnto him, and whom of all others he ought to have defended, he presently after began to frame a new forme of a common weale, by abrogating and altering the old laws & customs. and publishing of new, better fitting his own humour, and more commodious for himselfe: I imposing also new taxes and subsidies upon his subjects, never before heard of thereby to in. crease his treasures, and satisfie his augritious desire; which among st many other his vices, so much reigned in him, as that he was thought ouer-sparing vnto himselfe, as well in his apparel as in his diet, And proceeding further, he called vnto streit account all the great officers of his kingdome: of whom some he put to death, and confiscated their goods: others he put to great fines,or quite remoued them from their offices. In like maner he dealt also with his great Baffaes, admitting many falle and furmifed acculations against them: whereby to bring them within his danger, where little mercy was to be looked for. By which meanes he became no leffe terrible vnto his subjects, than he was afterwards unto his enemies; and so was of themexceedingly feared, but more hated. Among other things he much missisked in his court the ex- K cessive number of saulconers and huntsmen, which was growne so great by the immoderate delight which his predecessors tooke in the pleasures of the field, that there were continually maintained of the Kings charge seuen thousand saulconers, and not many sewer huntsmen faying, that he would not be so much a soole, as to maintain such a multitude of men to attend vpon fo meere a vanity. And therefore tooke order, that from thenceforth there should be allowance made for 500 faulconers only, and 100 huntimen: the rest he appointed to serue as foldiers in his wars. At the same time also he entred into league with Constantinus Palaologus the Emperor of Constantinople, and the other Princes of Grecia: as also with the Despot of Sernia, his grandfather by the mothers side, as some will have it; howbeit, some others write, that the Despot his daughter, Amurath his wise, was but his mother in law, whom he, under I the colour of friendship sent backe againe vnto her father after the death of Amurath, still allowing her a princely dowry. But if the were not his mother (as like enough it is that the was not) much more happy was the that the neuer groned for fo graceleffe a fon.

Whilest Mahomes was thus occupied about his civill affaires, Ibrahim King of Caramania, Madrimet gotth who long before had maried Amuraths fifter, and yet for all that, had (as his ancestors had beavaing the fing forc him) alwaies enuied the prosperous successes of the Othoman Kings, tooke occasion in the of Caramania. first yeare of Mahomet his reigne, with fire and sword to inuade his dominions in Asia. Which thing when Mahomet under Rood, he displaced Isa his lieutenant in Asia, as a man not sufficient to mannage so great warres, and appointed Isaac. Baffa in his roome, a most valiant manot war, vpon whom not long before he had vpon speciall fauour bestowed in marriage the faire M daughter of Sponderbeius, one of his fathers wives, of whom we have spoken before. This great Bassa passing ouer into Asia, raised a great army. After whom followed Mahomet in person himselfe with a greater, out of Europe: and having all his forces together, entered with great Locality into Caramania. But the Caramanian King perceiving himselfe vnable to withstand so puissant an enemy, fled into the strength of the great mountains, and by his Embassadours offered vnto (Mabonet fuch reasonable conditions of peace, as that he was content to accept thereof. Which after they had by folemne oath on both parts confirmed, Mahomet returned with his army to Prufa: but when he was come thither, the Janizaries prefuming that they might be bold with the young King, putting themselves in order of battell, came and with great infolency demanded of him a donatiue or largious, as a reward of their good ferrice done. With which fo great prefumption, Mahomet was inwardly chafed : but for fo much as they were his best fouldiers, and already in armes, he wifely dissembled his anger for the prefent, having a little before had warning thereof by Abedin Baffa, and Turcehan beg, two of his great captains, who had got some suspition of the matter: wherefore to content them, he caufed ten great bags of afpers to be feattered among them; and to pacified the matter. But within few daies after, he caused Daganes (the Aga or chief captain of the Ianizaries) to be brought before him, and to be shamefully whipt: and so presently discharging him of his office, placed one Mustapha in the same. The like severity he vied against the rest of the vnder captains, caufing them to be cruelly feourged and beaten like flaues: which in that tyrannical government is an viuall punishment, vpon the least displeasure of the King to be inflicted vpon any man, without respect of degree or calling, if he be not a natural Turke born. Presently after he sent Mentesia sub-Isaac his lieutenant against Elias Prince of Mentesia or Caria, by whom the poore Prince dued by the was driven out of his countrey: ever fince which time it hath remained in subjection to the Turkish Kings, as part of their Kingdome and Empire.

When Mahomet had thus ended the Caramanian war, and was determined with his army to 1452 returne to Hadrianople, he was aduertised, That the streits of Hellespontus were so strongly possessed by the Christian sleet, that he could not there possibly passe ouer but with most manifest danger: wherefore he tooke his way through that part of Bythinia which lyeth about Constantinople, and came to the castle which the Turks call Acce-Chisar, and the Grecians, be with or white castle, standing upon the narrow streit of Bosphorus on Asia side, and there nassed ouer into Europe at the same place where his father Amurath had not many yeares before in like manner found passage. Where when he was safely got ouer with his army, he by the aduice of his Bassaes encamped fast by the sea side, and there presently began to build a great strong castle close vnto the streits of Bosphorus, neere vnto Propontis, on Europe side, directly over against the other castle in Asia. For the speedy accomplishment of which work. heassembled thither al the workmen he could possibly get out of Europe and Ana, apportio. ning vnto his captaines and foldiers of his army part of the worke also: by whose industry and labor, that great building was in shorter time brought to perfection, than was by any man at the first expected. This castle which for the greatnesse thereof, is of most writers reputed for a city, was by the Turks named Genichifar, and of the Grecians Neocastron, or New castle, and also Lamocastron, or castle vpon the streits; and was there by the Turks built, as well for the safety of their owne passage to and fro, as for to hinder the passage of the Christians through those narrow streits, they now possessing the strong forts on both sides; and thereby also to distresse the city of Constantinople, from whence this castle was not about five miles E distant. When Mahomet in the second yere of his reign had finisht this great castle, with some other small forts about the same, and also repaired the other castle in Asia ouer against it, he placed therein strong garrifons, and furnished the same with artillery; in such fort; that no ship could passe through the streit of Bosphorus into the great Euxine, or blacke sea, but shee was in danger to be sunke: whereby the rich trade which the merchants of Venice, Genua, and Constantinople, had to Cassa, and other places lying upon the Euxine, were almost quite cut off, to the great hinderance of those estates. Now Mahomet by nature ambitious, and withall desirous to do some such thing as the glory whereof might farre passe the same of his predeceffors, thought nothing more answerable to his high conceits, than to attempt the winning of Constantinople, and the vtter subuersion of the Greeke Empire: Wherupon his father Amu- Mahimet ma-F rath, and his great grandfather Bajazet, had before invaine spent their forces. Besides that, it beth preparation grieued him to fee that goodly city, the antient feat of the Christian Empire, tobe fo com- ging of Conmodioully scituated; as it were in the middest of his Kingdome, and not to be at his com- flantinople. mand. Hereusto the small power of the Greeke Emperour himselfe, and the other Christian Princes at the same time at mortall discord amongst themselves, ministred vnto his greedy defire to small hope of successe, and served as spurs to prick him forward vnto so great an enterprise. Wherefore all the Winter he caused great preparation to be made of shipping and other warlike prouision both by sea and land; and gaue out commissions for the leuying of a mighty army, to be in readinesse against the next Spring. But whither he would imploy the fame no man could certainly tells fome ghe ffing one thing, and fome another, as the manner of men is, when such extraordinary preparation is at hand. Constantinus the eight of that name the Emperor in then Emperor of Constant nople, a Prince of a mild and foft spirit, fitter for the Church than value craution and first for the field hearing of the great preparation made by the Turkish King, and fearing lest that tempest then growing, should vpon the sudden break forth vpon himself, first made such preparation as his owne small ability would extend vnto. And then sent his Embassadors vnto other Christian Princes, earnestly crauing their aid & assistance in that his dangerous estate, u But that labour was loft, and all his fuit vaine: for they being at variance one with another. and having more care of private revenge, than how to repulse the common enemy of Christianity, could not, or would not afford him any helpe at all. Nicholas the fifth of that name then Bishop of Rome, with Alphonsus King of Naples, and the State of Venice, promised to have fent him thirty gallies, but none for all that came.

There were by chance at Constantinople certain ships and gallies of Venice, Genua, Creer and Chios, of whom the Emperour made stay : at which time also it chanced, that Ioannes Ia finianus, an aduenturer of Genua, who had beene scouring those seas, came to Constantinople with two tall (hips, and foure hundred fouldiers : where he was entertained by the Emperour. And forafmuch as he was a man honourably descended, and supposed to be both of great I courage and direction, was by the Emperour appointed Generall of all his forces next your himselse. He also entertained fix thousand Greekes which, with three thousand Venetians. Genowaies and others, whom he had made stay of, joyned vnto the citizens, was all the weake strength he had to rely upon, for the defence of his State and Empire.

Confinatino-

Against the beginning of the Spring, the Turkish king had in readines a great and puissent vide Leonardi army of three hundred thousand men, of whom, the greatest part were taken out of Bulgaria. Chienfin Ar. Seruia, Rascia, Thessalia, Macedonia, and Grecia swhich as yet were called the Christian counmitten, high, tries, and were themselves either indeed Christians, or else such renegates as had not long bede capitalitate fore forsaken the Christian faith: vnto these also were joyned divers other Christians which came out of Germany, Bohemia, and Hungary, to serue the Turke in his wars. This hath been g none of the least means, wherby the Turkish Kings have growne so great, and their kingdome so mightily inlarged, by inforcing and alluring Christians to fight against Christians, to the veter confusion of themselues. Among the great multitude of the Europeian Christians, were mingled his effeminate fouldiers of Asia, and his natural! Turks and Ianizaries, which were in number fewest, and yet cammanded all the rest.

With this great army, well appointed with all warlike provision, came Mahomet the Turcompete before kish King from Hadrianople: and the ninth day of Aprill, in the yeare 1453, encamped before Constantinople, and with the multitude of his army filled all the maine land before the city, from the sea side of Bosphorus, vnto the place where the same sea compassing in the city on two parts, and running far into the land betwixt Constantinople and Pera, maketh therea L goodly hauen betwixt them.

The frituation

This city of Constantinople (called in antient time Bizantium) is in some of a Triangle of confiantine feituated in Europe in the pleasant country of Thracia, vpon a point of the maine, land shoot ting out towards Asia, called of Pliny and Solinus, the promontory Chrysoceras, where the fell of Propontis joyneth unto that streit of sea, which divideth Asia from Europe, called in any tient time Bosphorus Thracius; sometime the streit of Pontus; and the mouth of Pontus; and of the modern writers, the fireit of Constantinople; and about two hundred yeares pass, or more, S. George his arme. This point of the maine, whereon the city standard, lyeth about two Italian miles more Northward than dorn the ancient city of Calcedon, on the other fide of the fireit in Afia: more than thirty miles diffant from the Buxine or blacke Sea, ly. N ing from it Northward: And two hundred miles from the fireit of Hellespontus or Callpolis, from thence South. Which noble City (of all others most fitly seated for the Empire of the World, and with great majesty overlooking both Europe and Asia) is by the Cosmographers accounted to stand in the height of 43 degrees, upon seven little hill, of no great and easie ascent: and was there first built by Pausanias the Lacedemonian King, and Constantinopie called Bizantium, and so many yeares flourished as a populous and rich city, vntill the civill miss, definited wars betwixt Seuerus the Emperor, and Niger: what time it indured the fiege of the Romans by seuerus, revnder Seuerus, three yeres, with such obstinacy, that it yeelded not vntill it was brought to such flamine the extremity, that the citifens did cat one another; and then yeelded, had the wals overthrowne Gratandum by Seucrus, and the city it selfe destroied, and brought to the low estate of a poore country to teaby Mibvillage, and so by him given to the Perinthyans. In which base estate it continued untill the time of Conflantine the Great, the fon of Helena (whom some will needs have to have beene an English woman) by whom it was new built, and beautified with buildings so stately & sumptuous, that vnto the strange beholders it seemed it dwelling place for heavenly wights, rather B than for earthly men. And to grace it the more translated his imperiall feat thither, and called it Noua Roma, or New Rome; and all that pleathnt part of Thracia along it the fea coast of Hellespontus, Propontis, and Bosphorus, by the name of Romania, of the faire Romane colonies there by him planted which name it at this day retaineth, and is of the Turks called Rumilia, and Rum-Ili, that is to fay, the Romane country. But as for the city it felfe, the glorious name of the founder fo prevailed, that the city was & yet is (of him) called Constantingple, or Confiantine his city : and now of the barbifour Turks commonly, but corruptly, Stamboli. It is (as we faid) built in the forme of a Triangle, whereof the longest side, which runneth from Northeast to Southwest, is on the South side washed with the Propontis; and towards the ending of the point, which is about the seuen towers, is somewhat indented; being com-C monly reputed to be eight miles long. The other fide lieth Bast and West fine miles in length, being washed with the hauen, which is somewhat more than eight miles long before it meet with the fresh water, and about a quarter of a mile broad : on the further side whereof standeth the city of Pera, commonly called Galata, sometimes a colony of the Genowaies. This hauen is very deepe, and by that reason as commodious as deep, bearing ships sul fraught close to the sheare, so that they may discharge their burthens with the least trouble that may be; and is of Strabo called Cornu Bizanty, or the Horne of Bizantium. The third fide of this city towards the Continent lieth almost North and South, fine miles also in length those two fides that lie vpon the fea, and the haven, are intrioned and girt in with a fingle wal, built after the antique maner, with many high towers, which strongly defend and flanke the fathe. With-D out which wals (especially towards the hauen) there lieth a street between them and the shore. But the other side which is the third, and regarderh the maine land (beside the ditch, which is also fenced) is defended with three wals: the first wall standing upon the dirch being bur low and the second not far distant from the first, raised somwhat higher; but the third overlooketh and commandeth both the other; from whence as from an high fortresse both the other wals and all the ditch without may easily be defended. But the two veter wals, with the whole space betwixt them, are now by the Turks but slenderly maintained, lying full of earth and other subbish, even as they were in the time of the Grecians: for cause why they with lesse heart & courage defended the same against their barbarious enemy. In the East part of the city, on that point which in the reign of the Grecians was called the cape of S. Demetrio, distant from Asia E not much more than halfe a mile, stands the Seraglio or palace of the great Turk, containing in it selfe a great part of an hill, enclosed round with a wall, as if it were it selfe a city, in circuit more than two miles : wherein among st other stately buildings, necre vnto the sea standeth a very faire and fumptuous gallery, built for pleasure, with a priny gate well fortified and planted with great ordnance, and other munition, whereby the great Turke at certaine times paffeth, when he is disposed in his gally to take his pleasure vpon the sea, or to passe over the streit unto his houses or gardens of delight, on the other side in Asia. In this great city are also many other most stately and sumptuous buildings, as well of late erected by the Turkish Sulrans, fince they became Lords thereof, as before by the Greeke Emperors amongst all which the Temple of S. Sophia flanding on the East fide of the city for far from the Seraglio (now redu- The magnif-Fi ced unto the form of a Mahom tait Moschy, and whicher the great Turke goeth of tentimes to con Tample of heare service, being indeed but the sanduary of thances only of the great stately and wonder. ful church (built by toffinan the Emperor) is most beauerfulf and authorable. That which flandeth of it now, is both found and very high, built after the fathion of the Pantheon in Rome,

marble and the floore all paued with faire marble alfo. In the middest there is a very great and c large circle, compassed in with high and huge pillars of most excellent marble of divers sotte. and these support a mighty vault that beareth up as many mo pillars aboue, standing afterthe very fame order, and in a downe-right line, almost of the like greatnesse and goodnesse of the marble with the other below : vpon which, aboue the fecond vault in manner of a loouer refleth the great round roofe which couereth all that space of the Church which is compassed with the aforefaid pillars being all enameled and fillited, with the pictures of Saints, after the antient manner of some great Churches in Christendome : but that the Turks, who like nor to have any pictures in their churches, have put out their eies only, as loth to spoile such a rare piece of worke and veterly to deface it. In like maner the wals of the vpper vault are wrought painted, or portraied after the same order, though in some part decaied, by reason of their long to continuance and standing. About this church are eighteene or twenty doores of braffe, right faire and costly, well declaring the magnificence and greatnesse thereof in more antient times, when as it had (as is reported) more than two hundred doores of like making and greatnesse: and befide the hugeneffe of the frame and building it felfe, had also divers faire monasteries and houses of religion joyned vnto it: whereunto belonged fix thousand Priests, whose houses and lodgings extended almost all ouer the place where now the Turks palate standeth, and the other places adjoyning to this great church, which is now their chiefe Moschy, and called by them by the proper name of S. Sophia, because they hold even as we doe, the wisedome of God to be incomprehensible and infinit. The next in magnificence ynto this, is the Moschy of Solyman, wherin he lieth buried, and his welbeloued wife the faire Roxolana: a worke well befee. I ming the majesty of so mighty a Monarch. There are beside these also many other faire Moschies, Seraglioes for the Turke his wives and concubins, Bezastanes or Burses for merchante Obeliskes, Bathes, and other publike edifices and buildings of great majefty and flate, all well worth the beholding : wherin confifteth all the beauty of this fo antient and renowned a city; far valike to that it was in the time of the first Greeke Emperors, and before it was spoiled by The fugality the Latins. For the Turks privat houses in this so great and imperiall a city, so much renowof the Turki in ned thorow, the world, are for the most part low and base, after the Turkish fashion, built some of wood, tome of stone, and some of vnburnt bricke, laid with clay and dirt, which quickly decaieth again: they after their homely manner (by long custome received) neuer building any thing sumptuously for their own privat vse, but contenting themselves with their simple cot. K tages, how mean foeuer, commonly faying them to be good enough for the short time of their pilgrimage; and yet not sparing for any cost vpon the publike buildings and ornaments of the commonweale, which they build with great majesty and pomp, but specially their Moschies, wherein they excell. Neuerthelesse, there yet are in Constantinople some other houses also built high and comely enough but these befew, and very old, all inhabited by the Christians and lewes, and not by the Turks; but of this enough. And fo agains to our purpose.

Mahomet with his puissant army thus encamped before the city, placing his Asian soldiers on the right hand towards the Bosphorus, his Europeian soldiers on the left hand, toward the hauen; lay himselse with 1 5000 Ianizaries and other soldiers of the court, in the middle betwixt both, against the heart of the city. On the further fide of the hauen also by Pera, he pla- L ced Zoganu, one of his chiefe councellors, with another part of his army. At which time also Pantologes his admirall came to the fiege, with a fleet of 30 gallies, and 200 other small ships, and a number of other leffer veffels, which were rowed with three, or fine oares apiece, full of Turkish archers, fitter for shew than service, But for desence of the haven, and so of the city on that fide, the Emperour had caused the hauen to be strongly chaind overthwart from the cits to Pera:and within the chaine had orderly placed his strong fleet; the greatest strength where of was scuen great ships of Genoa, with three gallies, and two galliors of Menice, three of Creet, and a few other of the Island of Chios, all which were there, rather by change upon marchants affaires, than that they were provided for any fuch feruice : yet by this means the Turks fleet was shut out of the hauen, and so the city put in good safety on that side,

When Mahomet had thus conveniently encamped his army, and surrounded the city both by fea and land the first cast up great reenches as neere as he possibly could vnto the wals of the city, and raifed mounts in divers places as high as the wals rhemfelues, from whences he will with their shot greatly annoied the defendants. After that, he placed his battery against one of the gates of the city colled Calegaria, and terribly battered the same, specially with one piece of ordnance of a wonderfull greatnesse, which with much difficulty was brought from Hadrianople with an hundred and fifty yoke of oxen, and carried a bullet of an hundred pound weight, made (as his other shot was) of a kind of hard blacke stone brought from the Euxine fea: for as yet (as it feemeth) to foone after the invention of that farall engine, the vie of bullets of mettall was vnknowne. There with continuall battery, he terribly shooke the wals. which although they were very strong, yet were they not able to with stand the fury of so great a battery. The Christians also out of the city discharged their great artillery upon the Turks, but fo sparingly, as if they had bin afraid to shake their owne wals, or loth for good hufbandry, to fpend shot and poulder, which was to the canoniers very sparingly allowed: yet that B which was spent, was so well bestowed, that the Turks were therewith grieuously annoved. The breach also which they had made at the aforesaid gate, was by the desendants with great and dangerous labour again repaired with faggots and earth, and fuch like matter best feruing for that purpole, and to made stronger than before. In which most dangerous worke, they were altogether directed and greatly encouraged by Iustinianus the Genoway, the Emperors

Yet for all this diligence of the Christians, Makomet continued his battery with no leffe confinition! fury than before: but reposing greater hope to finde a way into the city, by the spade and undermined by mattocke, than by battery; he emploied his pioners, whereof he had great flore, to digge a mine: being altogether directed by Christians, skilfull in that kind of worke, whom he had C for that purpose entertained. By whose cunning direction, with the industrous labour of the poore pioners, the mine was brought to fuch perfection, that part of the wall, with one of the frong towers in the fame, was quite undermined, and flood supported, but with such untrusty Raies as the pioners had left for the bearing up thereof till fuch time as it should be by the ryrants appointment blowne vp. This dangerous work was neither perceived, neither yet feared by the Constantinopolitans, as a thing not possible to haue bin done: for a smuch as Bajazet &c. Amurath bad both with great labour before in vaine attempted the fame, at fuch time as they hardly besieged the city. But that which those great kings had with much vaine labor by vnskilfull men made proofe of, Mahomet had now by men of greater device, brought to paffe, although it took not such effect as he wished : for one Io. Grandie, a German captaine, and a main D of great experience, suspecting the matter, had caused a countermine to be made, whereby the labour of the Turks was in good time discovered, and they with fire and sword driven out of the mine, and the same strongly filled vp againe, and so the city for that time delivered of a great feare and danger. Mahomet perceiving that it availed him not to continue his battery against that place, which was againe so strongly repaired, removed the same, and planted it against a tower called Bactatina, necre vnto the gate called Porta-Romana, or, Romane-Gate. Which tower shaken with continual battery, at length fell downe, and filled the ditch before the vtter wall, euen with the ground. But this breach was also speedily and with great course made up again by the defendants, although the Turks did what they could, with consiffuall shorto have driven them from the same. At which time they also erected certains high towers of timber, couered with raw hides to defend the same from fire, out of which they with their flor flew many of the Christians voon the wals, and in making good the aforefaid breach: but Mahomet seeing this valiantnesse of the descendents, openly said, That it was neither the Grecians skill, nor courage, but the Frenchmen that defended the city : for the Turks commonly call all the Christians of the West by the name of Frankes or Brenchmen.

The cheerfulnesse and industry of the Christians in defending and repairing the aforesaid breach, was so great, that the Turkish King began almost to despaire of winning the city; which he could no way affault but on one fide. When as a bad Christian in his camp, put him seuenty of the againe in good hope, by Thewing vnto him a device how to bring a great part of his fleet over Tarks gallons land into the hanen, & therby to affault that part of the city by manet, which the citiens leaf miles our land feared; by which ingenious deuice, and by the greatifirength of men, Zoganen Buffa (to whom (by the duties that charge was committed) brought feuenty of the leffer think & gallion, which all their failes of a Christian) abroad (to the great admiration of those that faw them) vp a great hit, to forthy dry land, out of of conflantino the Bosphorus behind Pera, the space of eight miles, into the handnof Constantinople, which ple. running in betweene the city and Pera, runnerh into the maine Land (as we have faid) about eight miles. The Christian that discourred this deuise vnto the king, is supposed to have less c ned it of the Venetians, who not long before had done the like at the lake of Bennacus, Glad was Mahomet to see so many of his ships and gallies in the hauen, and the Christians with the fight thereof no leffe discouraged. Neuertheleffe, they attempted to have burnt those vessels as they were in launching but the Turks had so commodiously placed certain pieces of great Ordnance for their defence, that the formost of the gallies of the Christians, approching the Turks fleet was prefently funke; wherewith the reft difmaied, returned backe from whence they came. Certaine of the Christians of the lost gally, whom the Turks tooke up swimming in the hauen, were the next day cruelly flaine in the fight of the Christians: in reuenge where of, certaine Turks before taken prisoners into Constantinople, were forthwith brought to the top of the wals, and there in the fight of the campe with like cruelty put to death.

A monde full . Mahomes thus possessed of the hauen shortly after caused a wonderfull bridge to be made bride made by quite ouer the hauen, from Zog anus his campe which lay by Pera, vnto the wals of Constantithe hauen of nople: which bridge was built with timber and plankes, borne up with small boats and emp. Complantinople ty caske, after a most strange manner, and was in length more than holic a mile; by which bridge his army came ouer the hauen, to affault the city on that fide alfo.

In the meane time, three tall Genoway thips iaded with then and munition from the Island between four of Chios, with one of the Emperours laded with corne from Sicilia, came with a faire winds thips, and the for Constantinople. The Turks great fleet then lying not fav off, within the fight of the came. fer upon them, and after a great fight, wherein an exceeding number of the Turkswere flaine with shot, the gallies boorded the ships : but being much lower, were so far from doing any 1 good, as that the Turks could not well looke out, but they were from about flaine or warm ded. Mahbmet from the shore beholding the vnequall fight, and slaughter of his men, cried out aloud, swearing and blaspheming God, and in great rage rid into the sea so far as he durst and comming backe again rent his clothes, faring with himfelfe like a mad man. The whole army of the Turks beholding the same fight at sea, was filled with like indignation also, but could nothing remedy the matter. The great fleet ashamed in the fight of their King on be our come of fo few ships, did what they might desperatly to enter: but all in vaine; being continu. ally onerwhelmed with shot and stones from aboue, and valiantly beaten downe by the Chris stian fouldiers. At length weary of their losse, they were glad with dishonour to fall offagain, and to get them further off. The report of the losse the Turks sustained in this fight is almost & incredible: some of the Turks fugitiues reported, almost ten thousand Turks to have there perished: but certaine it is, that such was the losse, as filled the whole army with indignation and forrow, many having there loft their kinsemen or friends. Three of these that had made this fight, arrived in fafety at Constantinople, the other was lost. Mahinner upon this ouerthrow conceiued fuch displeasure against Pantogles his Admirall, who in that fight had loft one of his eies, that he neuertheless thrust him out of his office, confiscated his goods, and was hardly by the great Bassacs entreated to spare his life.

Whilest Mahomet thus lay at the fiege of Constantinople, and had thereunto given many great attempts, with more loffe vnto himfelfe than to the defendants, a rumor was raifed in his camp, of great aid that was comming out of Italy by fea, and out of Hungary by land, for the L reliefe of the besieged. This report (although indeed it was not true) with the due consideration on of the danger of the fiege, filled the Turks camp with feare: fo that the foldiers commonly murmured amongst themselves, saying, That to satisfie the ambitious humor of their young king, they were led to fight against impregnable wals and fortresses, against the barroful ture it felfe, without all reason : Whereupon Mahomet entred into confultation with the large great Bassa's his counsellors, Whether it were best for him to continue the siege enor. When Caly Raffa, sometime his tutof, alman of greatest authority among the Turks, both for his long experience and high place, and withali feoretly favouring the difficilled Emperous, after the had with long & grave difeourfe declared the difficulty or rather impossibility of the with fucchile in that prefent war, and confirmed the fame, by producing the examples of Banket M his great grandfurber, and of Apart willbis futher, who had both invaine made proof of the frength against that city:at length concluded, that in his mind it were bold for him to raise his fiege, & todeparebefore he had fultained any further loffe or difgrace but Zogune the feeded Baffa, in great fatior also with Mahomet, and secretly enuying the great for the Buffal per fuaded the K. to proceed in his honorable enterprise affuring him of the good successe there. of and with all the reasons he could deuise, impugned that which Caly Bassa had said. And of the same opinion with Zoganu was also the third Bassa, rather of purposeto crosse Cala Bassa and withall to fit the Kings humor, than for any great hope he had in the good successe of that he fo much defired. Howbeit the speech he & Zoganus delivered, so well agreed with the kings affection, that he resolved to continue the siege; and thereupon gaue full authority to Zogania to appoint a day for a great and generall affault to be given, refoluing at once to gage all his forces voon the winning of the city. Which charge Zog anus gladly took voon him, & with his good liking, appointed the 29 day of May for the general affault, being then the tuefday next following. In the meane time he fent one Ismael, the fon of Alexander Prince of Sinope, embafsador unto the Emperour, to offer him peace : but upon such hard conditions, as were no lesse to be refused than death it selfe. Which thing he did, partly to satisfie the minds of his Turks (who were for most part of opinion, That God will not prosper them in their assaults, except they first make with their enemies some offer of peace, how vnreasonable soeuer it sorceth not) and partly to make proofe what confidence the enemy yet had in himfelf, for the holding out of the siege. But that dishonorable peace so offered, together with the intollerable conditions, was by the emperor honorably refused : who no lesse scared the Turks faith (if he should have accepted therof) than he did the hardnes of the conditions. Three daies before this fatall assault was to be given, the Turks (according to their maner) kept their solemne fast, eating nothing al that day vntil night; and then making the greatest cheere & joy they could denise, and in the winding vp of the same, took their leave one of another, with such kiffing & imbracing as if they should neuer haue met againe. At the same time Mahomes to encourage his soldiers, caused proclamation to be made thorow his camp, That he would freely give all the spoile of the city for three daies vnto his fouldiers, if they could win it : and for confirmation thereof. folemnly swore the Turks great oath, By the immortall God, and by the foure hundred Prophets, by Mahomet, by his fathers soule, by his owne children, and by the sword wherewith he was girt shithfully to performe what socuer he had to them in his proclamation promised.

Whilest these things were in doing, Caly-Baffa disdaining that his counsel was rejected, and the opinion of his aduersaries followed; by secret letters aduertised the Emperour of the day appointed for the generall affault, together with all the preparation made against him:persuan ding him not to be affiaid of them, who were themselves no lesse affraid of him; but carefully to prouide to have all things in readinesse for the desence of his city, and valiantly to withstand the rash and last attempt of his enemies.

This wofull Emperour had already done what he could to the vetermost of his power for The chique of defence of the city all the time of the fiege: but such was the disloyalty of the citizens his Conflantinopie fubjects, that many times they could hardly be drawne from their private trades and occupa-without coulf tions, vnto the wals to withstand the enemy, foolishly affirming, That it was to no purpose for the Emptrour. them to fight against the Turks at the breaches, and to starue for food at home in their houfes. For which cause, the Emperor commanded a view to be taken of all the corne in the city (which then began to grow very fearce;)but vpon diligent fearch made, such store was found in many mens hands, (which was by them either altogether kept in to fel afterwards at vnreafonable prifes, or els fo sparingly vetered, as if they had none to spare) as that it appeared, the dearth and scarcity which then began to increase, to proceed rather of the couetousnesse of men, than of any true want of graine: this store the Emperour caused to be proportionably divided vnto every family at reasonable prises, according to their spending; and so eased the great murmuring and grudging of the common people for bread. The Grecian mercinary fouldiers alto, regarding more their owne private profit than the publike feruice, refused any longer to go to the wals, than they were fure of their daily pay : which the poore Emperour, Abare Bift otherwise vnable to give them, was glad to convert the church plate and jewels into mony, to for many. content them. For he had many times before with tears, in vaine requested to have borrowed F mony of his concrous subjects, to have bin emploied in defence of the city; but they would fill fweare, that they had it not, as men growne poore for want of trade : which in few daies after, their enemies found in such abundance, that they wondered at their wealth, and derided their folly, that possessing so much, they would be slow so little in defence of themselves and their country. But this had beene their vivall manner of dealing with their Emperours, in that declining state of the empire : as well appeared in the time of the Emperour Baldwood G who for lacke of mony was glad first to sell away many of the goodly ornaments of the city and afterwards to pawne his own fon vnto the Venetian merchants, for mony to maintaine his state, as in the former part of this History is declared.

But to returne againe to the course of our History. The Emperour certainly advertised of the enemies purpole, for the generall affault shortly to be given, first commended the defend of himfelfe and the city to the protection of the almighty, by generall fasting and prairies afterwards appointed enery captaine and commander, to some certaine place of the wall for defence thereof: which was done by the direction of Io. Iustinianus his Generall, in whosever lour the Constantinopolitans had reposed their greatest hope.

But the city being on every fide now beset with the Turks great army, and the defendants H in number but few, for fo great a city (in compasse eight miles) the wals could but stenderly in many places be manned, and especially on both sides toward the sea, where indeed least dam ger was. The greatest strength and best souldiers, were placed for defence of the veter wall where the breach was, and the affault expected by land. Instinianus the Generall himselfe, with three hundred Genowaies well armed, and certaine chosen Greeks, undertooke the defence of that part of the battered wall, neere vnto the Roman gate, where the fall of the tower Ba Quit. na had filled the ditch as is aforefaid : against which place Mahomer himselfe lay encamped with his lanizaries and best men of war. Neere vnto Instinianus lay the Emperor himselfe for defence of another part of the wall: and so other captains orderly with their companies, all along ft the viter wal and because the desendants should have no hope to save their lives, more than their own valour, the Emperor caused all the gates of the inner wall to be fast shurvo; and in this fort they lay all the night, expecting continually when the affault should be given; all which time they might heare great hurly burly and noise in the Turks campe, as they were putting things in readinesse for the assault.

A little before day, the Turks approched the wals, and began the affault, where thor and stones were delivered upon them from the wals as thicke as haile whereof little fell invained by reason of the multitude of the Turks, who pressing fast vnto the wals, could not see in the darke how to defend themselves, but were without number wounded or flain: but these were of the common and worst soldiers, of whom the Turkish King made no more reckoning than to abate the first force of the defendants. Vpon the first appearance of the day, Mahomet game K the figure appointed for the generall affault, wherupon the city was in a moment and at one inflant on every fide most furiously assaulted by the Turks: for Mahomet, the more to distresse the defendants, and the better to fee the forwardnesse of the fouldiers, had before appointed which part of the city every Colonel with his regiment should affaile. Which they valiantly performed, deliuering their arrowes and shot upon the defendants, so thicke, that the light of the day was therewith darkened: others in the mean time couragiously mounting the scaling ladders, and comming even to handy strokes with the defendants voon the wall i where the formost were for most part violently borne forward by them which followed after. On the other fide, the Christians with no leffe courage withstood the Turkish fury, bearing them downe againe with great stones and weighty pieces of timber, and so ouerwhelmed them with L thot, darts, and arrowes, and other hurtfull and deadly deuises from about; that the Turks difmaied with the terrour thereof, were ready to retire. o แล้วได้ต่องอธิฐเมาใช้ต่อประส

Mahomes sceing the great slaughter and discomfiture of his men; fent in fresh supplies of his ethibe affault. Ianizaries and best men of war, whom he had for that purpose referred as his last hope and the fuge: by whose comming on his fainting souldiers were againe encouraged, and the territorial affault began afresh. At which time the barbarous King ceased not to ye all possible mealer to maintaine the affault: by name calling upon this and that captainer promiting unto fome whom he saw forward, golden mountaines; and vnto others in whom he saw any signe of come ardile, threatning most terrible death: by which meanes the affault became most dreadfull? death there raging in the middest of many thousands. And albeit that the Turks lay derator M heapes upon the ground, yet other fresh men pressed on still in their places, over their dead to dies, and with divers event either flew, or were flaine by their enemies and continuene with

In this fo terrible a conflict, it chanced Infinianus the Generall to Bewounded in the aime; who losing much bloud, cowardly withdrew himselfe from the place of his charge, not the

A uing any to supply his roome, and so got into the city by the gate called Romana, which he had caused to be opened in the inner wall: pretending the cause of his departure to be for the binding vp of his wound, but being indeed a man now altogether discouraged.

first Emperour of the Turks.

The foldiers there prefent, dismaied with the departure of their Generall, and fore charged The Christians by the Ianizaries, for looke their stations, and in haste fled to the same gate wherby Iustinianus mais. was entered; with the fight whereof, the other fouldiers difmaied, ran thither by heaps alfo. But whilest they violently striue, all together to get in at once, they so wedged one another in the entrance of the gate, that few of so great a multitude got in : in which so great a presse and confusion of mindes, 800 persons were there by them that sollowed, trodden under foot, or thrust to death. The Emperor himself, for safegard of his life flying with the rest, in that presse as a man not regarded, miferably ended his daies, together with the Greeke empire. His dead body was shortly after found by the Torks among the slaine, and knowne by his rich apparel; whose head being cut off, was forthwith presented to the Turkish tyrant; by whose commandement it was afterward thrust youn the point of a lance, and in great derision carried about as a trophy of his victory, first in the campe, and afterwards up and downe the city.

The Turks encouraged with the flight of the Christians, presently advanced their ensignes confiantinople vpon the top of the vttermost wall, crying victory; and by the breach entered as if it had been win by the a great floud, which having once found a breach in the banke overfloweth, and beareth down all before it: fo the Turks when they had won the vtter wal, entered the city by the same gate that was opened for Iustinianus, and by a breach which they had before made with their great artillery; and without mercy cutting in pieces all that came in their way, without further refistance became lords of that most famous and imperial city. Some few there were of the Christians, who preferring death before the Turkish slauery, with their swords in their hands fold their liues deare vnto their enemies: among it whom, the two brethren Paulus and Troilus Bochiardi Italians, with Theophilus Palaologus a Greeke, and Ioannes Stiavus a Dalmatian, for their great valour and courage, deferue to be had in eternall remembrance; who after they had like lions made flaughter of their enemies, died in the midft of them, embrued with their bloud. rather oppressed by multitude, than by true valour ouercome. In this fury of the Barbarians, perished many thousands of men, women, and children, without respect of age, sex, or condition. Many for fafegard of their lives, fled into the Temple of Sophia where they were all with-D out pitty flain, except some few reserved by the barbarous victors, to purposes more grieuous than death it felfe. The rich and beautifull ornaments and jewels of that most sumptuous and magnificent Church (the flately building of Iustinianus the Emperor) were in the turning of a hand, pluckt down and carried away by the Turks; and the Church it felfe built for God ro be honored in for the present converted into a stable for their horses, or a place for the execution of their abhominable and unspeakeable filthinesse: the Image of the crucifix was also by them taken downe, and a Turks cap put vpon the head thereof, and fo fet vp and shot at with their arrows, and afterwards in great derifion carried about in their campe, as it had beene in procession, with drums playing before it, railing and spitting at it, and calling it, the God of the Christians. Which I note not so much done in contempt of the Image, as in the despight E of Christ and the Christian religion.

But whilest somewere thus spoiling of the Churches, others were as busie in ransacking of privat houses, where the miserable Christians were enforced to endure in their persons whatfocuer pleased the infolent victors: vnto whom all things were now lawfull that stood with their lust, euery common soldier having power of life and death, at his pleasure to spare or spill. At which time riches were no better than pouerty; and beauty worse than desormity. What tongue were able to expresse the misery of that time ? or the proud insolency of those barbarous conquerours : whereof fo many thousands, every man with greedinesse fitted his owne vnreasonable desire : all which the poore Christians were insorced to endure. But to speake of the hidden treasure, mony, plate, jewels, and other riches their found, passeth credit; F the Turks themselves wondered thereat, and were therewith so enriched, that it is a prouerbe among st them at this day, if any of them grow suddenly rich, to say, He hath beene at the sacking of Constantinople: whereof if some reasonable part had in time beene bestowed vpon desence of the city, the Turkish King had not so easily taken both it and the city. But every man was carefull how to encrease his own privat wealth, few or none regarding the publicke flate, vntill in fine, every man with his privat abundance was wrapped up together with his G needy neighbor in the selfe-same common misery. Yea, the security of the Constantinopoli. tans was such, that being alwaies environed with their mortall enemies, yet had they no care of fortifying of fo much as the inner wall of the city (which for beauty and firength was comparable with thewals of any city in theworld, if it had been kept well repaired) but suffered the officers which had the charge to fee to the fortifying of the city, to conuert the greatest part of the mony into their owne purses: as appeared by Manuel Giagerus, a little before a very poore man; and likewife by Neophitus, who then having that office to fee to the fortification of the city, had in fhort time gathered together feuenty thousand florins, which became alla worthy prey vnto the greedy Turks.

After that the barbarous common foldier had thus by the space of three daies without con. H trolment taken his pleasure in the city (as Mahomet had before promised) and throughly rantackt every corner thereof; they then returned into the camp, with their rich spoiles, driging the poore Christian captives before them, as if they had beene droues of cattell, or flocks of theepia fpectacle no leffe lamentable, than was the facking of the city. It would have grieved any stony heart to have seene the noble gentlewomen and great ladies, with their beautiful children, and many other faire personages, who lately slowed in all worldly wealth and pleafure, to be now become the poore and miserable bondslaues of most base and contemptible rafcals; who were to far from shewing them any pitty, as that they delighted in nothing more than to heape more and more mifery vpon them, making no more reckoning of them than of dogs. There might the parents fee the wofull mifery of their beloued children, and the children of the parents; the husband might fee the shamefull abuse of his wife, and the wife of her husband and generally one friend of another: and yet not able to mourne together (the leaft part of heavy comfort) being in the thraldome of divers cruell masters, by whom they were kept afunder, like in few daies to be dispersed into divers far countries, without hope that they should ever find release, or one see another againe.

The foldiers being all betired into the campe, Mahomet as a proud conquerous, with great transferb his triumph entered into the city of Constantinople, then desolate and void of all Christian inhafeath at Con-maninosity bitants; and thereafter the manner of the Turkish Kings, made a sumptuous & royal seast vnto with the bloud his Bassacs and other great captains: where after he had surcharged himselfe with excesse of of the Grecian meat and drinke, he caused divers of the chiefe Christian captives, both men and women (of K whom many were of the late Emperors line and race) to be in his presence put to death, as he with his Turks fate banqueting; deeming his feast much more stately by such effusion of Christian bloud. Which manner of exceeding cruelty he dayly vsed, until fuch time as he had destroied all the Grecian nobility that was in his power, with the chiefe of the late Constantinopolitan citizens. At which time also divers of the Venetian Senators, with Bajulus their Gouernor, and many rich merchants of Genua and other places of Italy, were in like manner murthered : so that of seuen and forty Senators of Venice which were there taken (whereof most part came thither by chance, bound for other places, but there value kily shut vp) some few found the fauour with exceeding great ransomes to redeeme themselves.

Among & these noblemen thus lamentable executed, was one Lucas Leontares, or Notara, L commonly called Kyr. Lucas, or lord Lucas, but of late great Chancellor of Constantinople, a man of greatest account next vnto the Emperour himselfe: whom the Turkish tyrant seemed greatly to blame, that he being a man in fo great credit with the late Emperor, perfuaded him not in time to have fought for peace vpon any condition, or els to have yeelded vp the city, 14ther than to have run that extreme course of wilfull misery. He to excuse the matter, said, That the late Emperor his master was encouraged to hold out the siege, by the Venetians and citizens of Pera, from whom he received fecret aid:as also by some of the greatest men about his own person: for proofe whereof, he drew out of his bosome the letters which Caly. Bassa had to that purposewritten unto the Emperor, and deliuered them to Mahomet, hoping therby to have found some fauour. But when he had said what he could, the eldest of his sons then living (for M he had lost two elder in the time of the fiege) was cruelly executed before his face, and the you gest reserved for the tyrants lust: and after all this misery, had his own head struck off with the rest appointed for that daies sacrifice. Out of this generall calamity escaped To. Iustinianus the General, who with all speed fled at first to Pera, and from thence to Chios, where in few daies

A after he died, of grief of mind (as was thought) rather than of his wound, being happy if he had honorably before ended his daies upon the wals of Constantinople. Isiodorus also the Cardinall and Legat from the Pope, difguifed in simple apparell, and being of the Turks ynknown, redeemed himself for a small ransom, as if he had bin a man of none account, and so escaped. Whom if Mahomet had known, he had undoubtedly bin made shorter by the head.

The glory of this famous City of Constantinople continued many hundred yeares, commanding a great part of the world; vntil that by civil discord and privat gain it was by little and little so weakned, that the Emperors of later times, for the maintenance of their estate. were glad to rely fomtime voon one, fomtime voon another, yet still holding the state and title of an empire by the space of 1121 years, when as (Gods judgment set apart) wonderful and shamefull it is to consider, how it was by this Turkish King Mahomet so quickely taken, and the Christian empire of the East there vtterly ouerthrown. Which happed on the nine and twentieth day of May, in the year of our Lord 1453. Constantinus Palaologus the son of Helena, and last Christian Emperor, being then slain, when hee had reigned about eight years. Since which time it hath continued the Imperial feat of the Turkish Emperors, and so remaines at

The Potestats and citisens of Pera, otherwise called Galata, a city standing opposit against recayet ded to Constantinople on the other fide of the hauen, & then under the government of the Genoa's, the turks. doubting to run the same course of misery with their neighbors, sent their Orators to Mahomes the same day that Constantinople was taken, offering to him the keyes of their gates, C and so to become his subjects. Of which their offer Mahomet accepted, and fent Zoganus with his regiment to take possession of the city. Who comming thither, according to Milhomet his commandement, there established the Turkish government, confiscated the goods of all such as were fled, and vsed the rest of the citisens which stayed with such insolencie & oppression, as that their mifery was not much leffe than theirs of Constantinople: & because it was doubted that the Genoa's might by fea give aid vnto the citifens, if they should at any time seeke to revolt, he caused all the wals and fortresses of the city which were toward the land, to bee cast down and laid even with the ground. Thus is the fatall period of the Greek empire run, and Mahomet in one day become Lord of the two famous cities of Constantinople and Pera; the one taken by force, the other by composition at which time the misery of Pera was great, D but that of Constantinople instly to be accounted amongst the greatest calamities that ever hapned to any Christian city in the world.

Mahomet had of long time born a fecret grudge against Caly Bassa, sometime his Tutor, for Millomet no. that by his means Amurath his father in the dangerous time of the Hungarian wars had again tably differrefumed vnto himfelf the gouernment of the Turkish kingdom, which he had before refigned powerful cair. vnto him, then but yong. But for a finuch as he was the chief Baffa, and had for many years ru-Baffe. led all things at his pleasure, to the general good liking of the people, during the reign of old Amurath, and was therby grown to be of such wealth, credit, and authoritie, as no man had at any time obtained greater under any of the Othoman Kings; Malomet in the beginning of his reign, before he was well established in his kingdom, durst not take reuenge of that injury (as he deemed it) but yet stil kept it in temembrance, warily diffembling his deep conceined hatred as if he had quite forgot it. Neuertheles fomtime (for all his warineffe) words fel from him, wherby the wary Courtiers (who as curioufly weigh their Princes words, as the cunning Goldsmith doth his finest gold) easily perceived the secret grudge that stuck in his stomack against the Bassa, and therby divined his fall to be at hand. So it happened one day, that as Mahomet was walking in the court he faw a Fox of the Baffa's tied in a chain : which after hec had a while earnestly looked upon, he suddenly brake forth into this speech; Alas poor beast, hast thou no mony to give thy Master to fet thee at liberty? Out of which words curious heads gathered much matter concerning the Kings disposition toward the Bassa. This ominous surmiling of the Courtiers (which oftentimes proueth too true) was not vnknown to the Bassa F himself, but troubled him much. Wherfore to get himself out of the way for a season, more than for any denotion, hee took vpon him to go in pilgrimage to visit the Temple of their great Prophet (as they term him) at Mecha, which among it the Turks is holden for a right religious and meritorious work; hoping that the young Kings displeasure might in time bee mitigated, and his malice asswaged. But Mahomet perceiung the distrust of the Bassa, and wherof it proceeded, feemed to take knowledge therof, and with good words comforted him 6 vo.willing him to be of good cheer and not to mildoubt any thing, neither to regard the vain speech of soolish people, affuring him of his vidoubted favour and the more to put him one of all fuspition, continually sent him rich gifts, and heaped vpon him new honors, as if of all others he had esteemed him most. Vntil that now at the taking of Constantinople, it was dif. concred by Lucas Leontares, that he had intelligence with the late Emperour of Constanting. ple, and his letters produced. For which cause, or as the common report went, for theold grudge that the tyrant bare against him, as also for his great wealth, he was by Mahomets commandement apprehended and caried in bonds to Hadrianople; where after hee had with er. quisit torments bin enforced to confesse where all his treasures lay, he was most cruelly in his extream old age executed. After whose death, his friends and servants (which were many, for H he was a man greatly beloued in the Court) in token of their grief put on mourning apparel fo that in the court appeared a great flew of common forrow: wherwith Mahomet being offen. ded, caufed proclamation to be made, that all fuch as did wear fuch mourning apparel should the next day appear before him; at which time there was not one to be feen about the Court in that heavy attyre, for fear of the tyrants displeasure.

After that Mahome was thus become Lord of the Imperial city of Constantinople, as is aforefaid, and had fully resoluted there to place his Imperial seat, he first repaired the wals and aforesaid, and had fully resoluted there to place his Imperial seat, he first repaired the wals and aforesaid, and had fully resoluted there to place his Imperial seat, he first repaired the wals and dominions, gaute great priviledges and immunities to all such as would dwel at Constantino.

Emprove of the Place, with free liberty to exercise what religion or trade they pleased. Wherby in short time I that great and desolate city was again well peopled, with such as out of divers forcin countries resorted thither; but especially of the Lewish nation, which driven out of other places, came thither in great numbers, and were of the Turks gladly received. So when he had established all things according to his hearts desire, he took vpon him the name and title of an emperor, and is from that time not vnworthily reputed for the first Emperor of the Turks.

Now among many fair virgins taken prifoners by the Turks at the winning of Constantinople, was one Irene a Greek born, of such incomparable beauty and rare perfection both of body & mind, as if nature had in her, to the admiration of the world, labored to shew her greatest skil, so prodigally had she bestowed upon her all the graces that might beautisse & commend that her fo curious a work. This paragon was by him that by chance had taken her, pre- K fented vnto the great Sultan Mahomet himselfe, as a jewell so fit for no mans wearing as his own: by the beauty and fecret vertues wherof, he found himfelf euen vpon the first view nota little mooued. Neuertheles having his head as then ful of troubles, and aboue althings carefull for the affuring of the Imperial city of Constantinople, by him but even then won, he for the present committed her to the charge of his Eunuch, and sent her away, so to be in safety kept vntill his better leisure. But those his troubles ouerblown, and his new conquests wel asfured, he then began forthwith to think of the fair Irene; and for his pleasure sending forher, took in her perfections such delight and contentment, as that in short time hee had changed state with her, she being become the mistres and commander of him so great a Conquerous, and he in nothing more delighted, than in doing her the greatest honor and service he could. Li All the day hee spent with her in discourse, and the night in dalliance: all time spent in her company feemed to him short, and without her nothing pleased: his sierce nature was now by her wel tamed, and his care of arms quite neglected: Mars flept in Venus lap, and now the foldiers might go play. Yea, the very gouernment of his estate and empire seemed to be of him, in comparison of her, little or not at all regarded; the care wherof beeing by him carelelly committed to others, that so he might wholly himself attend upon her, in whom more than in himself the people said he delighted. Such is the power of disordred affections, where reason ruleth not therein. But whilst he thus forgetful of himself, spends in pleasure not some sew daies or months, but even one whole year or two, to the lightning of his credit, and great difcontentment of his subiects in general; the Ianizaries and other soldiers of the court (mende-M firous of imploiment, and grieued to fee him fo given to his affections, and to make no end therof, began at first in secret to murmur therat, and speak hardly of him; and at length (after their infolent maner) spared not openly to fay, That it were wel don to depriue him of his gopernment and state, as voworthy thereof, and to set up one of his sonnes in his stead. Which

A foeeches were now grown for ife, & the discontentment of the men of war so great, that it was not without cause by some of the great Bassa's feared, wherunto this their so great insolencie would grow. But who should tell the tyrant therof, whose frown was in it self death? or who durst take in hand to cure that his sick mind; which distraught with the sweet, but possoned potions of loue, was not likely to liften to any good counsel, were it neuer so wisely giuen:but as a man metamorphosed, to turn his fury vpon him who should presume so who some of but contrary to his good liking) to adulie him. Vnhappy man, whose great estate and sierce nature was not without danger to be medled or tempered with, no not by them who of all others in fogreat a peril ought to have bin therof most carefull, but were now for fear all become silent and dumb. Now among it other great men in the court, was one Mustapha Bassa, a man for his good service (for that he was of a child brought vp with him) of Mahomet greatly favoured; and by him also highly promoted: and he again by him also as his Soueraign no lesse honoured than feared. Who no leffe than the rest grieved to see so great a change in the grand Sultan, of whom they had conceived no small hope of greater matters than were by him as yet performed; and mooued also with the danger threatned vnto him by the discontented Ianizaries and men of war: espying him at convenient leisure to be spoken vnto, and presuming of the former credit he had with him, aduentured thus to breake with him, and to give him warning therof.

How dangerous athing it is for a subject or vasfall, without leave, presumptuously to enter into the secrets of his dread Lord and Soneraign, the wofull examples of others (most mighty Mahomet) have so sufficiently warned me, as that were it not for the dutifull loyaltic I owe unto your greatnesse (far dearer unto me than myne own life) I would not at this time adventure my felfe unto the hafard of your doubtfull acceptance of my faithfull (beech and meaning but with others keep silence, and in fecret mourn together with my heavy thoughts: which if I should in so great a danger both of your life and empire now do. without warning you therof. I were to be accounted unworthy not onely those your great fanours and honours most bountifully on me bestowed; but as a most vile traitor both vnto your state and person, to be of all men detested and abhorred. The life you have of late led ever since the taking of Constantinople. as a man careles of his eftate, and wholly wedded unto his own pleasure, hath given occasion not unto the unigar people only (almaies ready to fay the worst) and souldiers of the Court, the garders of your per-D for but even uniothe greatest Commaunders of your Armies and Empire, to murmure and grudge, 1 darenot say, conspire against you. Tet pardon me (dread Soneraign) if I should so say, for that there is no man which with great disconteniment maruelleth not much to see so great an alteration in your heroicall disposition and nature : wherby you are become far unlike that noble Mahomet, who having ouer thrown the Greek Empire, and taken the great city of Constantinople, promised both unto himself and others, the conquest of Italy and the sacking of Rome, the stately Seat of the antient Roman Conquerors. You have given your (elf over (as they fay) for a spoil and prey unto a poor simple woman your slave and Vassall, who with her beauty and allurements hath so bewitched your understanding and reason, as that you can attend nothing but her feruice and the satisfying of your most passionat and inordinat defires; which how much the more you cherish them, so much the more they torment and vex you. Enter but a little into your li self (I pray you) and compare the life you now lead, with the like time heretofore by you frent in treading Honours steps, and you shall find a notable difference betwixt the one and the other. Had the noble Othoman, the first raiser of your house and family, so given himselfe over unto pleasure, you had not now inhabited the countries of Bithynia and Galatia, with others mo along it the Euxine, by him conquered. Neither had his son Orchanes (the lively image of his father, and follower of his vertues) by leading this kind of life, triumphed oner Lycaonia, Phrygia, and Caria, or extended the bounds of his Empire so far as unto the streits of Hellespontus. What should I speake of Amurath his son, and successor in the Empire? who in person himselfe, first of the Othoman Kings passed ouer into Europ, placed his Imperiall leat at Hadrianople, conquered Thracia, Bulgaria, and Rascia. Yea Bajazet your great grandsather is in his misfortune more than you to be commended, as vanquished in field by mighty Tametlane, with four F hundred thou (and hor smen and six hundred thou sand foot, and not by a filly woman : comforting his mishap with the honor and greatnes of him by whom he was ouercome. Neither may I with silence pas ouer Your worthy grandfather the noble Mahomet, who not contented to have restored the Shaking Empire, conquered also a great part of Macedonia even to the Iconian sea, and carying the terror of his armies over imo Afia, did greater matters against the Caramanians and others. As for your father Amurath (of G worthy memory) I cannot but to my great griefe and forrow speake of him, who by the space of their years made both the sea and earth to quake under his feet, and with strong hand more than once vanqui. thed the Hungarians, and brought under his subjection the Countries of Phocia, Beotia, Atolia, with a areat part of Morea; and to feak of himtruly, brake even the very heart and frength of the Grecians and other his fierce Enemies. Let all these most famous Conquests of your noble Progenitors, whose win thy praises (as eternall trophies of their honour, are dispersed into every corner of the world, awake you out of this heavy lithurgy, wherin you have too long flept, yea, let the remembrance of the conquest of this Imperial City, by you to your immortall glory won, stir you up to greater things : and let it never be said of you, That you were able with your fword to ouercome your greatest enemies, and not with reason to subdue your inordinat affections. Think that your greatest conquest, and suffer not your self, so great a con. H querour, to be led in triumph by your Slave. What availeth it you to have won Conflantinople, and to hanc loft your felfe? Shake off thefe golden festers wherin the wily Greek hath so fast bound you : which at the first though it seem winto you hard and painfull, yet shall you in time disgest it, and make youte think it both good and necessary for your estate. Wean your selfe from your desires, and give rest will your troubled thoughts. Which if you cannot do at once, firine by little and little to do it :pleasure groweth greater by the seldom vse therof, and saciety bringeth loathsomnesse. Moderat your self therfore, and again take up Arms. Your Souldiers if they be not imployed abroad, will to your further trouble let themselues at work at home : Idlenesse maketh them in jolent, and want of Martiall discipline corrupted their manners. Herof proceedeth their intemperat and disloyall speeches, That if you will not lead them forth for the honour and inlargement of the Othoman Empire, as did all your most noble Progenitors,] they will set up another that shall seven one of your own children. And what the common soldier feelibly faith, their great Commanders maliciously purpose: which what a confusion it would bring wore the whole flate of your Empire, together with the danger of your Royall person, I abhor to think. Wherefore it is time it is now high time for you to shew your felf, with the majelty of your presence to represent their tamultuous insolencie before it break further out. Rebellions are by far, more castly preuented, than in their heat appealed. The discontented multitude is a wild beast with many heads, which once inraged, is not a little to be feared, or without danger to be tamed : ye; do you but fhew your felf mafter of your owne affections, and you hall easily master them also. But what is fit for you to do, beseems me not for to say : yea pardonme I befrech you, that I have thus much (contrary perhaps to your good liking) already fayd, prouoked (by what Dinine inspiration I know not) enen halfe against my will to discouer unto you the seen of my beart, and to lay open unto you those things, which others knowing as well as I, do vet for fear keepe the fame from you. And if I have gontoo far, or in anything that I have faid forgot my lelfe, impute the Same (my dread Soueraign) unto the zeal of my love and loyaltie towards you or unto my fidelity so often by you tried, or to our antient education (the ground of your affection toward me) or to what els shall plcale you rather than to my presumption, from which how far I have always bin, I appeal even unto your Majeflies own knowledge.

Hauing thus faid, he fell down at his feet, there to receiue his heavy doom of his fo free speech, if it should be otherwise than wel taken of the angry Sultan: who all this while with great attention and many a stern look, had hearkned vnto all that the Bassa had said; for well he knew it to be all true, and that in so saying hee had but discharged the part of a trusty and faithfull servant, carefull of his masters honor. But yet the beauty of the Greek was still so fixed in his heart, and the pleasure he took in her so great, as that to thinke of the seaving of her, bred in him many a troubled thought. He was at war with himself, as appeared by his often changed countenance: Reason calling vnto him for his honor, and his amorous affections still suggesting vnto him new delights. Thus tossed to and fro as a ship with contrary winds, and withall considering the danger threatned to his estate, if he should longer follow those his pleasures, so much displeasing to his men of war, he resoluted vpon a strange point, where by at once to cut off all those his troubled passions, and withal to strike a terror euten into the shoutest of them that had before condemned him, as vnable to govern his own so passionatas sections. Wherupon with countenance wel declaring his inward discontentment, he sayd wnto the Bassa, yet prostrat at his feet:

Although thou hast vareuerendly spoken, as a stane presuming to enter into the greatest secrets of

A shy Soneraign, not without offence to be of thee once thought upon, and therefore defernest welto die; yet for that thou wast a child, and brought up together with me, and hast cuer bin unto me fast hfull, I at this time pardon thee; and before to morrow the Sungo down, will make it known both to thee, and others of the same opinion with thee, whither I be able to brille mone affections or not. I ake order in the meant time that all the Bassa, and the chief commanders of my men of war be assembled together tomorrow, there to know my, surther pleasure. Where stail you not:

So the Bassabeing departed, he after his wonted manner went in vnto the Greek, and solacing himself all that day & the night following with her, made more of her than ever before : and the more to please her dined with her; commanding, that after dinner shee should be attyred with more fumptuous apparel than euer the had before worne; and for the further gra-B cing of her, to be deckt with many most pretious sewels of inestimable value. Wherunto the poor foul gladly obeyed, little thinking that it was her funerall apparel. Now in the meane time Mustapha (altogether ignorant of the Sultans mind) had as he was commanded, caused all the nobilitie and commanders of the men of war, to be affembled into the great hall; euery man much maruelling what should be the Emperors meaning therin, who had not of long fo publiquely shewed himself. But being thus assembled rogether, and every man according as their minds gaue them, talking dinerly of the matter; behold, the Sultan entred into the palace, holding the fair Greek by the hand; who beside her incomparable beauty, and other the greatest graces of nature, adorned also with all that curiositie could denise, seemed now to the beholders no mortal wight, but some of the stately goddesses, whom Poets in their ex-C tasses describe. Thus comming together into the midst of the hal, and due reuerence don by all there present; he stood still with the fair Lady in his left hand, and so suriously looking round about him, faid vnto them; I under stand of your great discontentment, and that you all murmar and grudge, for that I ouercome with myne affection toward this so fair a paragon, cannot withdraw my felf from her presence : but I would fain know which of you is so temperat, that if hee had in his possession a thing so rare and pretious, so louely and so fair, would not be thrice aduised before he would forgothe same ? Say what you think in the word of a Prince I give you free liberty fo to do. But they all raptwith incredible admiration to fee fo fair a thing, the like whereof they had neuer before beheld, said all with one consent, That he had with greater reason so passed the time with her, than any man had to find fault therwith. Wherunto the barbarous prince answered, Well, but D now I wil make you to understand how far you have bin deceined in me, and that there is no earthly thing that can so much blind my senses, or bereaue me of reason, as not to see and understand what bescemeth my high calling : yea I would you should all know that the honor and conquest of the Othoman kings my no. ble Progenitors is so fixed in my breast, with such a desire in my self to exceed the same, as that nothing but death is able to putit out of my remembrance. And having to faid, prefently with one of his hands catching the fair Greek by the hair of the head, & drawing his falchion with the others at one blow strook off her head, to the great terror of them all ; and having so done, said vnto them, Now by this sudge whether your Emperor is able to bridle his affections or not. And within a while after, meaning to discharge the rest of his choler, caused great preparation to bee made for the conquest of Peloponesus, and besieging of Belgrade.

At the same time that the barbarous Turks tooke the Imperiall City of Constantinople, Thomas and Demetrius Palaologi, brethten to the late unfortunat Emperor Constantinus, gouerned a great part of Peloponesus, one of the most famous provinces of Grecia, which in forme of a leaf of a Plane tree, is almost in maner of an Isle, invitoned with the seas Ionium and Ægeum, which running far into the land on either side therof, separated the same from the rest of Grecia by two great bayes; leaving but a streit neck of land, called of the Grecks Ismor; in bredth about sue miles, which was sometimes by the Grecians, and afterward by the Venetians, sortified by a strong wall, and sine great Casses: neer unto which place stood the great and famous city of Corinth. This province is in length 175 miles, and almost as much in bredth; wherin are contained the countries of Achaia, Messenia, Lacedemonia, Argolica, and Argolica, with many famous great Cities and very goodly hautens, wherin it stree exceedeth all the other provinces of Grecia. These two princes, Thomas and Demetrius, greatly dismaied with their brothers disaster fortune, began now so far to dispair of their own estate, that upon the first brute therof they were about presently to have sleed by sea into Italy. And as it commonly falleth out, that one cuill happeneth not alone; even so at the same time it fortuned, that the Albanians role in arms against the said two Princes their Soueraigns, and under the leading of their rebellious captain Emanuel Catacuzenus, grieuously troubled both these noor Princes. These Albanians were a rough and hardy kind of people, which living after the maner of the rude Scythian people, by feeding of cattel, had of long time planted themselves in Peloponesus differing from the natural Greeks both in their maner of living & language which diversitie was no small cause that they oftentimes spurned, as now, against the government of the Grecian princes. In this extremity the two distressed princes not well knowing which way to turn themselves, sought for peace at Mahomets hands, offering to becom histributaries. Of which their offer he willingly accepted, as an induction to the full conquest of that countrey; and fent Turachan gouernor of Thessalia, one of his greatest men of war, with an army into Peloponesus, to aid those princes against the Albanians; by whose help the ma- H fterful rebels were in short time discomfitted, and the country of Peloponesus quieted; vet so. that it is now become tributary to the Turkish King.

These two princes, Demetrins and Thomas (the last of all the Christian princes that reigned in Peloponesus) having lost their liberty, lived a few yeares as the Turks vassat, paying such tribute as they had before promised. During which time many displeasures arose betwiet the two brothers, being both jelous of their estate, and desirous by all plausible means to win the hearts of their subjects one from another. Wherby it came to passe, that whilst they both defired to become popular, they weakned their own credit, and had not their fubic es at fuch command as best stood with the safety of their state. Neuertheles, as soon as they understood acting spale. that the Christian princes of the West were making great preparation against the Turk and net inductor, that Calixing, the third of that name (then Bishop of Rome) had already put a fleet of Gallies to sea, which did great spoil vpon the borders of the Turks dominions; they vainly perfuading themselves that the Turks would in short time be again driven out of Grecia, resulted to pay any more tribute to the Turkish King, or to keepe league any longer with him. Vpon which occasion Mahomet with a puissant army came down and first besieged Corinth and afterwards entring into Peloponesus, took divers strong towns, and destroyed the Country before him: forcing the two princes for safegard of their lines to fly, the one to Mantinia, and theother into the strong city of Epidaurus, now called Ragusium. The poor Princes destitute of such aid as they expected, and altogether vnable to with fland the power of the mighty Tyrant, began to fue for peace: which he having now spoiled their Country, granted, vpon condition, K that all such places as he had already taken, should be still his own; and also, that the city of Patras, with the Country adjoyning, should be deliuered vnto him; and that for the rest the faid princes should pay vnto him a yearly tribute. Which hard conditions the poor princes, now in danger to lose all, were glad to accept of, wherupon a peace was for that time agains

In his return hee took the City of Athens in his way, which he not long before had taken from Francus Acciavol by composition (by means of Omares the son of Turachan one of his great captains) promifing to give him the country of Beotia with the city of Thebes in lieu therof. This Francus was nephew to Nerius somtime prince of Athens, and had of long time bin brought vp in the Turks court, as one of Mahomets minions, and was of him (as was suppofed) intirely beloued. But when he had received the dukedom of Thebes in exchange for his princely state of Athens, he was shortly after, as if it had bin in great friendship, sent by Mahomet to Zoganus his Lieutenant in Peloponesus: by whom he was at first curteously entertained, but afterwards being about to depart, he was (according as Mahomet had before commanded) uddenly stayed, and when he least feared, cruelly murthered.

About 3 yeares after the peace before concluded betwixt Mahomet and the two brethren, Mahomes perceiving that the Christian kings and princes had combined themselves against him, with a purpose to drive him out of Grecia; thought it now high time, and much for the affurance of his estate, to root out the smal reliques of the Grecian Empire which yet remain Mishometeam. ned in Peloponesus in the aforesaid two Princes of the Imperiall bloud, Thomas and Deme. M michagain in trius: wherunto hee faw a fair occasion presented; forasmuch as those two brethren were at that time at great variance betwixt themselves, neither payd him such tribut as they had before promifed. Herupon he with a strong army came to Corinth, where Arfanes a nobleman of great authority and power in that country, whose fifter Demetring had maried, came to him

A from the prince his brother in law, attended vpon with many gallant Gentlemen his followers of purpose to aid him against the other Prince Thomas, nothing fearing any harm to have bin by the Turk intended against himselse or his brother in law Demetrius, whom they both reckoned as their friend. But when Mahomet was entred into Peloponefus, and come to Tegea, he caused the said Arsanes with all his chiefest followers to be laid hold voon and cast into bonds knowing (as it feemed) no man for friend which might any way hinder his ambitious designes.

Demetrius hearing what was hapned to Arsanes, fled to Sparta, now called Mizithra: whi. Demetrius sub ther Mahomet in few days after came & laid fiege to the city. But the poor prince confidering mits himself to that he must needs at length fall into his hands, went out of the City, and humbly submitted B himself with all that he had into his power. Which so wel pleased the Turkish tyrant, that he curreously received him, comforted him, and promifed in fread of Sparta to give him other lands and possessions of like value elswhere: neuertheles he committed him to fafe custodies and caried him about with him as his prisoner, until he had finished those wars. After he had taken Sparta, he besieged Castria, where he lost divers of his lanizaries; sor which cause when he had taken the City, hee put all the fouldiers therin to the fword, and cut all the Captaines ouerthwart in two pieces. From thence he marched to Leontarium, called in antient time Megalopolis, which he took, with another city called Cardicea, whither they of Leontarium had before conneyed their wines and children as vnto a place of more fafety. There he cruelly put to death all the inhabitants of those Cities, men, women, and children, in number about C fix thousand, of whom he left not one aliue: and yet not so satisfied, he commanded the yery bealts and cattel of those places to be killed. Many cities of Peloponesus, terrified with the dreadfull example of their neighbours, forthwith yeelded themselues; and amongst others, Salvarium a great and strong city of Arcadia, where he caused all the inhabitants, men, women, and children, to the number of ten thousand, to be cast into bonds, looking for nothing but present death: all which he afterwards commanded to be sent Captiues to Constantinople, and with them peopled the suburbs of that City. After that, he by the counsel of Demetrius sent one of his Captains called Iosua, with certain companies of Greek soldiers, vnto the strong city of Epidaurus, to command him in the name of the prince to deliuer vnto him the city, with the princes wife and daughter, which lay there. But the Gouernor truffing vnto the D strength of the city, refused to deliuer the same; yet suffering the Princesse and her daughter to depart out of the city, being willing to go to her husband; whom the Captain having receiued, returned, and presented them vnto Mahomet: by whose commandement they were fent into Beotia, there to attend his return to Constantinople; and an Eunuch appointed to take charge of the yong Lady, who had so warmed Mahomets affection, that he took her afterwards to his wife. -

At this time he also subdued the most part of Achaia and Elis, by Zoganus Bassa his lieutenant: whither he came not long after himself, and laid siege to the city Salmenica, which for lack of water was at length yeelded vnto him : but the caltle was by the space of a whole year aftervaliantly defended against the Turks left to besiege it, by Prince Thom. 15,0f whom Ma. E homet afterwards gaue this commendation, That in the country of Peloponefus he had found many flaues, but neuer a man but him. This valiant Prince feeing the miserable ruine of his country, and the state therof vtterly forlorn; after he had most norably indured a yeares, siege in the castle of Salmenica, got to sea, and so arrived in Italy. Where travelling to Rome, hee was honorably received by Pins feeundus, then Bithop there, who during his life allowed him a large pension for the maintenance of his state. Thus Mahomet having thrust both the Greci- Velopores is an princes out of their dominions, and fubdued al Peloponefus (excepting fuch strong towns int Turit. and castles as bordering upon the sea coast, were yet holden by the Venetians) left Zogamis Baffa his lieutenant to gouern that new conquered province, himself returning with great triumph to Constantinople, carying with him Prince Demetrius, with his wife & daughter, and F many other noble prisoners. But after he was come to Hadrian ople and placed in the Royall seat, he removed the Eunuch from the fair yong lady, and took charge of her himself. As for Demetrius her father, hee gaue to him the City of Anum, with the Custom arising of the salt there made, as a pension for him to live vpon. Thus this most farmous and populous country of Peloponesus sel into the Turkish thraldom about the year of our Lord 1460, seuen years after the taking of Constantinople. Which I have here together set downe, as it is reported 6 by them who had in that time, and in the same countries: omitting of purpose other great occurrents of the fame time (which shall in convenient place be herafter declared) to their tent that the fall of that great Empire, with the common mifery of the delicate Grecians might appear under one view; which otherwise being deliuered by piece, meal, as it did concur with other great accidents, according to the course of the time, would but breed confus. on, and require the Readers great attention.

The Christian Princes, especially such as bordered upon the dominions of the Turkish tyrant, were no lesse terrified than troubled with the subuersion of the Constantinopolitan empire for they faw by the continual preparations of the Turk, that his ambitious defires were rather increased, than in any part satisfied with so great & late victories. Wherfore they with H all carefulnes fortified their frontier towns, and provided all things necessary for defence of themselves, and for repulsing so mighty an enemy. Among the rest, George the old Desporor Prince of Servia (whose dominions of all other lay in most danger of that tempest) speedily mustred his men of war, fortified his strong cities, placed his garisons, and left nothing undon that he thought needfull for defence of his Country: for hee had many times before to his great loffe indured the fury of the Turkish Kings, although hee were joined to them in the bonds of neerest allyance. And having thus politiquely let all things in order at home, in person himself took his journy into Hungary, from thence to craue aid against such time as he thould have need. But the Hungarians, especially Huniades (who then bare greatest sway in that kingdom) having before had fufficient trial of the vncertaintie and light faith of that I aged prince, who had so often fashioned himself according to the occurrents of the time that he was accounted neither right Turk, nor right Christian, refused to promise him any aid, but left him to his own fortunes: wherwith he returned discontented, and ful of indignation. But shortly after he was come home, he died of a hurt received in a skirmish with Michael Zilago. gouernor of Belgrade, whose brother Ladislaus he had but a little before trecherously murdered, as he was trauelling by wagon to Belgrade with his faid brother Michael, who at the fame time hardly escaped. This was the end of the Despot of Servia, when he had lived 90 years. in which time of his long life he had plentifully tafted of both fortunes. A man affuredly of great courage, but of a maruellous viquiet nature by profession a Christian, yet a great friend vnto the Turks, whom he many times stood in great stead:a deep diffembler, and double in all K his dealings, wherby he purchased that credit, that he was not of any of his neighbor Princes whilst he lived either loved or trusted; and after his death of his subjects so detested, that the people of that country even at this day in their Country fongs stil term him the faithles and graceles despot. La larus his yongest son succeeded after him, having deprived both his elder brethren Stephen and George of the gouernment: for Amurath the Turkish King had put out their cies long before, of purpole to make them vnfit for the gouernment of fo great acountry: yet these blind princes found means to fly away from him to Mahomee, carying with them a great masse of mony; and so incited him against Lazarus their brother, that to keep friend-Thip with the tyrant, he was glad to promife him a great yearly tribute. But within a few moneths after, Lazarus died, the last Christian prince that reigned in Servia. After whose death L' great troubles arose in Servia for the soueraignty; the blind brethren still crauing aid of Mahomes, with whom they then lived : and the desolar Widow of Lazarus, puting her selse with her three fons, John, Peter, and Martin, into the protection of the Hungarians; by which means with much trouble she held her state for a season: vntil such time as that the Servians, seeing fmall affurance in that kind of gouernment, and weary of the harms they daily received from Servia related the Turks, yeelded themselves with their country vnto the obedience of the Turkish Sultan Mahomet, who for cuer vnited the fame vnto his empire as a province therof, and fo it remaines at this day.

> Now was Mahomet by the continual course of his victories grown to that height of minde, that he thought no prince able to abide his force, neither any enterprise fo great, which hee M was not of power to bring to passe: wherfore he ceased not on every side continually to vex and trouble the princes whose countries bordered upon his. But aboue others, his heart swelled most against the Hungarians, for that by them his Auncestors had been more troubled, and their state more indangered, than by any or all other the Christian Princes. Where-

A fore he resolved now to take them in hand, which thing hee had from the beginning of his reign greatly defired. And because the city of Belgrade, standing voon the great river of Danubius.was accounted the key of that country, he determined there to begin his wars, and by taking therof to make an entrance into the heart of Hungary. Herupon he leuied a great army of 150000 of his best fouldiers; in whom hee reposed such affored trust and confidence. that he accounted the city already as good as taken, and a faire way made into Hungary. So ready are we to promife to our felues the things we carneftly defire. For the better accomplishment of these his designes, he had provided in readines a sleet of 200 ships and gallies. which he fent up the river of Danubius, from Vidina to Belgrade, to the intent that no reliefe or aid should be brought vnto the city out of Hungary, by the great rivers of Danubius and B Sauus, wherupon the city of Belgrade standeth. With this fleet he kept both those rivers so freitly that nothing could be possibly conveyed into the city by water : and not to contented, sent part of his said sleet farther up the river of Danubius, and so landing his souldiers in many places spoiled the countries all alongst the river side. Shortly after he came with all his forces by land, and incamped before the city: wherunto at his first comming hee gaue a most fierce assault, thinking to have taken them unprovided. But finding greater resistance Belgrade bethan he had before imagined, & that the Hungarians were ready to skirmish with them without the walls, he began to proceed more warily, and intrenched his Army, and to provide for the safety therot, by casting up of deep trenches and strong rampiers against the sudden sallies of his enemies : and after, planting his battery, began most furiously to shake the Walls C with his great Artillery. By the fury wherof he ouerthrew a part therof, and laid it flat with the ground: which the defendants with great industry and labor speedily repaired, by casting vpof new fortifications and rampiers, in such fort as it was rather stronger than before. In the mean time Humindes (not to bonamed without the addition of a most worthy Captain) being then Generall for the Hungarians, fent a fleet of ships and gallies well appointed with all warlike prouision, down the river Danubius from Buda, which incountring with the Turks fleet, took 20 fail of them, and so discomfitted the rest, that they were glad to run themfelues aground neer vnto the Kings camp. All which were by Mahomets commandment pre- ouerthrown by fently set on fire, because they should not come into the power of the Hungarians. By this the christians, means the Christians became masters of both the rivers Danubius and Sauus, and so at their D pleasure by water conveyed all things into the City, needfull for the defence therof, Hunia.

des also himself with flue thousand valiant souldiers, and To. Capiffrances a Minorit Frier (by whose persuasion forty thousand voluntary Christians out of Germany, Bohemia, and Hungary, were come to that War) entred into the City that way with their fouldiers and Fol-

Mahomet resolutely set down for the winning of the City, had with continuals batterie made the same at length faultable; and so determined the next day to give a generall assault, appointing which part of the wal euery Colonel with his regiment should affail. But as they were with great diligence and greater stir preparing all things needful for the next daies feruice, it fortuned that Carazias Bassa, Mishomets Lieurenant General in Europ, and his best man carazies Rassa B of war, was by chance flain with a great shot out of the town. With whose death Mahomet was It is. exceedingly troubled, as with an ominous token of the enil which afterward infued vnto him and his whole army. For all that, profecuting his former determination, the next day early in the morning he commanded the affault to be given, and with the dreadfull found of Trumpets, drums, cornets, and other instruments of war, brought on the Ianizaries to the breach; Belgrade of who ascouragious foldiers fiercely affailed the fame, and without any great refiftance entred faulted. both there and in divers other places of the City, reckoning the fame to be now their owne. For Huniades having before stored every corner of the City with his most valiant and expert soldiers, had taken order, that the defendants upon the first charge of the Ianizaries should for sake their stations, and as men discouraged retyre toward the City, of purpose to draw the F fierce enemies faster on to their greater destruction; and vpon a sign given to set vpon them afresh, and to repair to their former places of defence: which was accordingly done, so that as foon as the Ianizaries, with other of the Turks most forward fouldiers, were in great numbers entred, vpon the retyring of the defendants, & the fign before appointed in the city ginen, the desendants, as men quickly changed, turning again, fiercely charged the Turks which were en-

The Trief no- tred contrary to their expectation : and the valiant Huniades, at the fame time iffuing out on C euery side with his most resolute souldiers, so oppressed the Turks, that few of them that were entred escaped with life, but were there in the city either slaine or taken prisoners; and the rest with exceeding slaughter beaten from the wals. Presently after, Huniades in this confusion of the Turks, strengthened with the souldiers that came with Capiftranus the Friar, made a fally out of the towne, and fet you the Turks appointed for the defence of the great ordnance. which was with such resolution performed, that the Turks were glad with great slaughter to for fake their charge, and to leave the ordnance to their enemies.

The Turkish tyrant (ore troubled and thorowly chased with the losse of his great ordnance. couragiously charged the Hungarians afresh, to have recovered the same againe: but was fo valiantly repulfed by Huniades, and fo beaten with the murthering shot out of the city, that H he was glad when he had got him out of the danger thereof into his trenches. Huniades also retiring turned the ordnance he had lately won, vpon the Turks campe, and with the same did them no imali harme.

In this hurle, a great part of the Christian army (which then lay on the other side of Danu. bius) was speedily transported over the river; and making no stay in the city, joyned themsclues with Huniades, then lying without the wals of the city. Who notably strengthned with this new fupply, affailed the Turks trenches, as if he would even prefently have entred their Camp. At which his prelumption the proud Tyrant (neuer before so braued) disdaining, went out of his trenches, & valiantly incountring him, beat him back again to the great ordname: from whence he was again by the Christians driven to his trenches. Which manner 1 of doubtfull and dreadfull fight was on both fides notably maintained untill the day was almost spent: Victory with indifferent wings houering sometime ouer one side, sometime over the other.

In these hot skirmishes and conflicts, Chalanes captain of the lanizaries, with many other valiant men were flain. And Mahomet himselse performing the part as well of a couragious foldier, as of a worthy chieftain, was fo fore wounded under his left pap, that hee was taken up for dead, and carried into his pauilion, to the great discomfort of his whole army. But comming againvnto himfelfe, and confidering that he had in that fiege lost his whole fleet, his great ordnance, with most part of his best soldiers, & yet in no possibility of the town, secretly in the night arose with his army, and in great silence shamefully departed; stil looking behind him when the Hungarians should have pursued him into Servia, or have troubled him vpon his way toward Constantinople. At this siege (besides many of his best Captaines and chief commanders) were flain 40000 of his best soldiers. The losse he there sustained was fo great, & fo fluck in his mind, that cuer after during his life, when he had occasion to speak of that fiege, he would shake his head and figh deeply, & many times wish that he had never feen that city, wherat both he and his father had received fo great dishonour. Many were of opinion, that if Huniades had there had his horsemen on that side of Danubius, to have prefently purfued the fearfull enemy, that the whole Army of the Turks might have there beene ouerthrown. This notable victory was obtained against the Turk the fixt of August, Anno

Shortly after, this most valiant and renowned captain Huniades, worthy of immortal praile, the mest far died of a hurt taken in these wars; or as some others write of the plague, which was then rife in Hungary: who when he felt himselfe in danger of death, desired to receive the Sacrament before his departure, and would in any case (sick as he was) bee carried to the Church to receine the same; saying, It is not fit that the Lord should come to the house of his servant, but the servant rather to go to the house of his Lord and master. He was the first Christian captain that shewed the Turks were to be ouercome; and obtained more great victories against them than any one of the Christian Princes before him. Hee was to that barbarous peoples great terror, and with the spoil of them inriched his country; and now dying, was by the Hungarians honorably buried at Alba Iulia, in S. Stephens Church. His death was greatly lamen- M ted of all good men of that age.

Mahomet the Turkish Emperor, no lesse desirous to extend his Empire with the glory of his name, by sea than by land; shortly after the taking of Constantinople put a great fleet to sca, wherwith he surprised divers Islands in the Ægeum, and hardly besieged the City of the A Rhodes. At which time Caliston the third then Bishop of Rome, aided by the Genoa's (for the grudge they bare against the Turkes for the taking of Pera) put to sea a sleet of 16 tall thips and gallies well appointed, under the conduct of Lodovicus Patriarch of Aquilea, who therwith scoured the seas, and recoursed again from the Turks the Island of Lemnos, with diuers other smal Islands therabout, and incountring with the Turks fleet neer vnto the Island of Rhodes, at a place called the Burrow of S. Paul; discomfitted them, sunk and took divers of their gallies, and forced them to forsake the Rhodes. After which victory at sea, he for the space of three years, with his gallies at his pleasure spoiled the frontiers of the Turks dominions all along it the fea coast of the leffer Asia, and wonderfully terrified the effeminat people of those countries, and so at length returned home, carrying with him many prisoners B and much rich spoil.

After that Mahomes was thus shamefully driven from the siege of Belgrade, and his fleet at feadiscomfitted (as is before declared) hee began with great diligence to make new preparations against the next spring, to subdue the Isles of the Ægeum, especially those which lay neer vitto Peloponesus. But whilst he was busie in those cogitations, in the mean time Embassa. India Embassa. dors from V fun Cassanes the great Persian King arrived at Constantinople, with divers rich finite Milbo presents sent to him from the said King. Where among other things they presented to him met. a pair of playing tables, wherin the men and dice were of great and rich pretious stones of inestimable worth, and the workmanship nothing inserior to the matter: which the Embassadors for oftentation faid that V fun Caffanes found in the treasures of the Persian King, whom C he had but a little before slain and bereft of his kingdom, and had there bin left long before by the mighty conqueror Tamerlane. Together with these presents they delivered their Embassage, the effect wherof was, That those two mighty princes might join and live together in amity. And that wheras David the Emperor of Trapezond had promifed to pay vnto Mahomet a yearly tribute, inforced therunto by George his Lieutenant in Affa; he should not now look for any fuch thing, for a finuch as that empire after the death of the emperor then living, should of right belong vnto V fun. Caffanes in right of his wife, who was the daughter of Caloloannes the elder brother of Dauid the Emperor, then living : and further required him from that time nor to trouble or molest the said Emperour his friend and neer allyance; so should he find him his faithful and kind confederat: otherwife it was (as they faid) in his choice, to D draw upon himself the heavy displeasure of a most mighty enemy. Mahomet before envying at the rifing of the Persian King, and now disdaining such peremptory requests, little differing from proud commands, in great choler dismiss the embassadours with this short answer, That hee would ere long himselfe bee in Asia, to teach V sur Cassames what to request of one greater than him felf. This vnkindnes was the beginning and ground of the mortall Warres which afterwards infued betwixt these two, then the greatest Princes of the East, as shall bee herafter more at large declared. The Embassadors being departed, and Mahomet his sleet of 150 fail ready to put to sea, he altred his former determination for the Islands of the Ægeum (which after the losse of Constantinople had for the most part put themselves under the protection of the Venetians) and commanded his admiral with that fleet to take his course thorow the streits of Bosphorus into the great Euxine sea (now called the Black sea; and so failing along the coast, to come to anchor before Sinope, the chief city of Paphlagonia, there to expect his comming thither with his army by land. This great city of Sinope stands plea- Mahomet infantly vpon a point of the main which runs a great way into the Euxine, somtime the metro- wastib Issue political city of that province; but as then, with Castamona, and all the Country therabout, nope. was vnder the gouernment of Ismael a Mahometan prince, vpon whom Mahomet had now bent his forces, for noother cause than that he was in league with Viun-Cassanus the Persian King. Now with great expedition had Mahomet leuied a strong army, and passing therwith ouer into Afia, was come before he was looked for, to Sinope. If mail feeing himself so suddenly befet both by sea & land in his strongest city, although he wanted nothing needful for his defence, F having in his city four hundred pieces of great artillery, and ten thousand soldiers, yet doubting to be able with that strength to endure the siege, offred to yeeld up the city to Mahomet, with all the rest of his Dominion, vpon condition that hee should freely give him in lieu thereof the City of Philippopolis in Thracia, with the Country thereunto adjoyning. Of which his offer Mahamet accepted: and fo taking possession of Sinope, with the strong city of

mona, and all the rest of the princes territory, fent him away with all his things to Philippo 6 polis, as he had promifed. This is insight was the last of the honourable house of the issendiar. who had long time reigned in Heraclea and Castamona in Pontus. From Sinope he marched on forward with his army to Trapezond. This famous city standeth also ypon the side of the Euxine or black sea in the country of Pontus, where the Emperors of Constantinople had al. waies their deputies whilft that empire flourished & commanded the Bast part of the world as far as Parthia; but after it began again to decline (as all worldly things have but their time) one 1846 (whose father Emperor of Constantinople, the Constantinopolitans had for his cuill government flain) flying to Trapezond, took vpon him the government of that city with the Countries of Pontus and Cappadocia, with many other great prouinces, and was at the first called the King of Trapezond : but after hee was well established in the government. H both he and his successors took upon them the name and title of emperors which they main. tained coually, if not better, than the late Constantinopolitan Emperors, and therfore are of most accounted for Emperors. He that then reigned was called David Comnenus, which most honorable family of the Comment had long time before reigned in Constantinople; and out of the fame were many other great princes descended, who ruled in divers places of Macedo. nia, Epirus, and Grecia. Mahomet comming to Trapezond, layd hard fiege vnto the fame both by fea and land for the space of 30 daies, and burnt the suburbs therof, as he had before at Si. none. The fearfull Emperor diffusied with the prefence of fo mighty an enemy to the fight of fo puiffunt an army offered to yeeld vnto him the city with his whole empire, vpon condition that hee should take his daughter to wife, and deliver vnto him some other province 1 which might yeeld into him fuch yearely profit as might fuffice for the honorable maintenance of his flate. Mahomet perceiving the weaknes of his enemy by his large offers, refused to accept therof, and attempted by force to have taken the city, which not forcing to his defire the matter was again brought to parly where after long debating to and froit was at last agreed vpon, That the Emperor vpon the faith of the Luckish King for his fafe feturn, should in person meet him without the city, if haply so some good attonement might bee made betwixt them. Wherupon the Emperor following the Turks faith before folemnly given for his fafe return as was before agreed, went out of the City to meet him in hope to have made fome good agreement with him. But as foon as he was come out, Mahomet according to the damnable and hellith doctrine of his false prophet (That faith is not to be kept with Chris K stians) presently caused the Emperour to be cast into bonds, and so be detained as prisoner. Which when it was bruted in the city, the citifens veterly discouraged, without further refistance yeelded themselves with the city into his power.

Atahomet now Lord of Trapezond, entring the city, took prisoners the Emperors daughter, with all the rest of his children and kindred, and all such of the Mobility as he found within the city, whom he caused forthwith together with the Emperour, to be sent by sea as it were in triumph to Constantinople. Of the rest of the citisens he chose out so many as he pleased for his own feruice; and appointed eight hundred of the Christian children, in whom appeared most towardlines, to be brought up for Ianizaries: many also of the other/Gitisens were fent Captines to Constantinople: the beautiful women and virgins he divided amongstais L friends and men of war, certain chosen paragons of whom he sent as presents to his sons. Aster he had thus taken his pleasure in the city, and lest none there but the basest of the people; he put a strong garison of his Lanizaries into the castle, and a great garison of common soldiers into the city appointing his Admiral to govern the fame. The rest of the emperors strong Towns, discouraged with the taking of Trapezond, and the miseries therof, in short timesubmitted themselves vnto the Turkish thraldom, wherin they have ever since most milerably is wed. So Mahamet in the space of a few months having reduced that empire into the formet a province, returned in great triumph to Constantinople, when hee had in this expedition fubdued Paphlagonia, Pontus, and a great part of Capadocia, with some other provinces need unto the Euxine sea. When he was come to Constantinople, he sent the Emperor with his M children prisoners to Hadrianople. But afterwards understanding that the Persian Queene, the wife of V fun-Caffan, fought means to get fome one of her vncles children, whom by the power of her husband she might, if it were possible, advance unto her fathers empire; bee fent for Danid the wofull Emperour to Constantinople, and there cruelly caused him, with all his sonnes and kinsmen, to be put to death, and to the vtrermost of his power rooted out all that most honourable family of the Comment, excepting George the Emperors youngest sonne. who at his first comming to Hadrianople turned Turke: whose sister (the emperors daughter) The ruine of Mahomes afterwards tooke to be one of his concubines. This Christian empire was by the Traps road. Turkish tyrant Mahomet thus miferably subuerted and brought to nought in the yeare of our Lord 1461

The years following, which was the yeare 1462, Mahomet having intelligence, that Wladus Mahomet (ex-Dracula, Prince of Valachia, his tributary, was resoluted to cast from him his obedience, and to het to entrap iovne him selfe vnto the Hungarians, his mortall enemies; thought it best to proue if he could of valathia, by policy circumuent him, before he were altogether fallen from him. For which purpose he fent Carobolinus his principall fecretary vnto him to bring him vnto the court, promifing him greater fauors and promotions from the Emperor, than he had as yet at any time injoyed; and by the same trusty messenger, he commanded Chamures Bassa, Gouernour of Bidina and the country lying ouer against Valachia, on the other side of Danubius, to do his vetermost ideuoir for the entrapping of Wladus: promifing him great rewards if he could bring the matter to cffect. Whereupon Chamuzes deuised with the secretary, that when he had done his message to the Prince, and with all his cunning perfuaded him to take that journey vpon him, he should fecretly before hand give notice vnto him of the certain day of his returne backe againe from the Prince:at which time it was like, that Wladus would in courtesie of himselfebring the secretaire well on his way, being a man of fo great acount in the court, or at left wife not refuse o to do, being thereo requested by the secretary at which time the Bassa secretly passing over Danubius with certaine troups of horsemen, and lying close in amouth youn the way, should fuddenly fet vpon the Prince, and so either take him, or else kill him. The plot thus laid, and euery circumstance agreed voon, the secretary held on his way, and comming to the Prince, forced his wit to perfuade him to go to the court : somtime cunningly extolling the great opinion that Mahomet had of his fidelity & valor; and otherwhiles feeding him with the hope of great honors and princely preferments he was to receive at the Emperors hands, But when he had faid what he could he obtained no more of the wary Prince, but good words again, and that he would in courtefie conduct him on his way to the fide of Danubius : whereof the fecretary by speedy messengers gaue Chamuzes intelligence : who secretly passing ouer Danubius with certain troups of horsmen, and riding a good way into the countrey, lay in ambush vpon the way whereby the Prince and the secretary must needs passe: according as was before appointed, the secretary accompanied with the Prince, put himselfe vpon the way, and at the very prefixed time came to the place where Chamazes lay in ambush with his horsemen: who fuddenly arifing, & on every fide affailing the Prince, flew divers of his menbefore they were well aware of his comming. But Wladus being a man of great courage, and better appointed than the Baffa had supposed (for he went alwaies attended vpon with a strong gard of valiant and flout men) foreceived Chamuzes and his Turkes, that he flew many of them, and at length after a hard confflict took him with the rest prisoners: whose hands and feet he caused to be cut off, and their bodies afterwards to be thrust vpon sharp stakes fet fast in the ground, to the E terror of all that faw them: and did the Bassa so much honor as to hang him and the secretary chamages Bassa vpon a gibbet a great deale higher than the other Turks. And not fatisfied with this reuenge, fact the Turks presently gathered his forces, and passing ouer Danubius into the Turks dominions, burnt all ged. the country before him along the sea side, killing man, woman, and child, without mercy: after which great spoyle & slaughter made, he returned again to Valachia. The report of this news being brought to Mahomet, set him in such a choler and rage, that he commanded the great Baffa Mahomet, which first told him thereof to be cruelly whipt which servile punishment in that tyrannicall gouernment hath vsually bin inflicted even upon the greatest Princes of the court, vpon the least displeasure of the tyrants, especially if they be not naturall Turks born; accounting the rest in their anger but as their base and contemptible slaves, as well appeareth F by the wofull end of many even of the greatest of them. But when he understood by most fure aduertisements that all was as the Bassa had before reported, or rather worse, it is not to be in words expressed into what a rage he fell: the spoyle of his country grieued him much, but the shamefull death of the secretary his Embassador, and of ChamuZes the Bassa, tormented his heart, and filled him with indignation & defire of reuenge. Wherfore with all speed possible

he affembled his foldiers and men of war, out of all parts of his dominions to Philippopolist and had in short time raised such an army, as the like he had not at any time imployed since the winning of Constantinople. At the same time also, he sent his Admirall with 25 gallies. and 150 faile of other small vessels by the Euxine, to enter the river Danubius, and there lan ding his men, to ioine his forces with the prince of Podolia: who for a grudge he bare against Whadus, had promifed to and the Turke against him. When all things were now in readings he marched with his army from Philippopolis, and passing ouer Danubius, entred into Valachia, before which time, the Admirall had landed his men, and with the help of the Podolial. inusdeib Vale. had burnt the city of Prailaba, the greatest towne of trade in all Valachia; and was befieging Cebium, called in antient time Lycoflomos: where after they had lien a while and received fome loffe, they left the fiege and departed, the Podolian backe againe into his countrey, and H the Admirall to his fleet.

M. homet being got ouer Danubius, burnt the villages, draue away the cattell, and made ha ttocke of all that came in his way. As for prisoners, he tooke but few for the Valachies believe his comming, had retired their wives and children, and all that were vnfit for wars, either into their ftrong cities, or into the refuge of great and thick woods (whereof there is in that comtrey plenty) or else into the high and rough mountaines where they were in more safety than in any their ftrongest holds and all such as were able to be are armes, followed the Prince who cuer kept the woods and mountaines, still following the Turks army so necreas he possibly could with fafety; and many times cut off fuch as straggled any thing far abroad from the atmy, into the country: yet neuer durst shew himselfe in plaine field, being indeed but a handfull I in comparison of the Turks multitude. Mahomet to small purpose roaming vp and downe the country at his pleasure, staid neuer long in one place; and making no reckoning of such a week enemy as durst never shew himselfe pitcht his tents still in the open plaines, and so lay with his army in great fecurity, not entrenched at all. Wladus by his espials understanding of this the manner of Makomets encamping, came in the dead time of the night, & with all his power furiously assailed that quarter of the Turks camp where the Asian foldiers lay, and slew many of them in their tents; the rest terrified with the suddennesse of the Alarum, sed out of their tents for refuge vnto the Europeian fouldiers: the Prince following them at the heeles, and entring into that quarter of the campalfo, did there great harme, and flruck fuch a generall terror and feare into all the Turks army, that they were even upon the point to have wholly for g faken their tents and betaken themselves to flight. Yea Mahomet himselfe, difmaid with the terror of the night and tumult of his camp, and fearing left the Hungarians had joyned their forces with the Prince; not knowing which way to turne himselfe, had undoubtedly fled, had not Mahomet Baffa, a man of great experience in martiall affairs, perfuading him otherwise, and by generall proclamation made through the camp, That no man should upon paine of death, for lake the place wher in he was encamped, staid the flight, and with much ado enforced them to make head against the prince. Wladus perceiving the Turks now to begin to stand upon their guard, and to make relistance; after great flaughter made, returning, tooke the spoyle of the tents for faken by the Asian souldiers, and upon the approch of the day, again retired with victory into the woods. As foon as it was day, Mahomet appointed Haly Beg with certaine com- L panies of felect fouldiers, to pursue the Valachies: who overtaking part of the Princes army, tooke a thousand of them prisoners, and put the rest to slight: all which prisoners were by the tyrants command, presently put to the sword. From that time Mahamet every night entreched his army, and caused better watch and ward to be kept in every quarter of his camp, than

A moft borrible

As he marched along the country, he came to the place where the Bassa and the Secretary were hanging vpon two high gibbets, and the dismembred Turks, impailed vpon stakes about them: with which fight he was grieuously offended. And passing on farther came to a plaine containing in bredth almost a mile, & in length two miles, set ful of gallows, gibbets, wheels, stakes, and other instruments of terror, death, and torture; all hanging full of the dead carkafes M of men, women, and children, thereupon executed, in number (as was deemed) about twenty thousand. There was to be seen the father, with his wife, children, and whole family, hanging together upon one gallowes; and the bodies of sucking babes, sticking upon sharp stakes, others with all their limbs broken upon wheels, with many other strange & horrible kinds of

A death: fo that a man would have thought, that all the torments the Poets feigne to be in hel, had bin there put in execution. All these were such as the notable, but cruell prince, jealous of his estate, had either for iust desert, or some probable suspition, put to death; and with their goods rewarded his fouldiers:whole cruel manner was, together with the offender to execute the whole family, yea sometimes the whole kindted. Mahamet, although he was by nature of a fierce and cruell disposition, wondred to see so strange a spectacle of extreme cruelty: yet faid no more but that Wladus knew how to have his fubie cas at command. After that, Mahomet I wo thousand fent tolephus, one of his greatest Captaines, to skirmish with the Valachies, who was by them of the Valachies and was by them of the fairs. put to the worse: but by the comming in of Omares the son of Turachan, they were againe in a great skirmish ouerthrowne, and two thousand of their heads brought by the Turks vpon their launces into the Kings camp: for which good service Omares was by the King preferred to be Gouernour of Thessalia.

When Mahomet had thus traced Valachia, and having done what harme he could, faw it to be to no purpose, with such a multitude of men to hunt after his flying enemy, which stilkent the thick woods or rough mountaines: he returned againe to Constantinople, leaving behind him Haly-Beg with part of his army, to profecute that war : and with him Dracula the younger brother of Wladus, who was also called Wladus, as a stale to draw the Valachies into rebellion against the Prince. This Dracula the younger, was of a little youth brought up in Mahomets court, and for his comely feature of him most passionatly affected: which inordinat perturbation so prevailed in the intemperat nature of the lasciulous prince, that he sought first by fair C words and great gifts to corrupt the youth ; and not so prevailing, attempted at last to have forced him; wherewith the noble youth being inraged, drew his rapier, and ftriking at him to haue flain him, grieuously wounded him in the thigh, and therupon fled. Neuerthelesse being drawne backe againe to the court, and pardoned, he was afterwards reconciled to the King, and so became his Ganimede; and was of him long time wonderfully both beloued and honored, and now set up for a stale (as is before said) for the Valachies his countrymen to gaze upon.

It fortuned, that after the departure of the king, divers Valachies came to Haly. Beg the Turkish Generall, to ransome such friends of theirs as had bin taken prisoners in those wars, and were yet by him detained: to whom the younger Dracula by way of discourse declaring the great power of the Turkish Emperour, and as it were lamenting the manifold and endles mi-D series of his native countrey; cunningly imputed the same vnto the disordred government of his cruell brother, as the ground of all their woes : assuring them of most happy and speedy redreffe, if the Valachies, forfaking his fierce brother, would cleaue to him as their foueraigne, in speciall fauour with the great Emperour. Which speech he delivered vnto them with such lively reasons, and in such effectuall termes, that they there present, persuaded by him, and others by them, in short time all, as if it had been by a secret consent, for sooke Wladus the elder brother, and chose Dracula the youngerbrother to be their prince and soueraigne. Who ioyning vnto him the Turks forces, by the consent of Mahomet tooke vpon him the gouernment of that warlike countrey and people; yet holding the same as the Turkish tyrants vasfaile, the readiest way to infidelity. Wladus seeing himselfe thus for saken of all his subjects, and his yon-E ger brother possessed of his dominion, fled into Transiluania, where he was by the appointment of the Hungarian king, apprehended and laid fast in streit prison at Belgrade, for that he had without inft cause (as it was laid to his charge) most cruelly executed divers Hungarians in Valachia:yet such was his fortune, after ten yeares hard imprisonment, to be againe enlarged, and honourably to die in battell against his antient enemies the Turks.

Mahomet returning out of Valachia to Constantinople, sent the same fleet which hee had vsed in his late warres, into the Ægeum, to take in such Islands as being before under the Conflantinopolitan empire, had upon the losse of the city put themselues under the protection of the Venetians; but especially the Isle of Mitylene, called in antient time Lesbos: pretending that Wicholam Catelusim Prince thereof, did harbor the pyrats of Italy and other places; and F also bought of them such prisoners, and other booty, as they continually tooke from the Turkes at fea, or alongst the fea coast, out of many places of his dominions; pretending also the chastising of the said Prince, for that he had by treacherie slaine his eldest brother, and fo vmustly taken upon him the gouernment. His fleet thus set forward, hee himselfewith a small army passed ouer into Asia, and came by land to Possidium a city of Ionia ouer against G Mitylene. From whence he imbarked himselfe ouer the narrow streit; into the Island, whereas. ter he had once landed his army, he in short time ouerran the whole Island, and miserably spoyled the same, leading away all the inhabitants thereof into captiuity; who shortly after were fold at Constantinople like flocks of sheepe, and from thence dispersed into all parts of his dominions. After he had thus harried the countrey, and left nothing therein vn spoyled, he Mitylene besseged the Prince in the city of Mitylene, whereof the Island now taketh name; and with his great ordnance continually battered the same by the space of 27 dayes (in which time many than affaults were also given by the Turks, whereby the defendants were greatly diminished and wasted. The Prince perceiuing himselfe not able long to hold out, offered to yeeld vo the city, with all the strong holds in the Isle, vpon condition that Mahomet should therfore give H vnto him fome other prouince, of like value to the Island : which his offer Mahomet accepted and by folerane oath bound himselfe for performance of that he had promised. Whereunon the Prince came out of the city, and humbled himselfe before him, excusing himselfe for the receiving of the men of war (wherwith he was charged) as done for no other purpose, but that they should forbeare to spoyle his owne country, much subject to their surviviterly denying that he had at any time bought, or shared, any part of such prizes as had by those pyrats by feat or land bin taken from the Turks. With which his excuse, Mahomet seemed to be reasonably well contented, and with good words cheered him vomeuer the leffe as foon as the city, with all the other strong holds in the Isle, were by the Princes meanes deliuered into his hands, he no longer made reckoning of his Turkish faith, but cruelly caused many of the chief citizens of Il Mitylene to be put to death; and three hundred pyrats, whom he found in the city, to be cut in two peeces in the middle, so to die with more paine. And when he had placed convenient garrisons in every strong hold in the Isle, he returned to Constantinople, carrying away with him the Prince, and all the better fort of the inhabitants of Mitylene, that were left aliue, together with all the wealth of that most rich and pleasant Island, leaving it almost desolate, noneremaining therein more than his own garrifons, with a few of the poore and basest people, Maho. met after he was arrived at Constantinople, cast the Prince Nicholam & Luciu his cosin(whose helpe he had before vsed in killing of his elder brother) into close prison : where they seeing themselues every houre in danger of their lives, to win favor in the tyrants fight, wickedly of fered to renounce the Christian Religion, and to turn Turks. Which Mahomes understanding, K caused them both to be richly aparrelled, and with great triumph to be circumcised, and prefently fet at liberty; yet still bearing in minde his old grudge, he shortly after, when they least feared any such matter, clapt them both fast again in prison, and there caused them to be most cruelly put to death. A just reward for their bloudy murthers and Apostacy, who to gaines little longer life, were content to forfake God.

Shortly after it fortuned, that Stephen king of Bosna (inantient time called Massa Superior) who supported by the Turkish Emperor, had wrong fully obtained that kingdome against his owne brethren, refused now to pay such yearely tribute as hee had before promised : for which cause Mahomet with a strong army entred into Bosna, and layd siege voto the City of Dorobiza: which when hee had with much adoe taken, he divided the people thereof into L three parts, one part whereof he gaue as flaues vnto his men of war, another part he fent ynto Constantinople, and the third hee left to inhabit the City. From Dorobizahe marched to Iaziga, now called Iaica, the chiefe city of that kingdome, which after foure moneths fiege was deliuered vnto him by composition: in this city he took the Kings brother and sister, prifoners, with most of the nobility of that kingdome, whom he sent as it were in triumph was Constantinople. The other lesser cities of Bosna sollowing the example of the greaters/telded themselves also. But Mahomet understanding that the King of Bosna had setted himself into the farthest part of his kingdom, sent Mahametes his chief Bassa with his Europeian solding ers to pursue him: wherein the Bassa vsed such diligence, that he had on every side so inclosed him before he was aware, that he could by no means escape, which was before thought a thing. M impossible. So the King for safegard of his life was faine to take the city of Clyssa for his no fuge: where he was so hardly laid to by the Bassa, that seeing no other remedy, he offered to yeeld himself vpon the Bassa's faithfull promise by oath confirmed, that he should be honoraA bly vsed, and not to receive in his person any harme from the Turkish Emperor. Wherestoon the Baffaes oath to the same purpose was with great solemnity taken; and for the more affurance conceived in writing, firmed by the Baffa, and fo delivered to the king : which done, the king came out of the city and yeelded himselfe. The Bassa having thus taken the king prisoner carried him about with him from place to place, and from city to city, vntill he had taken possession of all the kingdome of Bosna; and so returning vnto his master, presented vnto him the captine king: who was not a little offended with him, for that he had vnto him fo farreen. gaged his Turkish faith. But when the poore King thought to have departed not greatly fearing further harm, he was suddenly sent for by Mahomet: at which time, he doubting the worst. carried with him in his hand the writing wherin the Bassacs oath for his safety was comprised: neuerthelesse, the faithles tyrant, without any regard therof, or of his faith therein given, caused him presently to be most cruelly put to death, or as some write to be slaine quicke. Thus was the Christian kingdome of Bosna, subuerted by Mahomet in the yeare 1464 : who after he had at his pleasure disposed thereof, & reduced it to the forme of a Province, to be (as it is at this day) gouerned by one of his Baffaes; in great triumph returned to Constantinopic carrying away with him many a woful Christian captine, and the whole wealth of that kingdome.

Mahomet following the example of his father Amurath, had from the beginning of his reign The great was by one or other of his great Baffaes or expert captains fill maintained war against Scanderbee betwint Maho. the most valiant and fortunat King of Epirus: the greatest part wherof, although it did in the derbig are at course of time concurre with the things before declared, and might by perceneale have been large written C amongst the same in their due time and place inserted, yet I haue of purpose for divers rea. by Marinus Bartellus in 13 fons wholly referred them for this place: first, for that I would not interrupt the course of the books, Devica history before rehearfed, with the particular accidents of this war; and then, for that the grea- & gestis Scan. tell heat of this hereditary war, deliuered as it were from hand to hand, from the father to the debegl, from fon, hapned not long after this time, when as Mahomes having conquered the kingdom of Bof. Bory is taken: na, had furrounded a great part of Scanderbegs dominion; wherein he had respect also vnto the business the Readers case, who may with greater pleasure and content, and lesse paines also, view the same great 450. together, than if it had bin dispersedly scattered and intermedled with the other greater oc. and 1467. currents of the same time. In which discourse I will but briefly touch many things well worthy of a larger treatile. And if forgetting my felfe, I shall in some places happen to stay some D thing longer than the Readers hast would require, yet I hope, that the zeale and loue he beares vnto the worthy memory of most samous Christian Princes, together with the shortnesseof Birleium, slio, the history, in comparison of that which is thereof written in just volumes by others, shall ea. devita & gestie fily excuse a larger discourse than this: But againe to our purpose.

Mahomes in the beginning of his reigne sent embassadors to Scanderbeg, offering him peace. so that he would grant to pay vnto him such yerely tribute as his father Amuraih had in his life time demanded: which embassage the crafty tyrant sentrather to proue what considence Scanderbeg had in himselfe, than for any hope he had to have his demand granted. This dishonorable offered peace Seanderbee scornfully reie Red, and so returned the Embassadors as they came: and prefently upon their departure entred with his horimen into that part of the Turks dominion which bordereth upon Epirus; and when he had wasted the country, returned home laded with the spoyle therof. In reuenge of which despight, Milhomet shortly after sent Amesa one of his belemen of war, with 12000 horsemen into Epirus, to requite Scanderbeg with the like spoyle of his people & country. But Scanderbeg understanding by his espials of the Turks comming, lay close in ambush with 6000 fouldiers upon the great mountaine Modrissa, oner which the Tutks must of necessity take their way and as they were about by night to have pala fed outer that rough and steep mountaine, and were with much difficulty almost got up to the top therof, they were fuddenly charged by Scanderbeg his footmen, who having the advantage of the place, made great flaughter of the Turks, and draue them downe the mountain amaine; at which time their horfes flood them in no flead at all, but were rather unto them an hinderance in that vneuen and trouble fome ground. Now when the Turks were come to the foot of the mountaine, they were in that great feare and diforder againe fiercely affailed on the one fide by Scanderseg, & on the other fide by his nephew, called also Amefa, who before the Turks comming had placed themselves with their horsmen in places of most advantage: so that the Turks hardly bell and forced on enery fide, were in short time overthrown and put to flight.

In this conflict feuen thousand of the Turks were flaine, and Amesa Generall of the Turks are my with divers other captains taken, whom Scanderbeg fent prisoners to Croia: for ioy of this victory at Scanderbegs seturne, great triumph and feathing was made at Croia: during which time, Scanderbeg caused Amesathe Turke, with the rest of the Turkish captains, to be inlarged. to be petakers of that ioy, whereof they against their wils had given the occasion; and after. wards yfed them with all kind of courtefie during the time of their abode. This Amela reque. sted of Scanderbeg, that he might fend a messenger to Constantinople, to certifie Mahomet how the case stood with him and the rest, whom haply he might think to have bin slain in the bar. tell and to procure from him their ranfom: which his request Scanderbeg easily granted, and set down their ransome at thirteene thousand Duckats. The news of this ouerthrow fore grieued the Turkish tyrant, but asterwards when he saw the remainder of his army without their Go H nerall and leaders, having for most part lost their ensignes and armour, and also the messenger was fent from Amela, he fell into fuch a rage that he denied to give any thing at all for his ransome: imputing all the losse to his treachery, folly, or cowardise. Howbeit he was after. wards persuaded by his Bassaes, and other great courtiers, Amesa his friends, to think better of the Generall, of whose faithfulnesse and valor he had of long time had great experience, and also to send his ransome : by denying whereof, he should, (as they faid) discourage his other Generals and captains, who by chance of war might hap to fall into the like danger. By whose persuasion Mahomet sent an Embassador to Scanderbeg, with the ransome demanded, and other great presents also. Vpon receit whereof, Amesa with the other captains were set at liberty, and fent with fafe convoy out of Epirus. All the money fent for the Turks ranfome, Scanderbee di. 1 uided amongst his captains and souldiers.

This late received overthrow filled the proud tyrant with defire of revenge, fo that he determined forthwith to fend another army into Epirus: the leading whereof, divers of his great and most expert captains ambitiously sought for. For Mahomet had promised great rewards and most honourable preferments to him whose hap it should be to vanquish Scanderbeg. A. mong the rest, one Debreas (a man for his forwardnesse and courage, in great favor with his soborfemen to in- ueraigne) by great fuit obtained to have that charge : promiting with exceeding confidencie vnto Makomet, to make a beginning of better successe in his warres of Epirus, than others thither by him before fent: for the accomplishment whereof, he required to have no greater power than was fent the yeare before. But after that Amela was returned to the court, & had with y long discourse set forth the vertues and valor of Scanderbee, with the inuincible courage of his fouldiers, Debreas became more temperate in his speech, and was contented to receive a new fupply; fo that he had under his charge fourteene thousand soldiers: with which army hemanched towards Epirus, and was come to a place called Pologus, where he lay with his army encamped in a plain in great fecutity, fearing no danger, for that he was not as yet in the enemies country, neither as he supposed, neere the enemy. Of all this preparation, and of the comming of Debreas, Scanderbeg had intelligence, and being refolued not to expect the comming of the Turks into Epirus, made choice of fix thousand of his best horsmen, with whom he marched with as much speed as was possible into the enemies country, & came by night vnto the plain where the Turks lay, hoping to have bin vpon them before they were aware, and forth have 0. 1 uerthrowne them, wherein he was much deceived for by the light of the Moone (which then shined all night, he was by the Turks in time descried, yet the suddennes of his approch with the strangenesse of the attempt, exceedingly dismaied the whole army of the Turks. But De breas mindfull of the promise he had made vnto his Lord and Master, with cheerfull wordschcouraged his fouldiers, and prefently fent out certain troups of light horfmen, to receive the Astirmibbe first charge of the enemy, untill he might fet his whole army in order of battell. Berwint these troups, & others fent out by Scanderbeg, began a sharp skirmish; both the armies standing saft, as beholders, carefully expecting the event thereof. But Scanderbeg doubting, that if his foldiers should in his first encounter be put to the worst, it might tend to the great discouraging of the rest of his army; seconded his men with other fresh troups vader the leading of Moses and M Amesa, by whose comming in, the Turks were forthwith beaten back, and chased even to their main battell. In the heat of which chase, Moses forgetting hamselse, had with great dangerso following on too fast, bin inclosed by the Turks, had not this fury bin in good time stayed by Ameja: for which ouerlight, he was afterward blamed by Scanderbeg, that he could not want greater moderation vie his good fortune; commending such forwardnesse in a privat soldier. The bestell bebut not in so great a commander. When Moses and Amesa had thus put the Turks to flight, big & Design. Scanaerbee brought on his whole army, and fiercely affailed the Turks, yet troubled with the discomfiture of their fellowes. Debreas on the other side, with cheerfull speech, and his owner valor. so encouraged his fouldiers, that Scanderbeg was there notably resisted, and his fortune as it were at a stand wortill that Mufachine, with certaine troups of resolute men, drawne out of the left wing of Scanderbegs army, gave fuch a fierce charge vpon the fide of the Turks army, that he brake their ranks, & fore disordered that part of the army: which when Debreas perceived. he withdrew himselfe out of the front of the battell wherein he had valiantly stood against Scanderbee, and came to the place where Musachtus had disordered the battell, and with such R courage cheered up his troubled fouldiers, that his onely presence and valor seemed to be the very life and heart of his whole army. Whilh Debreas was thus bufied against Musachins, Scanderbeg in the meane time with might and maine fill charged the front of the enemies army. who now in the absence of their Generall began to lose their order & to give ground, making no such resistance as before. At which time, Moses forcibly breaking into the midst of them. took one of their enfignes, which he threw back among his followers: wherewith they encouraged so pressed upon their enemies, without regard of danger, that the Turks being therwith discouraged, and their battel disordred, were almost ready to turne their backs and to fly. Debreas feeing all in danger to be loft hafted with all fpeed vnto the place where he faw most perill and did what was possible to have restored the battel, and encouraged his souldiers; where c pressing in among the formost, he was by Scanderbeg himselfe encountred hand to hand, and so by him staine: with whose fall the whole army discouraged, without further resistance fled. Debreas stair, by him flaine: with whole tall the whole army discouraged, without further lettrance hed. because by Sounds by Moses pursuing them on the one fide, and Musachims on the other, with furious hand flew more by Sounds by and by army of the other, with furious hand flew more by Sounds by Marketing on the other, with furious hand flew more by Sounds by Marketing on the other, with furious hand flew more by Sounds by Marketing on the other, with furious hand flew more by Sounds by Marketing on the other, with furious hand flew more by Sounds by Marketing on the other, with furious hand flew more by Sounds by Marketing on the other, with furious hand flew more by Sounds by Marketing on the other, with furious hand flew more by Sounds by Marketing on the other, with furious hand flew more by Sounds by Marketing on the other, with furious hand flew more by Sounds by Marketing on the other, with furious hand flew more by Sounds by Marketing on the other, with furious hand flew more by Sounds by Marketing on the other, with furious hand flew more by Sounds by Marketing on the other, with furious hand flew more by Sounds by Marketing on the other, with furious hand flew more by Sounds by Marketing on the other with furious hand flew more by Marketing on the other with the o in that chase than were slaine in the battell. Of the Turks were slain in this battell 4120, and westbrowne. fome prisoners taken but of the Christians few or none: so that for the good fortune thereof. Scanderbeg accounted it a victory given. All the spoyle taken from the enemy, together with the prisoners, was by Scanderbee equally divided among the foldiers. Vnto Moles he gave Debreas his horse and armor: and vnto Musachius a prisoner, which by his port and behaviour seemed to be a man of some account. This Turke agreed with Musuchius vpon a ransome of 200 A pleasant cov. duckats, and presently upon agreement made, drew forth the money out of a little bag which retirn between he had kept fecretly about him, and offered it to Musachins for his ransome, who receiving the atturbe for his money, told the Turke, that he must prouide another ransome, for as much as that money was ransome. his owne before by law of armes, as taken with his person. The Turk on the other side alleadged for himselfe, the agreement already made, with the paiment of the full sum agreed upon. This controuerfie was brought before Scanderbeg: who with great pleasure heard them both what they could say: Musachius laying hard for another ransome, and the Turke for his liberty vrging the agreement. Who when they had both faid what they could for themselues, Scanderbeg smiling, told them, that they both contented for that which was in right his, & neither of theirs: for the prisoner with the money were both mine (said he) at the first taking of him, fince which time I have given to you Mufachius the prisoner, which I knew, but not the mony which I knew not of neither doth the concealing thereof make it yours (faid he to the Turke) who had by law of arms loft your felfe, together with all that you had about you, After he had thus pleasantly discoursed of the matter, and brought them both in doubt, he awarded to Misfashise the mony he agreed for, and to the Turke his defired liberty: who glad thereof, and hauing also received his horse and armor of the gift of scanderbeg, departed, speaking all the honor he could of so noble a conqueror. After this victory Scanderbeg with great triumph returned againe to Crois.

When Mahomet understood that Debreas was flaine, and his army ouerthrowne, he became exceeding melancholy but after he saw somany of his souldiers returned as had been sufficient to hauerestored a lost battell, he was so highly displeased with that cowardise, as that hee could not endure the fight of them. The death of Debreas grieved none more than the King himselses for the captains generally either envied at his hardinesse, or else hated his insolency. Amesa among the rest took no small pleasure, that his proud successor had taken part of his euill fortune, and so in part eased his former infamy. The great Bassies and men of war seeing their foueraigne fo defirous of revenge, offered to spend their lives in that service : whose for-who for desire of wealth or promotion, might be allured to give some desperar attempta. gainst the life or state of Scanderbeg. Of all others, Moses Golemus of Dibra (a man honourably descended) was most inward with Scanderbeg, and for his prowes and experience in martialas. faires. of all men accounted the best captain in all Epirus, next vnto Scanderbeg himselseihim the crafty tyrant most desired to alienate from Scanderbeg, as fittest to serue his purpose, &cafiest without suspition to be dealt withall, because he commonly lay with a strong garrisonin u Dibra, vpon the very frontiers of Epirus. Wherefore he directed his letters vnto the Gouer. nor of Sfetigrade, commanding him by all means he could possibly deuise to withdraw Moster from Scander beg; and not to spare for any gold or golden promises wherby to allure him:pro. missing also vnto the Gouernor himselse great preferments, if he could win him. Vpon receiv of which letters, the Gouernour began forthwith carefully to deuise, how he might best at tempt the matter he had in charge: where after many deuises, he at last thought upon a shrewd headed fellow, one of the Christians which dwelt in Sfetigrade, whom for that he was a Christians stian he might without suspect vie as an instrument in so dangerous and important an action. This Christian the gouernor called vnto him, and after he had with great gifts and large promiles won him to undertake the matter, he fent him away, fully before armed with plenteous I instructions, full of treason and deceit. When this subtill messenger was come vnto, Moses, and under pretence of great and secret matters of importance, had obtained to speak with himin privat; he after some discourse had of matters well worth the hearing, began at length under the couert of faire glozing words to vtter his paylon: shewing vnto him (as a messenger from ceeding of the the Gouernor) the great and good opinion the Turkish Emperor had of long time conceived of his valour and proweffe: for which cause his heroicall nature could not but honor him, ale though he were his enemy; and therewith also maruell, that hee being a man of that worth, could be contented to be commanded by Scanderbeg, whose state was by him chiefly upholden whereas if he would do wifely, and changing his affection, follow Mahomer, an Emperour of greatest magnificence and power, he should quickly in his Court find such honourable enter; r tainment, as were to be preferred before the state of Scanderbeg : or if the soueraignty of Epirus his natiue countrey did better pleafe him, he might eafily be thereunto advanced by joyning his owne endeuor unto Mahomets great power. It pleased Moses wel to heare his own praifes (a thing incident to haughty minds) and he liked well that he was fo favoured of the Turkith Emperor: but the hope of the kingdome of Epirus, began to work in him new conceits, and moved him more than al the rest: such is the force of ambitious thoughts, that they make a man forget all things faue themselves: so glorious a thing it is to stand in the highest places for all that, Mofes neither in word or countenance made any semblant of liking, or disliking the message. Which the wily messenger taking for a secret consent, and heartily glad that he had bin so well heard; not desiring as then any further answer, craued leave to depart; promis is fing in short time to returne to him againe. After the departure of this messenger many trous bled thoughts began to arise in the mind of Moses; his mirth was changed into melancholy. and the cheerfulnes of his countenance was abated his hauty thoughts were his folisary come panions, and the imagined kingdom the Idol he in secret worshipped; so that in shore sime be feemed to the wifer fort as a man altogether metamorphofed. Some were fo bold, as forto ask the cause of the messengers comming wnto whom he answered, That he was one from whom:

better framed than before. Of all which that was fent, Mofes is reported to have recoined to thing but the worst, which was, the very treason it selfe. And so returned the messenger with answer, that he could not but in good part accept of the Turkish Emperors great fauors; and according to his promise came againe; and for his more credit, in secret brought with him &

A for the rest of his requests, what soeuer he should chance to doe therein, hee should not from thenceforth find him any great enemy: commanding the messenger at his departure, no more to repaire vnto him about that matter, for feare of suspition.

After that, it chanced that Seanderbey came into Dibra, to fee how all things stood there. and to consult with Moses for the besieging of Ssetigrade; which city it grieved him to see in the possession of the Turks. Moses to auert Scanderbeg from that enterprise, wherein he must of force be driven to frew himselfe, told him, That he understood of late by a certaine mesfenger which came to him out of Sfetigrade, that the city was fo well flored by the Turks, of all things necessary for the defence thereof, that it were but lost labour to attempt any thing against the same : wherefore he aduised him rather to besiege Belgrade (not that Belgrade which is scituated upon the river of Danubius, but another of the same name in the confines of Epirus, then holden by the Turks, but distant from Sfetigrade about an hundred and forty miles of the taking whereof, there feemed to be more hope. By this perfuation, Scanderbeo refolued with himselfe to make provision for the belieging of Belgrade. And for as his fouldiers of Epirus alwaies vied to the field, were not fo fit for the belieging of townes, hee thought it good to pray and out of Italy, from his old friend Alphon [in King of Naples, with Scanderbig thought it good to pray and out of Italy, from his old friend Aiphonjus King of Mapies, with whom he had of long time bin acquainted, and vnto him much beholden. Wherefore he fent Alphonjus king two of his noblemen embaffadors vnto him, with certain rich Prefents, and familiar letters of of Naples.

Our fouldiers of Epirus know only how to fight with men, and them to vanguish: with wals they know not how to deale. You Italians (as I under frand) have skill in that kind of fervice, and take pleasure there in wherefore now at this present, I have need of your help and cunning. There be certaine somnes of our enemies in Epirus, yea almost in the heart of our king dome, which eye fore I have of long defired (if it plea-(ed God) to take out of my fight : but being occupied with continual wars, hadno lessure till now, happily to attempt any thing against them. This time I have chosen as most fit, to fatisfy my desire, both for the sea-Conablene feof the time of the yeare, and for that Mahomet spareth me leifure; whose fury I have twice calmed. You understand in few words, what I have need of: all other things are almost in readines, and we only look for your help. Lend me such souldiers as know how to fight after off, I meane harquebusiers and canoniers, for of others we have flore plenty. But happy is Apulia, my Alphonius, under thy government D from whence men fit for all fervices may be drawn, as out of a most plentifull treasury. When foever we have requested men fit for service, either in peace or war, you have beautified both our court and camp. By you the kingdom of Epirus hath bin Comtime Supported with civil policy, and warlske Brength: all Sorts of people, of what condition focuer, yea enery corner of Epirus found th forth thy praife, both at home and abroad. But for mine owne part, I do fo louingly embrace your kindnes, and fo firmly retain the remembrance of your deserts toward me that some time I wish you that fortune (although in so doing I may seem wakind) which (Albe common faying is) producth but getteth not friends : to the intent, that you might by fome more certaine proofe know, how much I am to you denoted.

When Scanderbeg had fent away his Embassadors, he with all diligence began to provide things necessary for the siege of Belgrade: wherein he had purposed also to have vsed the seruice of Moses. But he now in heart a traitor both to his prince and country, and a friend to Mahomet, found many excuses to stay at home in Dibra; alleadging first, that it was to be thought that so soon as the Turkish king should heare of the siege of Belgrade, he would inuade some part of Epirus, thereby to withdraw his enemies from the fiege: and then, that no part of all Epirus lay neerer to the Turks, or more in danger than Dibra; and that therefore he could not do any better feruice, than to fee vnto the fafety of that countrey, long before committed to his charge, and in which also most part of his living lay. These his excuses, proceeding indeed from deep treason, were yet neuerthelesse thought reasonable, and he for his prouident care highly commended : and authority given him with new supplies to augment the garrison vn-F der his command, as time and occasion (hould require.

By that time that Scanderbeg had fully made his preparation for the intended fiege, the embaffadors before fent to Alphonfus, were returned into Epirus, and with them fuch and as Scan- Alphonfus for derbeg had before requested, and a great deale more; For Alphonfus fearing the greatnes of the seanderbeg. Turkish Emperor, in what he could furthered Seanderbeg his actions, reckoning Epirus nota. c boue 60 miles distant from his dominions, to be the strongest wals of his kingdome in App. lia (as not many yeres after, it by profe appeared, when as the Turks having taken Otranto, our all Italy in no small scare.) With this aid healso wrote louing letters to Scanderbeg, thanking him for his prefents, and for the good opinion he had of him, willing him to make as hold of all his things, as of his owne. But when he came to make mention of the foldiers he had for Alphonius, after the manner of his pleasant nature, merily wrote vnto Scanderbeg, That he had fent him Italian fouldiers which could according to his defire, fight well both with menand wals, but better with women; and that therefore the Epirots were best to take heed, that they whose help they required for fight afar off, proued not also good warriours at hand at home in their houses. The great commendation Scanderbeg had given of the King, was by him referred u vnto the excesse of his love, and by the King requited with like.

Scanderbeg be-

Scanderbeg now furnished with all things needful, fet forward, and according to his former determination, came and encamped before Belgrade, with an army of 14000 good fouldiers. & in fhort time had so distressed the city, that the Turks were glad to take truce with him for fixteen dayes, which time expired, they promifed to deliuer the towne, if they were not before relieued. Vpon conclusion of this truce, Scanderbeg encamped himselfe vpon an high hill, neer vnto the city, with three thousand horse, and a thousand soot and appointed Musachins and Tanulius, with the rest of his army, to remove farther off into a large plaine, where they might encamp themselves in a more wholsom and fresh aire, in that hot season of the yeare, during the time of the truce. At which time he appointed also 25 scours to keep continual watchvoon I the top of the highest mountaine, to discouer a far off the comming of the enemy, and to give warning thereof to the camp, by making a fire vpon the mountain: by the negligence of which watch, Scanderbeg received a great overthrow, as hereafter followeth.

The news of the fiege of Belgrade was brought vnto Mahomet, at fuch time as he was ready to have passed into Asia against the Emperour of Trapezond: which great enterprise stewar loth to give over, for the reliefe of Belgrade; and yet to lofe that city vnto Scanderber, gie. ued him much : wherefore he resolued with himselfe so to doe the one, as that he would not altogether neglect the other. And so holding on his intended journy into Asia himselse, with fuch fortune as is aforefaid, he fent Sebalias one of his great Baffacs, with forty thousand bork men to relieue Belgrade, promising him great rewards if hee could bring him Scanderbegei. K ther aliue or dead. This Bassa was of the Turks accounted for a wary captaine, but not so couragious, alwaics more politick than forward: he having received his charge, fet forward with all speed possible, no lesse carefull of that he was commanded, than was Mahomet himselfe, and by great journies came on so fast, that he still prevented the same of his comming; and by his forerunners intercepted, or rather (as some write) corrupted the watch which Scanderbeg had before placed vpon the mountains, so that no figure was given vnto the campe of the chemies, as was expected. By meanes whereof Sebalias with all his power were vpon that part of Seanderbegs army, which lay in the plaines, before they were well aware of his comming: fothat most part of them had not so much leisure as to bridle their horses, or to put on their armor, In which so sudden a feare, Musachius armed himselfe, and put his souldiers in such order, as L the shortnesse of the time and the enemies approch would permit; doubting much, whether it were better to fight or to flie : but seeing no lesse danger in flight than in fight, be resolutely received the enemies charge, as a mandefirous before hand to revenige his own death:and at length (seeing his men slaine about him by heaps, and that courage must needs give place vnto fortune) fiercely attempted to haue broken through the midst of his enemies, and fort have fled to the mountain where Scanderbeg lay : but he was fo befet, that no way was possible tobe made, wherefore refoluing there to die, he desperatly fought to the great admiration of his enemies, vntill that he, with all there with him, were every man flain. Taniflus on the other side, after he had given divers brave attempts to have rescued his cosin Musachius, finding by proofe, that he could do him no more good therin but to become the world companion of his M death, exhorted all therest yet left, for safegard of their lines to flie in which doing, most of them were flaine, for the Baffa's great army fo filled all places thereabout, and fo eagerly purfued the victory, that it was almost impossible any way to escape. mountaine, and seeing the ouerthrow of most part of his army, was about many times to have Scanderbee descended from the hill, to have holpen them in what he might, or els to have there died with settle bit men them:but yet stayed, being thereto earnestly requested by his other most expert captains, and abterorelicus perfuaded, not desperatly to thrust both himselfe and them all into the manifest perill or af- them.

Sebalias having flaine Musachius, and put Tanusius to flight, followed the chase with the greatest part of his army, so that few were left in the great plain, except such as stayed to rifle the dead. Scanderbee taking that opportunity, came down from the hill whereon he stood, with his foure thousand souldiers, and in a moment slew all such Turks as he found in his way; and after following in the taile of the Turks army, cut offa great number of them, and brought a generall feare vpon the whole army: infomuch, that Sebalias perceiving that he gained not for much in chasing of Tanusius, but that he lost more in the rereward of his army, by the pursuit of Scanderber, left the chase, and turned vpon his fierce enemy: where after a sharp skirmish begun, the wary Bassa scaring in the maintaining of that disordred fight to have the victorie wrong out of his hands by Scanderbeg, caused a retrait to be sounded, so to call together his dispersed soldiers, and in better order to encounter his daungerous enemy. Scanderbeg in the meane time having affembled the remainder of his army, valiantly againe encountred the Turks, who thought in this battell to have made an end of the warres in Epirus; and with his owne hand flew Achmat and Barach, two valiant foldiers of the Turks; which like flout champions had before sworne vnto Mahomer the death of Scanderbeg, if they should chance to meet with him. In this last skirmish a great number of the Turks were slaine: but night drawing on. Sebalias retired with his army to a mountaine neere vnto the city, and Scanderbeg likewise to another almost two miles off: and in the dead time of the night rising with his army, returned in safety into Epirus, leaving strong garrisons upon all the streit passages as he went, for feare least the Bassa proud of this victory, should forthwith breake into Epirus. This was the onely and greatest overthrow that Scanderbeg had hitherto received of the Turks: wherin he lost two thousand horse and three thousand soot (most part wherof were of the Italians sent from king scanderbeg file Alphonsus) together with his tents and great artillery, and about eighty of his men taken prisoners. And of the Turks were also slaine three thousand.

The next day Sebaltas perceiving that Scanderbeg was retired, commanded the bodies of the flain Turks to be fought out and buried : but of fuch Christians as they yet found breathing, the Turks cut off their hands and feet, and so left them among the dead. The head of Musachias and of many other the flain Christians, which by their armor or apparrell were thought to be of the better fort, were by the commandement of Sebalias cut off, which because hee could not for the distance of the place, and heat of the weather, without great annoiance carry with him to Constantinople, as the barbarous manner of the Turks is the caused them to be slaine. and stuffed with chaffe, and so to be carried as the vaine trophies of his victory. Afterwards, when he had repaired the battered wals of Belgrade, and put a new supply of seuen hundred fresh soldiers into the city, beside the old garrison therein before, and set all things in good order, he retrined with great triumph to Constantinople. And the more to set out the glory of his victory, at fuch time as he entred the city, he first caused the captive Christians to be led in chains before him, after whom were borne the enfignes taken from the Christians, with the aforesaid heads thrust voon lances, and after them all the spoyle: last of all came Sebalias himfelfe with his foldiers, as great conquerors, and was of the people received with fuch applause and ioy, as if he had conquered some great kingdome. No man was now spoken of but Sebalias, his praises were in enery mans mouth, he was the onely man (as they faid) that did shew that Scanderbeg was to be ouercome, no preferment was now thought too great for him, or reward sufficient to countervaile his desert. The poore Christian captives were afterwards for the most part fould: of the rest, some were aliue thrust upon sharp stakes, some hanged on yron hooks, some otherwise cruelly at the victors pleasure tortured to death.

Moses lately before corrupted by the practise of the Gouernour of Ssetigrade, hearing of the great losse Scanderbeg had received at Belgrade, thought it now a most fit time for his rewolt. But forasmuch as the fact, in the nature of it selfe foule, seemed even to himself the doer thereof, a great deale fouler and more dishonorable, for that he had therein no complices: he thought good, if it were possible, to alure some others into the fellowship of his treason, so to diminish the intamy of himself, in communicating the same with many, and to appeare with G greater credit before the Turkith tyrang than if he should as a contemptible fugitive come al alone. Wherefore upon the bad news from Belgrade, he seemed at the first very pension and much to lament the misfortune of Scanderbeg, and the common mifery of the country of Eni. rus, with many words amplifying the same: and then on the contrary part, setting forth to the vttermost the force and power of the Turkish Emperour Mahomet, thereby to firike agreater terror and distrust into the minds of them with whom he was conversant: but to such as were more secret and inward with him, he discouered the great affection and fauour the great Em. peror Mihomet had of long born him, with the large offer of his gift's & preferments, affuring them of the like alfo, if they would conforme themselves vnto his appetite; seeking hereby so much as he could, to allure them into the participation of his most execrable treason: yet H when he had faid what he could, he found none but a few of the baser fort of the common sol. diers, which were willing to hearken vnto him or to follow him. When Moses saw how much he had laboured, and how little prevailed, fearing to be discouered, he fled by night to Sfeti. grade, accompanied with a few base fellows, and easily obtained the Gouernours passe, with fafe conduct to Constantinople, where he arrived a little before the returne of Sebalias from Belgrade, and was of Mahomet both ioyfully received and honourably entertained.

When Scanderbeg understood that Moses was thus revolted, at the first report theros he was so troubled with the strangues of the fact, that he stood speechles as a man assonied : but after he had paused a while, & vpon surther enquiry had found it out to be true, he according to his heroical disposition, said no more, but that he could easily have Mose sexcused, for that he was I carried away with the violence of such fortune as might have alienated the mind of a right constant man. And when divers of his friends (according to the maner of the world) with hard speeches seemed to aggrauate his offence:he could not abide to heare the same,but commanded them to hold their peace, and no more to vie fuch speeches: wishing that all treason and euill fortune were together with Mofes gon out of Epirus. Vpon this news Scanderbeg accompanied with Amefahis nephew, and a troup of horsmen, presently entred into the countrey of Dibra, and there with all care caused most diligent enquiry to be made, if any could be sound partakers of the conspiracy with Moses. But finding none, he much reioyced in the fidelity of his fubic cts, & having fet al things in good order in that province, returned himfelf to Croia.

Moles remaining in the Turks court, ceased not to folicit Mahomet to proceed in his wars 2. gainst Scander beg, promising to do thering reat matters, even to the spending of his life in that feruice. But the crafty tyrant thinking it not good to trust him too far before he had further triall of him, delaied him off to the next Spring, pretending that the yeare was too farre spent to begin wars. In the mean time he caused all Moses talke, his behaufor and actions, to be diligently observed and noted and oftentimes himselfe discoursed with him concerning the managing of that war: all which he did especially to sound the depth of Moses his thoughts. And Mehomet fen- finding nothing in him but the most affured and vindoubted signes of a mind deuoted to his feruice, and altogether estranged from Scanderbeg: in the beginning of the Spring he commitshouland lettet ted to his charge the leading of fifteene thou and horsemen for the inuading of Epirus, such men as Mojes himselfe should make choice of for a great number he required not for the vanquishing of Scanderbeg. These souldiers although they detested (so few in number) to enter that fatal countrey of Epirus, as men faire warned by other mens harms, yet heartened on by the opinion they had conceived of their new Generall, and the hope they had by his means to find friends in that countrey to joyne with them, were the willinger to go. So Moses furnished with a notable army, and all warlike prouision he could desire for the destruction of his country; and blinded with the imagination of a kingdome, fet forward, & marching through Thracia and Macedonia, forgetting the loyalty due vnto his Soueraigne, and the loue he oughtto haue borne vnto his natiue countrey, came and entred into Dibra.

Scanderbeg by his espials understanding of the comming of Moses, as alsowhat strength be was of, stood not now upon any policy against him who had of long bin priny to all his strate. M gems, but was ready enen at his first entrance with true valour to encounter him. As both the armies flood ranged in order of battell, a messenger came from the Turkes campe, to know of Scanderbeg, if any one of his army durst to proue his fortune hand to hand against one of the Turks, before the beginning of the generall battel. By which messenger answer was returned,

A That the challenge should be accepted. The name of the Turke which made this braue chal. A combat belenge was Ahemaze, a man for his valour and courage of great name among st the Turks. V pon and a christian this proud challenge, Zacharias Groppa, a gentleman of no lesse reputation among the Christians, hastily stept forth before Scanderbey (as if he had beene afraid to have beene prevented by some other) and requested, that he might be the man to abate the Turks pride. Scanderbee cinbracing him, commended his noble mind, and withing him good fortune, gaue him leave to carry with him into the field the first honour of the Christian army. As he was arming himfelfe, his companions and fellowes in armes standing about him, withed vnto him not more courage or strength than he had, but onely the fortune of Manessi. Vpon his armor he put on many rich jewels and ornaments, the allurements or rather the reward of the enemy, if hee could vanquish him. The Turkish champion was no sooner come into the plain betwixt both armies and made thew of himfelfe in great brauery as if his match had yet bin fearcely found. but he faw Zacharias come forth branely mounted, and ready to charge him : to whom Abe. maze calling aloud, faid there would be time enough for him to haften to his death, and therefore requested to talke with him before. So when he had learned of him both his name and place, he propounded such like conditions of the combat, as had bin long before decided by Manesti: whereof Zacharias in no better fort accepted. In few words it was agreed upon betwixt them. That each of them should abide his owne fortune, without any helpe or aid of others and that the victor should have full power over the body & spoile of the vanquished. Thus agreed, they withdrew them elues one a good distance from another, and with their Launces charged, ran together with fuch force, that with the violence of the encounter they brake their Launces one voon the other, and were both horse and man ouerthrowne. But vn. horsed, they nimbly recovered themselves, and with their scimitars siercely assailed the one the other on foot. Fortune it should seem had determined to beautifie that combat with variety, standing a great while indifferent to both. After many sturdy strokes given, without any hurt don, by reason they were so strongly armed, it fortuned that both their swords were beaten out of their hands: then grapling together with their bare hands, as if they had bin two vnarmed wrestlers, after long strugling till they were both almost out of breath, Zacharias ouerthrew the Turke, and lying you him, with his dagger, aboue the gorget thrush him into the throat, and flew him : and forifing up, with the fword that first came to his hands, cut off the D Turks head: at the fight wherof the Christian army gaue a great shout for joy, to the great difcomfiture of the Turks. To be short, Zacharias despoiling the Turk of his armor, and what els he thought good, returned loded with the spoile of his enemy, and presented vnto Scanderbee

the proud Turks head: for which he was of him afterwards most honourably rewarded. Into this place yet recking with the bloud of the last slaine Turke, came Moses, and with a loud voice challenged Scanderbeg hand to hand; thinking indeed that he would not have aduentured his person: but when he saw him ready to come forth, he shamefully forsooke the place, and returned with shame enough into his army.

Presently after, both the armies upon signall given set forward, and so began to joine battel: The batter bewhere at the first onset Scanderbeg so valiantly charged the vauward of the Turks army, that emixi scanderthey were glad to give ground; which Moss perceiving, relegied them with new supplies and begand choses. E they were glad to give ground: which Moses perceiving, releeved them with new supplies, and riding now here, now there, with his presence and courage restored the battell, in many places almost lost. Howbeit, the Epirots encouraged with the beginning of their good fortune, still prevailed vpon their enemies, and after great flaughter made, came to the strength of their battelliwhere Moses had placed most of his best soldiers, as his most assured and last refuge:in this place the Turks sought with exceeding courage, and Moses warily observing in what pare of the battell scanderbez himselfe was, directed his most forces against him, of purpose, if posfibly he might to have staine him; whereof he missed but a little: for a couragious soldier of the Turks by chance encountring with Scanderbeg, with his horsemans staffe bare him quite backeward upon his horse, in such forcible manner, that the Turks for joy gaue a great shout, F thinking verily that he had bin flain: but Scanderbeg recouring himselfe again, & chased with fuch an vowonted difgrace, furiously assailed the same Turke with his sword, and after a great fight flew him. A great part of the Turks army being already ouerthrown by them that had the leading of thewings of Scanderbegs army, divers of the common foldiers thrust the heads of the slaine Turks vpon the points of their speares, in token of victory, to the great astonishment of the Turks; and now joyning themselves with Scanderbeg, more fiercely charged the G maine battell of the Turks than before. Neuertheles, Mofes encouraging his foldiers, did wher was possible for a man to do, and even with his owne valour a great while staid the course of the victory: vntill he feeing the ground about him couered with the dead bodies of his best foldiers; and that there was no remedy but that he must either fly, or there die; turned his backe and fled. In which flight many of the hindermost of the Turks were flaine : as for Mofes him. felfe, he escaped by waies to him well knowne, onely with foure thousand men, the poorere. mainder of fo great an army: the rest, to the number of about eleuen thousand, all choise men were flaine: whereas of the Christians were not past an hundred lost, and about eighty worm. ded. Of all the Turks that were taken, only one was faued, who being a man of good account. had veelded himselfe to Zacharias, and was afterward ransomed; the rest were all by the com. H mon fouldiers, without pitty tortured to death, in reuenge of the cruelty by them shewed at

Moles with the rest of his discomsited army, lay still a while upon the borders of Epirus. and would faine have perfuaded them, after the departure of Scanderbeg; to have followed him againe into Epirus, to haue surprised the garrison left in Dybra, in number not aboue 2000. promiting to bring them vpon the same garrison, before they should be aware of their com. Mifs condens ming. But the Turke having him now in contempt, were about by generall confent to forfake him, and to return home. And so Moses seeing no remedy, returned with them to Constantino. ple, with countenance as heavy as if he had bin a condemned man now carried to the place of execution : and the Turks which had not long before had him in great admiration, expeding that he should have ended the wars in Epirus, began now to difgrace him as fast, and to speake all the cuill of him they could deuise. Yea the tyrant himselfe (although he could blame nothing in the man, but his fortune) was so highly offended with him for the losse of his are my, that he had vindoubtedly put him to most cruell death, had not the great Baffaes, and others neere about him, perfuaded him otherwife, faying, That in fo doing, he should alienace the minds of all others from revolting vnto him, or attempting any great thing for his service, So was he by their mediation pardoned his life; but withall, so difgraced, that he had little or nothing allowed him afterwards for his necessary maintenance: all which despightfull contumelies he outwardly seemed patiently to beare; but was inwardly so tormented with melancholy and griefe, that he could neither eate nor drinke: the remembrance of the foulettes. K fon committed against his Prince and country, was day and night before his cies; and the difgraces of the Turks court inwardly tormented him with intollerable griefe: the fight of the tyrant (who measured all things by the euent) filled his heart with secret indignation; and to return again to his naturall Prince, of whom he had so euill deserved, he was ashamed; sometime the elemency and princely nature of Scanderbeg, whom he knew of old, flow to revenge, and casie to be intreated to forgiue, heartned him on to thinke of returne; and by and by, the consideration of his foule treason ouerwhelmed him with despaire. Thus with contrary thoughts plunged to and fro, tormented with the vnfpeakeable griefs of a troubled confeience, not knowing what to do, purposing now one thing, and by and by another, at last herefolued to for sake the infolent tyrant, and to submit himselfe to the mercy of Scanderbeg; wishing L rather to die in his country for his due desert, than to line with infamy, derided in the Turkes court. Resting himselfe upon this resolution, one evening he got secretly out of the gates of Constantinople, and trauelling all that night and the day following before herested, by long and weary journies, came at last vnto his native country of Dybra. The garison soldiers beholding theirold Gouernor all alone, full of heavinesse, as a man caten up with cares; moved with compassion, and forgetting the euils he had bin the occasion of, received him with many tests and friendly embracings, and brought him to Scanderbeg, who by chance then lay not far off. Moses comming vnto him with his girdle about his necke, in token that he had deserved death (as the manner of that country was) found him walking before his tent, and there with hearly cheere falling downe vpon his knees at his feet, submitted himselfe vnto his mercy, and with M great humility and signes of repentance, craued his most gracious pardon. Which his request Scanderbeg presently granted, and taking him vp by the hand embraced and kissed him, in token he had from his heart forgiuen him : and within a few daies after, caused all such things of his as were before confiscat, to be againe restored vnto him with all such offices and promo-

Turks.

A tions as he had before injoyed and by open proclamation commanded. That from thenceforth no man should either publikely or privatly speake of that Moses had trespassed. Muhamet vn. derstanding that Moses was returned againe into Epirus, and honoured of Scanderbee as in former time, was much grieued thereat, and fumed exceedingly : first, for that he had at all trufted him: and then, that he had fo let him flip out of his hands ; being verify perfuaded that all that Moles had done, was but a finenesse of Scanderbeg to deceive him.

Shortly after that Moles was returned into Epirus, Mahomet by like practife allured vnto him Amela, Scanderbeg his nephew spromifing to make him king of Epirus in his yncles flead. For by that meanes, the crafty tyrant thought it a more easie way to draw the minds of the people of Epirus from Scander beg vnto him descended of the Princes bloud, than to Moles or B to any other stranger he should set up. Amela upon this hope of a kingdome, fled to Constantinople; and because he would eleere the mind of the tyrant from all suspicion and diffrust, he carried with him his wife and children, as the most sure pledges of his sidelity. This Amelu was of flature low, and the feature of his body not fo perfect as might fufficiently expresse the hidden vertues of his mind : he was of courage haughty above meafure, fubrill, and offa pregnanewit; wonderfull painfull, and thereto courreous and bount full (the chiefe means whereby afoiring minds fleale away the flearts of men) what foener he got of himfelfe or had by the gift of his vncle, he divided it among this fouldiers or friends; he was very affable and could notably both couer and diffemble his affections; for which things, he was about all others both beloued and honored of all the people of Epirus, next to Scanderbeg himfelfe. Athis firk C comming to Mahomet, he filled not his eares with great promifes and vaine praises of himself. as had Majes; but only excusing his owne revolt, laboured to persuade him, That he had for just causes left his vncle, with a defire now faithfully to serue him. And to that purpose spake vnto him as followeth: ได้รับอาทัย เดือน เพียง เลือน เล Breed the face When the evenier

If it should please thee (most noble Mahomet), to call to remembrance the old injuries, and anteent amount in difleasures by vis committed against thine imperial Majesty: we might seems now rather to buse come Deeb vuis hither to receive the just guerdon of our evill deserts, than upon any hope of honour ex preferment. For what could have bin done more in difgrace of the Othoman Emply shantbat you have feene long fince done by vs in the most dangerous time of the Hungarian war; rather of a malicious and set purpose, than for that we were just enemies? Whereas in the same perfidious course, I my felfe being a helper and partaker therein (for now no excuse is to be pretended for our doings, more than repentative) your fathers army was betraied at Atorana, and the king dome of Epirou by great treashery wrefled out of your fathers hands , the only cause of so many calamities , and of so much bloudshed . But vaine is this feate, and our Sufficion needles e, with so wife and mercifull a Prince : especially for that my yeres then greene, and youth prone wnto the harme of it felfe, and a mind not resting upon his owne resolutions, deceived me. I beleened mine uncle (for the ignorant beleene many things) and allured with the defire of four aignty (the proper disease of that age) and too much credulous, I forsooke you and followed his promises, but diserction growing with yeares, I have by little and little perceived both the fly perfidious dealing of mine incle, as also that my revolt from you was more hurtfull onto my selfe than to any other. Scandesbeg retowered, E and also enlarged the kingdome of Epirus; but not without my great labour and helpe. I expetted long time, that be should have given me, if not my fathers whole inheritance, yet at least some part thereof, as a small reward of my so great travell and danger. Not long after, he married a wife, and hath beget a young heire, a new successor in his kingdome : wato me for shame of the world, because I should not aliogether leade a private life, he hath assigned a base corner of Epirus; where he enjoying the rest, I might lead a poore and contemptible life. In this case I had much adoe to bridle my affections, and could never disgest that injury : yet the iniquity of the time, with the insolent disposition of the man, compelled me to Smother up my thoughts, and to make faire weather, least finding some suspition, he should craftly bave intrapped me, as he did of late George Strefic his fifters sonne; whom wrong fully charged with fained surmifes, he hath almost deprined of all his possessions. I would willingly have fled wato the feet of your F highnesse, I would gladly have for saken my ingratefull whole with the staines of his infamous king dome ; but that the remembrance of the old rebellion, and many injuries sithence done, did make me afraid whill that now (God I thinke fo appointing it) I came most gladly following your most royall faith and promise. You had scarcely beckned unto me, you had scarcely innited me, having of long intentively waited every occasion but straightway I came with such speed, as if I would have flowne : I lingred not, I expetted not of either Scanderbeg or his enill hap, or your more prosperous successes of late did Moses ; least I mione thereby justly seeme either for feare or regard of some eminent danger, rather to have provided for mine owne lafety than to have embraced your magnificence. Neither have I left any thing for you in metolic. pett, non any cause wherefore I should desire to returne againe into Epirus : here are present most sure bonds of my loue, and faithfull pledges of my loyalty. Behold (worthy Mahomet) you have what focuer is deare una me, yea what locuer nature could give, pleasing unto men in the course of mans life. These hua I brought unto thee, which should with violence have beene taken from an enemy : such pawnes as might asure thee of the faith of a most doubtfull man. More than this, have I brought nothing : for in so great Beed and lecret departure. I could not have regard of may substance. And if I might have had time to have truffed vo my traft at leifure ; yet I know not how, I should have thought it a kinde of bufineffe, to have H brought with me any part of the page exchiques of mineold fortune : effectally sums thee, of all other the richell. Only my fidelity I lay downe before thee, for any thing greater I have not : and if theu defire of me any other bond for more affurance. I refuse not what loquer your highnesse shall appoint for I came not his ther to fee downe covenants and agreements of my felfe, but to recesue them from you. I dare not promife to vanguiff mine uncle, and to subdue Bpirus with an army of fifteen thousand men: the misfortune of Haly Baffa and other your Generals eyea and the late and rare victory of Schalias, with great bloudhed gained, may ferue for examples. In mayou shall neither want diligence nor faithfull feraice: as for other things concerning the cuent of this war, and for the revenge of the injuries by you received you being a Prince of power innincible, and of a most deepe judgement, are not to be aduised by me your wishiful vassaile to the summer of the continuous recognition

A lead of their grant bearing that have Amela honora- ... This speech of denefulcemed vnto Mahomet free from all diffimulation, for a finuch as he by entertained knew most part thereof to be true; and his wife and children brought vnto his presence, confirmed the rest. Wherefore commending his good affee tion, he appointed him honourable entertaintent, referring other matters vnto a further time.

" Whom the approach of the Spling, Mahamet defiring nothing more than to be reuenged you Scanderbeg, entred into confultation with his great Baffacs, concerning the invalion of Epirus: unto which counfell Amela was by Mahomet admitted, and his wicked deuise for the destruction of his country, of all others beit liked. After the matter had been long to and fro debated, it was concluded, That Taac the great Baffa of Constantinople, should with an army of fifteen K thousand be sent against Scanderbeg, and Amela with him, having the charge of five thousand horsemen: and the Bassa to proclaime Amesa King of Epirus; thereby to persuade the Epirots, that Mahomet invaded Epirus rather for the displeasure he bare against Scanderbeg, and for the advancement of Amela, than for any ambitious defire he had to take vnto himselfe that kingdome.

Great was the preparation for this war, and the expectation thereof greater. Flying fame had in short time filled every corner of Epirus with the report of these newes; adding thereunto (as the manner is) a great deale more than was true. Whereupon Scanderbeg without delay fent for his great captaines and men of war into Dybra, where that tempest was first to be expected : and when they were all affembled, he declared vnto them the greatnesse of the dan- L ger, and what he thought thereof himselse as solloweth:

Amongst all other things which God hath left to vex and grieve the minds of men in so great variefletch of scan- ty of worldly affaires, we fee (right worthy fouldiers) thefetwo the greatest. Hope, and Feare. The fift captaines, how a more comfortable thing, and proper to couragious minds (I may not fay) of light beleefeithe other a thing the twist were of more discretion and safety, which although it where defer the defires of men, yet hath it power at length as their com. exceedingly to cure and season the same. Hereupon it is easily to be gathered. That the great chiefetams ming to t pino, of former times have gained more honour and greater victories, by fearing all that was to be feared than others in shew more hardy, which feared nothing. Hercupon the great Carthaginentian captains with to call Q. Fabius (whom the Romans ever thought too flow and too fearefull) his great enemy : but Te- M rentius Varro he called a greater enemy onto his owne country and the people of Rome, than to himselft. But wherefore do I wrong fully call that Feare, which might more trucky be called Discretion, or wholesome policy? Call it as you will, it is not much materiall: but this one thing no man can deny, That thereof

A hathrifen the antient discipline of war, and the old severe government of martiall affaires. This aduised carefulnesse where she had nour sheet Hope it selfe it doth nothing rashly it hath cies before behind and an both fides it weigheth in indifferent ballance things paft, prefent, and to come. You may now perceine to what end my speech tendeth. I would first confer with you, and know your opinions, before I determine any thing of the order of this war , that either I might yeeld unto your opinion, or elfe you (as you have alwaies hisherto done) to mine. You heare now with your eares, what preparation what warlike trout on is dayly made against us. Loe, the great Bassa of Constantinople, all the sloure of Europe, and whole Grenoth of the Othoman Kingdome knocketh at our gates. I want not courage (neither ever did) to pronomy fortune against him, not without your honour : But I thinke it better to verpolicy and mary heed against to great an enemy, than our wonted force and courage. That notable overthiow of Haly-Bassa so B many oveat victories by vs atchieued, our minds by fo many good haps confirmed, per fuade me to thinke that we have both courage and frength to encounter him in plaine battell : but the uncertaine events of war, and fortune never (ufficiently knowne, maketh wife men to forget what u past, and to feare that is to come. It was never proper to any man it was never given by inheritance, alwaies to oucrcome; new occurrents require new correspondents: neither may you, for that you conquered yesterday, prelume to affure your felfe to divide the spoile of your enemies to day. Victory is like a travellour, and goeth hither and this ther, not resting long in a place : and although it be for most part both gotten and kept by courage and discretion, yet oftentimes, when you have most carefully and politikely disposed of all things, the fortune and chance of war have therein a great sway. I was went to require (I remember it well) onely valour and courage in my fouldiers, contemning all external accidents and fortunes haps, if you did promise when C me couragious minds, I affured you of all good hap and prosperous successe : but that losse we received at Belgrade (the remembrance whereof my mind feareth and alwaies abhorreth to thinke upon) hath much changed my former cogitations, and made me to deeme far otherwife of worldly matters, and the unsertainty of fortune. What if that day had beene longer? or Schalias of more courage? might not the State of Epirus have that day bin veterly overthrowne? We were then rather by God preserved, than by any thing that was in our selves : what remained more, but that we should like cowards have recided our selves to have beene bound of the conquerors? The night defended ws, yea, even God himselfe defended ws. who tooke from them both policy and force, and gane us time to breath and escape away. We were then but as a prey, expecting but the comming of the victor: Howbeit he tooke nothing from vs. he carried little or nothing away with him, being too much carefull to keepe the honour he had already gained, and peradn uenture in feare of them of whom he was not without cause most feared. I speake not this of purpose to terrific any of you, but rather to admonish you, and to consult with you, how so great preparations may be frustrated and overthrowne, and some notable vectory by vs atchieued, without the price of our bloud, or the loffe of such things as we have. The number of our enemies is great, and so great, as untill this day wenever faw in Epirus greater, except at fuch times at they came to besiege our vities, and to denoure vs all. Now if we hall meet them in the plaine fields in a fet battell, the event thereof will be doubtfull, many of us must needs fall, many of us must die (I would I might be a falle Prophet) before so great an army will either fly or be ouercome, your victory shall be mingled with teares, and the beauinesse of the conqueror not much unlike the forrow of the conquered. Was it but a few that we loft at Belgrade? is that loffe So to be recovered : What floure of Chivalry, hardly to be in many yeares restored : how many worthy mich E were there flaine? Epirus must needs in short time be unpeopled, if we shall so desperally onely seeke for such glorious victories. Wherefore if we will do well, we mult so fight to day, as that we may fight to morrow also. Neither are our enemies and we in like case. The losse of forey or fifty thousand is lesse unto the Turkesh tyrant, than the losse of an hundred of you is to me. We are in all but few and therefore carefully to be kept: which if we regard not for our owne lakes, yet let us due it for our wives and children, whose welfare and liberty dependeth of our lives : I know the number of you, I know your faces and countenances, and almost every one of your names which maketh me also more carefull of your health. And yet I would not refuse to try the whole fortune of this battell in plaine field, if wee might thereby end all the wars against the Turks for euer, if I were in hope so to finde an end of our lahours and trauels hereafter, I would gladly aduenture my life with yours for the perpetuall quiet and peace of our posterity: but a new enemy alwaies arifeth, and we must still looke for new wars. When this Isaac is gone, another Isaac will ere long come in his place: we shall be alwaics exercised with new warres, and inclosed with new dangers: It is the destiny of Epirsis (as farre as I can sec) and we our selves are borne thereto. Wherefore we must gather our wits together, we must well husband our forces, and so divide our patrimony, as that we may alwaies have formething to content our creditors, when they shall chance to come upon us. Yet final Gad a (no doubt) of the an end also with these exembles a for extremity cannot be of long continuance, and were your felues shall at length take rest : yea, the strong and puissant enemy, wearied with so many waine at tempts, will at talt have enough thereof, and leave off his perpetual hatred against us : then foall it beta you no small pleasure to remember so many labors and dangers past. Thus have I declared water you the commodities and incommodities enfuing the victory in plaine battell. But what if we be wandwiffede If here have we any hope of reliefe left? From whence may we expect helpe? Will the bloudy enemy, in flate with victory expect whilest we againe recover our strength and encounser, him againe with now for ces ? No, he will pursue us and chase us so long as any of us are left : and having over come as will pour out the rest of his fury voon our townes and country, then subject to his injury. But some of you perad. nenture will fay, that they are by policy to be overtaken, and not to be met in open field of which opinion H I also am my selfe; yet happily differ from you in the time of doing the same. Then I thinke it belt to deceine them, when they thinke they cannot be deceined when as they being as it were in possession at a supposed victory, like men overjoyed, shall cast no perill. Now they come even from the gates of Com. Chantinople, full of diftraft, prying into every corner, as men before warned by others harmes and fo man dreadfull examples of their fellowes: Belides that, they have with them my graceleffe nephew and done. flicall foe Amela, who will teach them to forefee and thun fuch fnares as in times past he with us was wont to lay for them. Wherefore we must now tower up untathe height of some notable and strange to. licy, whereby both our countrey may be from danger prescued, and also some great wittery, wishout our owne bloudified (which feldome chanceth) obtained: which to the maintenance of our antient glory and renowne, we have to this day by many most notable victories gained : but time and space, and the sole of the enemy, hall furnish ws with this deuise. Alow (that my discourse may come to the purposed end) first of all, all things subject either to the fury or victory of the enemy, are to be removed out of the way, all people, of what age, fex, or condition foener, are to be brought out of the country into places of fafeig and then, our townes are to be furnished with strong garrisons and all other necessary provision, against all the chances of fortune. Besides, who knoweth the Coret designes of the 19rant? or whether he him. felfe (of long time destrous of revenge, and thirsting after our blond) will follow the Basta at the beeles, orno. Perhaps I may beleeve and feare more than is needfull; but it is good to, feare all that may be fea. red, that we may indeed feare nothing. If all things shall thus be fet in order if there shall nothing be left in the fields or in the villages, that may enrich feed, or feare our enemies, and which, may withdraw our care and thoughts from our enemies, undoubtedly we shall be victors. And if you will be ruledby & me, and follow my direction in the fe wars, I will affuredly deliver your enemies into your hands to be flaine at your pleasure and by the leave of God) will make the name and valour of the Epirots more terrible vuto the Turke than ener it hath bin in the time of our ancestors. I flatter not my selfe, I deceive you not if any thing may be promifed in worldly actions, this I affure you of , and this will I take upon me. But these things are better done than faid. In the meane while, to fpend no more time in longer talke and discourse (than which, no greater loffe can be to foldiers) let euery one of us take a part in this charge, for the good disposing of all things, and how to withstand the enemy. I will not command any thing to others which I will not my felfe do: I will refuse nothing, or reckon any thing base, which may tend to the common honour or profit of us all.

This speech of Scanderbeg was well liked and joyfully received of all the hearers, so that many befought him to manifest to them how he purposed to proceed in those wars: whereunto he with cheerfull countenance answered. That it was enough for him, if they did but beleeve him, promifing himselfe in person to be in the most dangerous actions as far as any of themawherewith they refted contented. And presently dispatching his lieutenants into divers parts of his kingdome, as he thought most convenient, provided, that all things were in short time The Epirotice connecimed out of the country into the ftrong townes and other places of refuge. No come, no m at all their cattell, or other things of any worth was left in the country; but all left defolate, in like manthe country in ner as was before at the comming of the great King Amurath to the fiege of Crois.

10 the firenz By this time I face the great Bassa was come into Epirus, accompanied with Amela: and as M the comming of he marched, still sent before him his scouts and espials, carefully to view every corner of the country, for feare to be entrapped as others before him had beene; directed in his journey for most part by Amesa, Scanderbeg had in readines such an army as he had purposed to vieagainst

A his mighty enemy, but lay with fix thousand horsemen only in shew, as if he had determined with them to have given them battell, but meaning indeed nothing lesse. For as soone as the Baffawas come in fight, he with those horsemen, according as he had before appointed, as if he had bin discouraged with the very fight of the Turks, turned his backe and fied. And because he would not give them any occasion to suspect it to be done for some policy or finenesse and so to make them more carefull, he fled not into the mountains or woods, as his wonted maner was, but directly toward Lyffa, a town of the Venerians standing upon the sea coast. as if he had quite despaired of the keeping of Epirus, and fled thither for refuge. The Baffa seeing him fly was glad thereof, and fent certain troups of horsen to pursue him, and diligently to marke which way he tooke; but encamped himselfe with his army in the plaines of Dibra, neere vnto. Oronychium, where Scanderbeg lay before: and there refled his army, weary of long trauell, expecting the returne of his horfemen, fent after Scanderbeg. But you their returne, when it was for a certainty reported by them, That Scanderbeg with an handfull of men was fled our of Bpirus, and not an enemy to be feene, the Turks began to rejoyce, and proudly to triumph, that they had without any losse driven the enemy out of the country, yet much grieued, that they could no where find any thing to fatisfie their greedy defires : for why, all things were fo clean gon, as if the country had bin swept against their comming, which might baue been a fufficient cause for them to have distrusted some great matter, but they flattering themselues, supposed all this to be done for searc of them, upon extreme desperation: such is the fraile condition of men, to lofe ftrength of body, common fence, yea, their reason and vn-C derstanding, when some great mischiefe is appointed for their overthrow or destruction. The Basia seeing the enemy fled, and now no cause of seare, consulted with his chiefe captains, what were now best to be done? Amesa still persuading him not to remove, but there to stay a time. and to expect the farther euent of matters. But the greater number, whose opinion preuailed, faid it was better to go farther into the country, and to take the spoile thereof before the country people should conuey away all their substance into places of safety, as they had done there in Dibra, and leave them nothing but the bare ground and empty cottages. By this perfuafion, the Baffa early next morning in good order fet forward:commanding by generall proclamaton, that no man upon paine of death should breake his array or straggle from the army. Yet besor he set forward, he called Amesa unto him, whom after he had highly commended. D and with great vehemency invayed against Scanderbeg, he with the great applause of the whole army in the name of Maboner created him King of Epirus. That day he marched not far, by Amela is by the reason of the great heat: for it was then about the midst of July. Yet when he had well wea. Bassa created ried himselfe with that daies trauell, finding neither enemy nor any thing else worthy to be king of Epiron. accounted in any part of a victory, he encamped at night, keeping diligent watch, and fending forth his scouts every way, but especially towards Lyssa. The next day, which was the third day after the Baffaes comming into Epirus, he fet forward againe, and came at length into

Æmathia, and there encamped that night. -When Seanderbeg (flying for feare, as the Turks supposed) was gone a great way out of their fight towards Lyssa, and come even to the borders of his kingdome, he there staid all the rest E of that day. And a little before the going downcof the Sun, he with a few select horsmen departed from the army, and with painfull travell got vp to the top of the high mountains, from whence a man might by day wel discouer all the plains of Æmathia. There he appointed one Peieus Emanuel, a politicke and valiant gentleman, with certaine horsemen to marke diligently which way the enemy held, and by certain fecret and appointed waftings and fignes, to give knowledgethereof to the army. After such order taken, he returned himselfe, and came again to the campe after midnight. And presently rising with his army, and fetching a compasse about, came vndiscouered, and secretly encamped himselse as neere as he could vnto the mountains where his fcouts lay, with eagles eis waiting for the least mouing of the enemy. The Bafla desirous to get as sar as he could into the country, before the heat of the day, began early in F the morning to fet forward, and came to the plains of Pharsalia, through the world spoken of for the great battell in them long time before fought, betweene the two most samous chiefe-taines Casar and Pompeius: and now once more to be made famous, by the flaughter of the Turks. Here the enemy finding some stragling cattel, & other small things which the country people had in their hasty slight left behind them, sel to seeking after booty, & as men without be buried, together with their horses; which he did not for any regard of them, but that their o loathfome carkafes should not infect the country; and after that, returned in great triumphio Croia. By the way as he went, the country people, which were before for feare of the Turke fled into the woods and mountaines in great multitudes, met him, as he did others also out of the cities, whose mouthes were all full of his worthy praises. Before him went the capting Turks with their hands bound behind them, excepting fuch as ware enforced to carry the Turks ensignes. Next vnto them followed the great Bassacs rich paullion, in such manner supported by the soldiers, as if it had bin in the field. Then came Scanderbeg himselfe with the Turkish Sanzacke, and Amesa following him; for Amesa had with great and humble suitoh tained of his vnele, that he might not as he well deserved, be carried bound among the other captines. Last of all came Scanderbeg his victorious fouldiers in goodly order, enery man lea. H ding a spare horse taken from the enemy, and loaded with spoile. So when he was comero Croia, and there of his subjects joyfully received, he brake vp his army, and gaue every man leaue at his pleasure to depart. The Sanzacke, and Amesa were committed to safe keeping, yp. till further order was taken for them. Ameja afterwards was for his treason worthily condem. ned to perpetual prilon, and by an Embaffadour from Sounderbeg fent voto King Alphonfuto Naples, there to be kept indurance; and with him was also sent an honourable Present of pan of the spoile taken from the Turks, in token of the victory. What became afterwards of this Amela, concerneth not much the course of our history; yet to satisfie the desirous, I thinke it not amisse with him to stray a little out of the way.,

When Amela had remained a yeare in prison at Maples, Scanderbeg understanding of the 1 death of Alphonfus, by his Embassadour requested of Ferdinand his ion, to have Amelatestored to him againe. By which meanes he was brought backe againe into Epirus, and cast in prison at Croia, but not in such streight manner as before : for Scander beg according to his accusto. med elemency, began now to forget the injury to him before done, and at last ouercome with the continual supplication and tears of his nephew, pardoned him his life; and restoring him to his former liberty, received him also into his former fayour. But Amelatemembring what riedges of his loyalty he had left with Mahomes at Constantinople, and fearing what would become of his wife and children, if he should hastily vie that his liberty, giving his vicle most

The Beech of diseja to

Whereas you of your owne gracious goodnesse onely without any defert of mine, have regarded my life and welfare, it behouth me also to be carefull for the life of others : lest whilest I receive your exceeding bounty with too much defire of mine owne health and honour, I do at this prefent, by this same benefit of yours, cast away them, whom I have long sithence by mine owne trechery undone. Mine unfortunate and quiltleffe Wife is with Mahomet, my little and innocent children are with him alfo : thefeyetlist, and shall live, so long as the tyrant shall thinke, that I live in heart his but when he shall once percine by this your gratious dealing that I am fallen from him, the cruell creditor will forthwith cut and read is pieces the pledges of my faith, and their innocent bloud shall pay the quilt of their Fathers offence. Wherfore the Othoman tyrant is of me by some deuice to be deceived, that I may in the menne time present those pledges, untill I may by some fit occasion afterwards redeeme the same. I will by your leauethis night L take my flight out of Croia, as if I had broken prison, and escaped against your will, and so sty unto Mahomet, making the greatest shew I can of my wonted love and loyalty towards him: not omitting to hear, or speake unto that credulous King such things concerning your estate, as I was wont in my better fortune that having so cleared my selfe of all suspition, which he perhaps hath conceived by reason of my captivity and long stay with you, I may at length, with my Wife and Children, so escape from him: Wherein you many helpe me much, if you shall openly make show at if you were grieved with my escape, and seeme to be highly offended with the keepers of the prison for the same. In the meane time, whilest I shall stay in the tyrants court expecting some fit time for my escape I will stand you in stead of an intelligencer, so that your enemy shall not to my knowledge either attempt or goe about any thing against you, which shall M be kept from your hearing or knowledge.

Scanderbeg refused to grant what soeuer he had requested, but said vnto him:

Amela. lithence we have granted you life, with all the good things thereunto belonging, we will not the answer of prohibit you to wife that our gift to your most good, and to the preservation of them who for ucr may most during. justly call upon you, as debior unto them, for their welfare and liberty. Goe thy wates, proceed take thy time and occasion as it seemeth wmo thee best; and at length reforme thy selfe, whilest thou yet half sufficient time and space. We now believe you in all things, and well like of this your device: Amesa, you shall Berein deceine no man but your felfe, if you shall longer follow the faith and court of the barbarous King. whereas like danger is both of body and foule both to thee and thine. When foener thou halt returne wito vs. thou canst not do vs agreater pleasure: and in what regard thou hast heretofore been with vs. in the same thou shalt be with vs againe.

The fame night Amela by secret order from Scanderbeg, escaped both out of prison and out of Croia and in the morning it was all ouer the city, that he was gone, and the keepers tharp. ly rebuked for their negligence. He comming to Constantinople, easily persuaded Mahamet. that he was by chance escaped, with all things else that he told him : yet was he not for all that, fo well graced of him as before; not for any distrust he had in the man, but for the cuill fuccesse he had in the formes wars. Now whether Amesa neglected his promised returne, or could find no opportunity to performe the same, is vncertaine that certaine it is, that shortly after he died at Constantinople, poisoned as was thought by the commandement of Mahomet, The death of who could no longer indure the fight of him, whom he reckoned the author of that notable amile. ouerthrow received in Amathia. This was the wofull end of this noble and valiant man, well C worthy of remembrance, had not his haughty thoughts foared too high with the defire of

When Mahomet under Road in what manner I faac Baffa was ouerthrowne, and his army difcomfitted, he was therewith much grieucd, and justly blamed the Bassaes security: yet such was his credit with his Soueraigne, that the matter was in better fort passed ouer than was supposed it would have been. Neuerthelesse, Mahomet in revenge thereof would willingly have imployed all his forces upon Scanderbeg, if his more urgent affaires would have so permitted. For at the same time, besides that great warres began to rise betwixt him and the Venetians (which continued for many yeres after) he was certainly informed, That the Christian Princes were making a strong confederation against him. At which time Mahomet disdaining o-D penly to fue for a peace at Scanderbegs hands, cunningly practifed by fuch as were fent to redeem the prisoners. & also by the Sanzack himself, to persuade Scanderbeg to require peace of him; affuring him, that if he did but aske it, it would for a long time be easily obtained. Which thing Scanderbeg (well acquainted with the Turkish policy, vtterly refused to do. Wherefore Mishomet for the defence of his countries bordering vpon Epirus, sent two of his most expert captains, Sinam and Hamur, with each of them 14000 foldiers into Macedonia, expresly charging them not to enter at any timeor upon any occasion, into Epirus, or by any means to pronoke Scanderbeg: which his commandement they fo well observed, that the Epirots by the space of almost two yeres enjoyed the fruits of peace, although there was no peace at all concluded. So that the remembrance of old injuries wearing out with time, at length by the me-E diation of the same captains, a peace for a yere was agreed on betwirt Mahomet and Scanderbeg. A peace for a

Synam accordingly, with an army of 20000 men entered into Epirus, where he was forthwith encountered by Scanderbez, and his army vtterly ouerthrowne, fo that but few escaped by flight with Synam himself. Presently after he sent Asam-bez, another of his F captaines, into the same service, with an army of thirty thousand, whom Scanderbeg also in plaine battell vanquished at Ocrida; in which battell Asam himselse was fore wounded, and finding no way to escape, was glad to yeeld himselse prisoner to Scanderbeg, by whom he was courteoully vsed, and afterwards set at liberty. Iussum beg following Afam with eighteene thousand into Epirus, was set upon by Scanderbeg also, and having lost part of his army, was glad by speedy flight to saue himselse with the rest. After all this, Caraza-beg, an old captaine of and a man of great experience (who had bin a great commander, & a companion with scander beg in the time of old Amurath) requested of Mahomet, that he might proue his fortune against his old acquaintance Scanderbeg, affuring him of better successe than before. The long and anproued experience of this old leader put Mahomet in fuch hope of good speed, that he gave present order for the leaving of such an army as Caraza had requested, and for ten thousand mothan he had at the first required. With this strong army, in number almost forty thousand Cara Ta fet forward, having before filled the minds of men with the expectation of fomegree. ter matter to have bin by him done. Scanderbeg vnderstanding certainly that Caraza was comming, flood more in doubt of the man than of his power; and therfore affembled greater for ces than he had viually done before: and to welcome him, fent two thousand of his best and H most expert fouldiers secretly into the enemies countrey; who lying in ambush amongst the woods and mountaines, whereby Caraza must needs passe, suddenly set vpon source thousand horsemen (the forerunners of Caraza his army) who marching disorderedly, and fearing no fuch matter, were in a trice overthrown, and most part'of them slaine: those few that escaped fled backe agains to the army, as if they had come in post to bring tidings of some hasty news to the Generall. With which so vnfortunat a beginning, Caraza was so discomfited, that if he might for shame, he could have bin content to have returned againe and gone no farther; vet for his honours fake holding on his way, he came into Epirus; where whileft he was fafter the manner of old men) long in refoluing what course to take, he was upon the sudden affailed by Scanderbeg, before he could well put his men in order of battell. At which time there fell fuch 1 a vehement shower of raine, that both the armies were glad to retire before any great hurt was done. Three daies together it rained continually (for it was about the latter end of Autumne) all which time Scanderbeg ceased not in one place or other to trouble the Turks camp; so that the old Generall, partly diffempered with the extremity of the weather, which for thevio. lence thereof he tooke to be ominous; and more discouraged with the refilesse attempts of Scanderbeg, rose with his army, and retiring back by the same way he came, returned to Conflantinople. Where he was well decided of Mahomet, that having promifed fo much had performed fo little: yet afterwards was againe by him in some fort commended, for that he had with leffe loffe looked voon Scanderbee than other Generals before fent against him.

Mahamet perceiving that Scanderbey was not to be subdued but with such forces as he was I not then at leifure to imploy on him, thought it not amisse to proue if he could by faire speeches & glorious shews of fained friendship get within him, and so bring him to confusions which purpose he sent unto him an Embassador with rich presents, and letters of this purpost:

Sultan Mahomet, Lord and Emperour of the East and of the West, and of all parts of the World, vnto Scanderbeg, Prince of Albania and Epirus, sendeth greeting.

Scanderbeg.

Thinke friend Scanderbeg, that no acquaintance can be greater, or friendship more firme, than that which hath growne of long and mutual conversing and living together, and especially if the same ! have taken beginning from childhood and tender yeares, as you know it hath done beswixt us two; who have of long time, even from our childhood, lived together in great love and friend ship, when as you fift lay as hostage in my fathers court. Wherefore beloned Scanderbeg, when as I call to remembrance all those things, with others, wherewith our youthfull yeares were then delighted, and being mindfull all of all those things which you have oftentimes done for the advancement of our Empire and Kingdom, and for the glory of the Ochoman family, I cannot shufe but embrace thee with fingular zeale and after ction. For I take God to witnesse, that nothing could chance more welcome or pleasing unto mein my life, than to haue thee with me, and for a while to enjoy thy company. Weither neede it thou to feare and thing to come unto me, for that my fouldiers without my knowledge or commandement have of lateboken in and poiled thy Kingdome: which thing, as reason required, was unto me exceedingly displeasing; M neither did it any whit offend me, that they were by thy forces vanquished and overcome, and so received the just reward of their enill deferts, and that all things fell out with thee according to the equity of the cause, and as thy heart could have desired. But to let these things passe, the remembrance of our old love and friendship persuadeth me to come to agreement, and to joyne together with thee in a perpetual legal

A of amily: to the intent that our antient acquaintance and familiaritie, which by reason of long absence is almost worn out, may again take life, increase and be confirmed. Of which peace let these be the capitulations if they fhall feem unto you reasonable: for I know it belongeth unto him that requireth not the peace to appoint the conditions of the same. First, we require you freely and peaceably to suffer our drmies to passethorow your king dom, for the besieging of the cities and inuading of the countries subject unto the Venetians our enemies. Then, To deliver unto us your fon Iohn in holtage, whom we will alwaies wie as one of our own naturall children. And afterwards, That our Merchants and men of trade may peaceably come and trauell into all parts of your Kingdome with their Merchandise, and there freely and safely restored as your pleasure safely and without all fear repair unto us, and in like manner return again. In which things if you will reeld unto B vs. I promise upon the faith of a King to grant unto your King dome a sincere peace, with perpetual tranquilitie; and that there shall not be any more dear onto me than your self; and wil neuer to the otmost of my power permit your king dom to be infested or molested by any of our subjects or others. Whatsouer you shall further receive from vs by the mouth of our Embassador Mustapha, you may thereogive full credence. Fare you well.

From our Imperial Palace at Constantinople, the 10 of May, 1461.

Scanderbey having received these letters and wel considered of the same, returned him and fwer as followeth:

The Soldier of CHRIST IBSVS, George Castriot, otherwise called Scanderbeg, Prince of the Albanenses and Epirots, vnto Mahomet Prince of the Turks, greeting,

J Our Letters (most Magnificent) are deliuered wnto ws , wherin you write of your exceeding lone Scanderber bu and fingular affection toward vs, confirmed as you fay by old acquaintance, which being grown up as wer to Mabetwixt us, and by tract of time firmly rooted, and as it were into nature converted, shall alwaies retaine Livers. his force and frength. But for asmuch as it seemeth good unto you to awake the same having a long time D and many years lien as it were afteep; and to make a motion that we should enter into a certain new league and confederation, whereof among it other conditions of the League by you propounded, this is one, That your Forces may freely paffethrough my Kingdom to innade the Venetians. Vnto this your request worthy Mahomet, it standeth neither with equitie nor with myne honor to consent, for somuch as the Venetians are mone especiall good friends and confederats. And for that you desire to have my son lohn with you in hostage, for the better assurance of the peace betwixt vs : I should peraduenture do it (most Noble Mahomet) if fatherly affection would give me leave. But lithence I have no more but him, and hee as yet a tender childe; it is not for the good of either of ws, to have him now taken from vs, when as he ought of vs to be most tenderly cherished, and carefully instructed. As for that you requested concerning your Merchants, That they may freely and safely traffique into my Kingdom, I can be content to yeeld i here-E unto and wish heartily that there might be a free intercourse of our Merchants indifferently with their commodities into both our Kingdoms. Further, Wheras you earnefly persuade mee, boldly and wishout fear to come unto you, that by such interview and personall presence, our great defire, grown of long ab-Sence, might be the better satusfied : in this thing (most excellent Prince) I cannot but praise your most honorable disposition, and commend your good nature; and would therfore boldly follow your persuasion, if my other vegent affairs, and the government of my king dom would so permit. But what shall I doe? my son Iohn (as I saidbefore) but little, and as yet whit to govern; and my people (as you know) love alwages to have something to do ; being by nature a fierce and restles nation, whom I my self have much a do to rule and gonern. For all that, I will come unto you according to your defire, expecting only a more commodious time. So fare you well.

Fromour Campthe 30 of May, 1461.

When Mahomet had received these Letters, and wel perused the same he writ to him again in manner following: LI

Sultan

Sultan Mahomet, Emperour of all the parts of the World. vnto Scanderbeg P rince of the Albanenses and Epirots, greeting.

Vour Letters we have received by our Embassadour Mustapha, wherin you give us to understand That you like of none of the conditions of peace by vs propounded, but only that concerning our mer. deches, for the concluding of a chants and men of trade, that they might freely and at their pleasure of their traffique and trades with perpetual peace their merchandife to and fro, and wpon this condition only you grant ws peace. This your offer wee accept of and all the rest of your excuses we willingly admit wher fore I promise wato thee, my louing Scander. H beg, and will perform all that then dost require, and upon that resolution rest, and wil so long as I liveob. ferue and keep a fincere and inviolable peace with thee for ever except hou first give cause for the viola ting of the same. And for that purpose have wee with our vivall and Imperiall Seal signed these our Let. ters, which we by our Embaffidor Mustapha have fent unto thee, as therby confirming to thee this perpe. tuall peace. Wherfore you also (if you be so content) may subscribe, and with your Seal confirm this of ours. that I inlike maner may have also your like consent and agreement. And would further, That you would command knowledge therof to be made by open proclamation through all your king dome, as I will in like maner cause to be don through myne. And for the more manifestation of this my love toward you. I would allot but you should under stand. That of myne own meer motion and bounty. I do freely give unto you all those things which you by force of arms have taken from my father in Albania and Epirus, fothat 100 1 may possessed and enion the same as if they had alwaies bin yours and your Auncestors. Wherfore loine grant, and confirm unto thee and thy heirs, all the right, title or interest, which I bertofore had thein, and from henceforth will alwaies account and repute thee as a Prince of Albania and Epirus, and fo call thee. And as I have promised thee in the faith of a King, will never herafter with wars molestine or thine, except thou thy self give cause therof. Wherfore after you have with your seal confirmed these things, you may commend them to our faithfull Embaffador Mustapha, to be by him brought water visio whom I would you should in all things give full credit. So fare you well, and render vs love for love.

Cavderbeg.

Vpon receit of these letters a peace was concluded betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg & the K cincetherwist same by publique proclamations solemnly published through both their kingdomes, to the great rejoicing of many. Which peace was for a feafon faithfully kept on both fides, vntill that the Turks lying in garrison upon the frontiers of Epirus, began after their wonted maner again to fetch preys and bootics out of the country. Of which iniuries Scanderbeg by Letters complained to Mahomet: who answered, that he was altogether ignorant therof, and seemed to shew to be much offended with the insolencie of the doers therof, and forthwith caused many things to be again restored. By which means the peace before concluded, was still as before continued.

A little before the conclusion of the aforesaid peace, great wars began to arise betwint the Turks and the Venetians, who all this while being in league with the Turkes, peaceably fol. I lowed their traffique and trades of merchandile, little or nothing at all regarding their neighbors harms and miseries, until that now the flame and fire began to take hold vpon their own houses, and as it were to waken them out of a dead sleep. For Mahomet after he had subverted the empire of Constantinople, and driven Thomas and Demetrius the Emperors brethren out of Peloponesus (now called Morea) rested not so contented, but by his lieutenants and other great captains disturbed the quiet of the Venetians, who then held in their possession, Methone, Corone, Neapolis, Argos, with divers other strong towns in Peloponesus standing " on the sea coast. And now it chanced that about this time, tofhue, Mahomets lieutenant in Pe loponefus, had by the treason of a Greek priest, vpon a sudden surprised the city of Argonand Omarcs another af his great Captains, having first spoiled the Countrey about Naupacum M (now Lepanto) entred farther into the territory of the Venetians about Methone & Corone, making hauock of all that came in his way. With which injuries, plainely tending to open war, the Venetian Senators being much troubled, fat oft times in counsel, deliberating with much care, what course to take in a matter of so great importance. Some being of opinion, that it were best to send Embassadors to Mahomet, so to make proof if the matter might by fair means be redressed. Others contrariwise deemed it to no purpose so to do; for somuch as fuch great and manifest outrages, nothing differing from plain hostility, could not possibly be don without the Tyrants knowledge and expresse command. After the Senators had often met together, and with many great reasons debated the matter to and fro, and yet for all that concluded nothing (as in confulrations of great matters with a multitude, it most commonly falls out to be a harder matter, and to require longer time to bring the multitude vnto fome certain resolution, than it is afterward to performe the action) in this so great a dinersitie of opinions concerning to weighty a cause, at length one Victor Capella, a noble Gentleman and grave Senator, Rept vp in the midft of the Senat, and there frankly delivered this notable B speech vnto the rest, concerning the matter propounded, as followeth:

I have before this at other times by long experience often noted (most noble Senators) that in all our the notable greatest consultations of matters concerning our common state, some are alwaics so addicted or rather wed- cech fir ded to their own conceits, that they can hardly with patience endure to heare the reasonable opinion of the capital others contrary to their own the chief cause of our flow resolutions. Wherfore I have thought good briefly Vinctures at this time to call upon you for resolution, for somuch as I see we must of necessity take up arms, be we nener so losh or unwilling : for to my understanding, you do but betray the State, in delaying the time to bomet. make present war upon the barbarous enemy. Yet many principal men among vs aduise vs to beware that we do not sashly or unadnifedly determin of matters of so great consequence; and think it requisit that we should send embassadors unto the Tyrant to expostulate with him his uniust dealing in breaking his faith and league, and with all to request him to observe the conditions of the peace before agreed upon, if haply he may rather by persuasion than by arms be moved to change his purpose: and if by this means nothing may be obtained, then at length they think it necessary to resolve to make war upon him. They alledge further that if we shall attempt war our cities in the continent, bordering upon the Ionian in Pelopone flus with diners others of ours in the firm land, will not be able to hold out long, but for want of necessaries must needs perish with the first of the trouble. Besides that if those places shall be wasted and spoiled, great loffe (as they (ay) shall ensue therby unto most of us in privat : The greatest motive (perhaps) wherfore they think it most convenient to defer the wars, and for that purpose to send our Embassidours unto him. Of which Embassage first by your leave a few words. At such time as these our Embassadours, men of great wisdom and reach, not long since came unto him, he had of them no regard, but dallying off the time with fraudulent, deceitfull, and glosing speeches, did indeed such things to the contrary as we least hoped. Wherfore I cannot well deuise (if we should send them or such others againe) what especiall thing of all that we then gave them in charge, they should now propound unto him having already faid what is to bee Said : except they should say. That wheras we are not of sufficient frength und power to wage war against him, we would be glad to decide the matter by talk, and by that simple means to redresse our injuries; and upon the matter, to hew our felues prest and ready to fall to agreement with him, according as shall stand with his good pleasure and liking. Truly this were good plain dealing but it will not scrue our turn. Argos is already taken from vs, and he maketh open war voon vs : wherein hee doth but prooue our courage, and try how long we will put up these injuries: if we will quietly disgest these, he will then considerity E and without fear proceed further. But if we shall (as best bescemeth vs) valiantly resist him, he shall be glad of such rest as we will give him; and when he knoweth not well which way to turn himself, shal be as glad as we to lay down arms, and to feek for peace: wher as if we shall do otherwise, I fear we shall repens our selues when it will be too late. It is reported, That as soon as he was come into Peloponesus, he went himself in person unto Eubaato view the city of Chalcis: and going a second time out of Peloponesis, he Sounded the depth of the passage and came within sight of the city, of purpose to have assaulted it, if he had found opportunitie : at which time he himself rid ouer that streit of the sea between Batia and Eulaa, and curiously viewed in what place he might most conveniently passe over with his Army to besiege the city verily these are the most manifest signes of war, wherby any man may sufficiently prone, that he hath long since resoluced, so soon as he is ready, to make war upon us. Whilest wee are yet dreaming in the midst F of our long consultations, he will proceed in the wars he hath begun, and cutting us short, augment his own dominions. Then will he blame his Lieutenants and Captains as authors therof, but still be doing that best serweth his purpose. And whilst no man opposeth himself against him, his power daily increasing he will do the best he can suddenly to swallow we up, being unprovided. For he may easily raise great forces, that by sufferance of others maketh himself of great strength there where he had before no footing . Shall G we then lay that we have no wars with this increching Tyrant ? Some I know feed them felues and other alfo with vain hopes, faying . That he will never turn his forces upon vs, nor ruinate our efface, although he might at case do it : Wherfore (say they) let us refrain from wars, and use our peace and quietnes. vet omitting nothing in the mean time that shall be needfull for our safety. But for somuch as it plainly appeareth unto all men, by that which is before said, that he hath already indeed proclaimed was arging vs inuading our countries, surprising our cities, and killing our people : Whether think you it more expedient or profitable for us to lit Itill and luffer our dominions to be taken from us, or rather by open mar to make the barbarous King know the greatnes of our power and strength ? For if we shall enter into open war, we being in arms (ufficiently provided against all events, and with carefull eye attending all his at tempts. Thall eafily anoid both himfelf and all his denifes. Who if he be suffered to runne still on forward A with his profeerous faccesse, people will daily more and more fall unto him, in hope to live the better as his friends. For which cause I think it better to prefer an honorable war before a doubtfull peace. Asfar delay it hath hurt many great States, and our felues most of all , wherby we have in some fore betraid the Empire of Greece, with the wofull Emperor himself, when as this Tyrant battered she walls of Confantia nople for our traffique was much holpen by the Grecians, whom we then left to themfelues. Afterthat me destried and rejected the pittiful complaints of the Princes of Peloponesus, who with sears exaued our aid. and now we fee that famous country loft and fallen into his hands through our Routh and neoticence. Of lace, when as the King of Bolna humbly requested our aid, and promised fully to requite our curtese, and what focuer els we should do in his behalf we suffered his king dom to be lost, and himself to be cracle mer. thered by the Turks. For all these things of us thus neglected we cannot escape the infamous report of the rest of the nations of Europ, but that we for the greedy desire of trade and filthy gain, have for taken, and for our parts betrayed whole king doms and nations, agreeing with we both in maners and religion; and to hanc flood fill and looked on watill they were subdued and brought into thraldom by the Turk's Wherfore in few words to flut up the matter if we should joyn in league with the Hungavians, and enter into arms, we should so be able to keep our own : wheras if we shall wie delayes, and hunt after peace, we shall in their time (ce that he will fuddinly denous vs. being unprovided, and wrest from us all our provinces and territories which border upon him. And therfore it is in my opinion belt to fend our Embalfadors into Hungary, with a great maile of mony to stir up that warlike nation into the fellow ship of this war. And beside the navy we now have in readines, to put to sea as many more ships and gallies as we are able. The great Bishop also is not to be forgotten, but by all means to be drawn as a chief man into this War. Besides all y. this, we must do what we can to raise up rebellion against the Turk in Peloponesus : which will be no hard matter to bring to paffe. For if the Peloponesians rise up in arms with one of their poor princes bichrevolted from the Turkish King and for saking all that they had, adventured themselves into all mounts of peril and danger; what think you they will do when they shall fee so great forces comming both by a caund land against the Turkish King? It were good also, that we should fend two thousand Italian Horsmesnime Peloponesus, to animate the people. Who when they shall fee us thus to proceed, will undoubtedly presently revolt from the Turks, and yeeld them flues and their countres unto us, from whence we may most commodioufly vex and molest this Tyrant. For there is no where bester entrance into his King dome, than by the way of Peloponelus. So that togning in league with the Hungarians, we shall befet him on every side they all along the river of Danubius, and we out of Peloponefus. Let us not therfore fit fill with our hands y in our bosoms, suffering our countries to be taken from vs. and our subjects made bond saues to the Turks, but incouraging them by our example, animate them to take up arms, and valiantly to relift the cruel and barbarom Tyrant.

Turbs.

The greater part of the Senat mooued with this grave Senatours speech, decreed without delay to make Wars, and to fend their Embassadors to the Pope, the King of Hungary, and other the Christian Princes their Neighbors, to craue aid of them in these Wars against the Turks. According to this Decree, the Venetians for defence of their territory fent one Bertholdus Este a valiant Captain, with an Army into Peloponesus; where at his first comming he in thort time recovered the City of Argos before loft. And departing thence, marched M through the country with his army of fifteen thousand men, vnto the streight of Corinth, called Ishmus. At which place Alovisius Lauretanus, Admirall of the Venetians (by appointment before made) did meet him: and there ioyning their forces together, with great labour

A in the space of fifteen daies fortified all that streit from the Ionian to the sea Ægeum, with a continual rampier and double ditch in length about five miles. In which work they yied the helo of thirty thousand men, and in doing therof were much furthered by the ruins of the old wall before destroied by Amurath. The Venetian Commanders having fortified this streit, incamped before Corinth, and laid ftreit fiege vnto it : where at the fecond affault, Bartholdys the General desirous by his own forwardnes to incourage his soldiers, was in that affault grienoully wounded with a stone cast down upon him from the wall of which hurt he shortly afterdied. Neuertheles the fiege was stil continued by Betinus Calcinatius, who succeeded Bartholdus in his place. But whilft the Venetians lay thus at the fiege of Corinth, fuddenly news was brought vnto the camp, That Mahomes was comming with a great army himselfe in perfon to raise the siege, and to destroy the new fortifications at Ishmus. Wherupon the Venetians left the fiege, with purpose to have defended the late fortified fireit: but after, that it was certainly known that Mahomet was cuen now at hand with an Army of fourfcore thousand Turks, Betinss distructing with his small number to be able to defend the streit against so puiffant an army, left the place fo lately before fortified, and with all his Army retyred to Neapolis, there to keep the sea coast.

Shortly after, Mahomet without any refistance at all entred with a world of men by the fireit into Peloponesus; and when he had with the great slaughter of the country people romed up and down about Argos, he came to Neapolis, and in most terrible maner assaulted the city twice; both which times he was notably repulfed by the Venetians, and many of his men flain. Departing thence, he destroied and wasted the country about Methone (now Modon) and Corone, and affaulted the city of Iuncum, but with no better fucces than he had before Neapolis. Wherfore Winter now drawing on, he returned again with his army to Constan-

After his departure, the Venetians spoiled allthat part of Arcadia which was subject to the Turk, requiting him with like injuries as he had don them before. Not long after, Lauretanus the Venetian Admiral had the Island of Lemnos delivered vnto him by one Comintus a famous pyrat, who had surprised the same and taken it from the Turks; but distrusting how he should be able to keep the same, deliuered it ouer vnto the Venetians, Shortly after, Vrsatus Iustinianus a great Magnifico among the Venetians, was sent to succeed Lauretanus their Admiral: but whilft he was scouring the Ægeum with a fleet of 32 great gallies, Andreas Dandalus General of their forces at land, inconsideratly incountring with the Turkes horsemen between Mantynia and Pytheme, was by them ouerthrown and flain, and with him divers other gentlemen of great account : in which skirmish sifteen hundred of the Venetians were slaine together with their General. And as fortune is neuer more constant than in mischief, so at the same time Vrsatus General at sea, landing his men in the Island of Lesbos, besieged the city of Mytelene, and gaue therunto two great affaults, wherin he lost fine thousand men: And understanding that the Turks fleet was comming to relieue the city, raised the siege and sailed into Eubcea, and from thence passed ouer into Peloponesus, where he shortly after died with forrow and grief of mind. In whose place the Venetians sent another famous Captaine E called lacobus Lauretanus.

The Venetians well confidering the great power of the Tutkish Emperor, labored by their The Venetians Embassadors to draw as many of the Christian Princes as they could into the sellowship of outer into contains war; but especially the Great Bishop, by whose meanes, they were in good hope to bee atter christian greatly frengthned. Press the fecond of that name was then the Great Bishop; who at fielt Princes against answered the Venetian Embassadors, That he must take away the little Turke, before he had the Turk. anything to do with the great: meaning thereby Sigismundus Maletasta Prince of Ariminum, whom he deadly hated, for that he took part with the French against the Aragonians. Howbeit the wars in Italy being wel appealed, and Pim stil solicited by the Venetians, made great preparation against the Turks; giving it out, that he would in person himselfe go vnto those Wars and by his authority (then much regarded) procured great aid out of Germany, France, Spain, and other Countries also farther off. At which time also voluntary men in great number reforted out of all parts of Christendome, into Italy, ready to adventure their liues in those Religious Warres. At the same time also the Venetians had with much adoo by the working of Panlow Angelow Archbishop of Dyrrachium, persuaded Scanderbeg to renounce the league which he had before made with the Turke, and to enter into Arms agail and which he presently did, and spoiled the borders of the Turkes Dominions next vnto him. Wherwith Maliomet was no leffe troubled, than with all the rest of the great preparation of the Christian army, which Mahomet feared might tend to the vtter ruin of his Kingdome. Sa dreadfull was the name of Scanderbeg among the Turks. Wherfore thinking it most convenient for his affairs to reconcile him if it were possible, by his embassador fent for that purpose wrot vnto hi n as followeth.

Sultan Mahomet, Emperor of the East and of the West: to Scanderbeg Prince of the Albanenses and Epirots, Greeting.

Have alwaies had thy fidelity and vpright dealing in great admiration, most noble Prince Scander. 1 beg : for which cause I thought it a thing incredible, that thou being a Prince of such an heroical and princely perfection, shouldst so inconsideratly and without any occasion break the faith and league which thou not long fince folemnly contractedst with me. For as I am advertised, thou hast entredints the con fines of our dominion with a great army, and with fire and fword destroying all that thou coulds hall the ried away with thee a great boory. Of which thing I know right well that the Venetians are the only saulan by whose counsell and persuasion thou hast bin set on to do this deed; and seduced by their allunements and Subtill per suctions, halt made war upon me, and art become the faithles breaker of thine own league and of the facred law of Nations. Yet do I little or nothing blame thee therfore, regarding more the case of the ignominic than the despight it self, and lay the blame upon them who have alwaies bin my fots and canitall enemies, rather than upon thee. But alas what is this unto me (Scanderbeg) that thou half dance which possessed on any and so large dominions? Didst thou think to do so great hurt unto our kingdome, by spoiling a little piece of our country, and by stealing our cattel, more like a theef and robber than anoun enemy? Which thing I yet account not worth the name of an injury. But if thou thinkst so good, project, not in these thy doings; for I make more account of thy friendship and love, than of what source is med in dearest : because (as thou knowest) I have alwaies born unto thee an especiall favour and loved thee most entirely. And therfore as often as I call to remembrance our tender years and old familiarities while we lived together in my fathers court at Hadrianople, I canot but think my felf bound unto thee in all curtesie. And ther fore (my good Scanderbeg) I mast heartily request and intreat thee that we remains the former conclusions of peace , may of new confirm the same with solemne Oath , wherewith if the tormer peace bad bin eft ablifhed, thou wouldst not have suffered thy felf to have bin now of the Venetians fociscumuented or feduced. It is therfore needfull that we now again for ever confirm a league and peace betwixt us by folemn and facredoath on both fides : which if thou shalt do, (as I hope thou will and in the be aduited by me) thou and thy posterity shall undoubtedly alwaies reign in peace, and in later possesse. what foener is yours. Wheras if thou shalt do otherwise, beleene me it wil repent thee and that right aniskly. Thou knowest already my force, which whether thoube able to withstandor not, thou were best to bee well aduised. The poor Princes thy neighbors, the V enetians thy seducers, canot deliver the from my forks and power. Dost thou not see the Grecians almost all rooted out before thy face? the emperors of Contagn tinople and Trapezondby us deprined of their empires? the Princes of Servia and Rascia destroyed to King of Bosna put to death? and all the Kings of Asia, with many other Kings and Princes mot warder shed and overthrown, and made subject to me? Wherfore Scandering I adult the in this is follow my counselkeep thy promise, and so believe me thou shalt not be decemed. Concerning these matters we have given surther commandment to our Embassador and servant Militaria, who comes winter the doubt not to give credit in any thing. Farewell. You maruell (most noble Mahomet) that my foldiers (large fay) contrary to the telegramented

A conditions of our peace, have entred into your confines, and from thence carried a great booty. Of which thing you fay the Venetians are the authors, whom you call your mortal Enemies: inferring afterwards that you are little therwith offended, for that you are a most mighty Prince, and can easily disort such unkindnes, for the great lone you bear unto me : and the rather, for that I did it deceived (as it pleaseth) you to fay by others. All these things you can casily forgive and forget, so that I will by solemn Oath confirm the same conditions of peace that were in our former League betwixt vs agreed upon. And therunto you do greatly vege me, you admonist and counsel me to follow your advice, as tending to the great profit and securities of me andmy posterity, lest haply whilf I seek to please the Venetians, linear your heavy displeasure. Besides this, the more to terrific me, you reckon up as it were in a catalogue, the people mations. Kings, and Princes, by you onercome and subdued. But what is that which is so Brange (Ipray you) and which you so much maruel at (most noble Mahomet ?) Is it not for that my soldiers did that in the confines of your dominions, wherof they were (of right) forry, and had therof to me complained, that your foldiers had before don the like in their goods and possessions. Wherfore if they also upon a military braueru (as is your manner of phrase) have made them selves whole, and done one shrewd turn for another remenging injury received, and not inferring any of new there is no cause that you should either think it strange. or blame me. I would my felf have restrained my souldiers, although they were grieuously injured (I wil plainly confesse unto you atroth) I would have appealed their angry minds, inflamed with defire of renenge ; if you (a Prince of all others most rich and bountifull) would either have taken order, that ful restitution might have bin made unto them of all such things as they had lost, or els would with condigne punishment have chastised the insolencie of your soldiers : which you would seem to cover with the term of military wantonnes or brauery; an excuse scarse current among st children. For although offences are in all places grienous, yet ought they most of all so to be deemed in martial affairs. What I pray you, would you have metake it for a laseiniousnes in your men of war ? especially when I had received so great losse: when as you might with a word first have restrained them from doing it, and at your pleasure corrected them after the deed was done. concred the feas, and dried up the rivers before them as they went 3 yet for all this (noble Mahomet) they G are all cast out by him that casteth out all Nations , the finger of the Highest hatb brought them all to nought. Wherfore learn to know your self to be a man also ; trust not too much to the multitude of your feldiers, and strength of your armies for oftentimes great and puissant Armies have bin overthrown with far leffe, as all histories bear witnes: wherof it is commonly faid, Thou shalt not praise the valor of the Ge. nerall before he be brought to the triumph. And do you not think, Mahomet, that God will fauor the bet. ter cause? You know, you well know, that all your king dom is violently gotten shat it is wrongfully and uniufly possessed for which cause I am not afraid not only to withstand you when you shall come, being to oreat a Prince but also valiantly and couragion by to dare you into the field, and by the power of Godboth to hope for and have a notable victory over you. We have foldiers also who know how to ve their weapons. to march before their enemies, and how to bear themselves in the heat of the battell. Wherfore, to that you H Cay unto me for the renuing of the former league, you labor now but in vaine to circumuent me with luch fair closses, I have your faith in such distrust, and your friendship in detestation : for asmuch as you can. ningly and fubrilly, after the maner of your Ancestors, what somer you do or what somer you promite unto me it tendeth all to no other end than to thrust me out of my king dom. Tet thus long I have by Gods hele well escaped all your policies, all your crafts and deceits. But I hope there will in short time be an end of all thefe matters, when all your fleights and denifes shall not eafe you neither your working head or Turkish pride any thing profit you. It is not I alone that fo much stomack you, there commeth after me a great num. ber of Christian Princes : behold the whole Chinalry and glory of the Christian commonweal is in arms and comming against thee with all their force: all the Kings and Princes of Christendom have combined themselves together, with the great Bishop, against thy state, and will in short time be present to destroy thee and thy King dome. Wherefore (worthy Mahomet) I have thought it good in regard of our old friendship (although the same hath by you beene greatly impaired and violated) to forewarne you of all thefethings, that you might gather your wits together, and in time prouide for the safety of your felf and kingdom. You fee the force and power of many great Princes, from which whether you can elege or no I know not : yet you may if you will follow my advice, you may I fay, make both your name and email pire of great greater, of famous most renowned of fortunat most happy and blessed: if casting from you the groffe errors of the Mahometan Superfittion, you will embrace the faith and truth of Christ Islu and at length have regard of your foul shealth. And you which excell all your predeceffors in highnes of the rit and prognancie of wit, (uffer not your (elf and your lubietts as it were by inheritance to be longer blusded in your wilfull errors; but do shat (as a wife Prince) of your own accord, which otherwife you wil fort- & ly of necessity be constrained to do. To say, Had I wist, bath ever bin accounted agreat disgrace from the mouth of an Emperor. At length amend and measure your felf. Behold, Almighty God doth offer you means, wherby you may quies the whole state of your king dom, and all our Kings and Princes love, honoin, and reverence you. As it her let the ambisions desire of soveraigns, or immoder at care of those things you possesse, crouble you from so doing : for whatsoener you have writeftly and unlawfully vsurped, the Christian Princes will grant, confirm, and establish wnto thee, as if they had bin your own by antuntine beritance. So shall you be a true Monarch indeed, and rule and reign lawfully, if you shall embrace this faith and wor ship God aright: which so soon as you shall feel the sweetnes of you wil be sonny you knemes no sooner, you will grieve at the time you have lost, and viterly detest and abbon all that filthy supersission which the most filthy false Prophet Mahomet hath left among st yen. From our Camp, the 26 of May, 14.63.

With these letters Scanderbeg dismissed the Turks Embassador. About which time heiter ceived letters from the great Bishop, that he accompanied with the Christian princes, would without delay come ouer into Boirus with a firong army of valiant Christians so join this forces with his against the common enemy of the Christian Religion: exhorting him in all their names to denounce war against the Turkish king. Which thing Scimder beg most jointed ly vidertook, and without delay with all his power brake into the Turks dominion, burning and destroying the country before him as he went: from whence he returned laden with the Jame the Stor Lian King Called the French at the mount of where

When Mahomet had perufed Scanderbegs letters, and certainly understood of the great proparation made against him in Italy, as also of the great spoyle of late made by scandows. he became exceeding melancholy, as a man much troubled in minde, which dayly more and more increased: for that he saw not the wonted cheerfulnesse in his men of war, but all full of heauines and despaire, as if they had bin men already vanquished. Neuerthelesse, he speedily took order for the leuying of a great army; fortifying his cities and strong holds, leaving nothing vindone that was possible, for the assurance of his state. And to represse the fury of S. anderber. fent Seremet Baffa with fourteene thousand souldiers to lie vpon the borders of Epirus. with charge only to attend voon him. Who mindfull of his charge, came into Macedonia, to the city Ocrida, now called Alchria, in the very confines of Macedonia towards Epirus, and there lay with his army; some part thereof lodged in the city, and the rest in places more conuenient neere about the same.

The comming of the Bassa, as also the manner of his lying was not vnknown to Scanderbee 2 B who defired nothing more than to be doing with him. Wherefore he fecretly in the night marched towards Ocrida with twelve thousand fouldiers, and being come within three miles of the towne, lay close in ambush, & vpon the breaking of the day fent out 500 horsemen towards the enemy, under the conduct of Peicus Emanuel, and Petrus Angelus, two valiant and expert captains, to draw him if they could into the field. But Scanderbeg had before commanded them, that if the enemy did come forth to fight, they should make but small resistance, but retire back as if they had fled, and so to traine him on to the place where the army lay. Which was so well performed by the two skilfull captaines, that the Bassa with all his power was according as they could haue withed, drawn into the field, and brought to the very place where Standerbeg lay, who fuddenly rifing vp with all his atmy, affailed the Turks on every fide, and C flew them as Deere inclosed in a toyle. In this battell ten thousand of the Turks were flaine, Ten thousand of the Turks were flaine, Ten thousand the Treasurer of the army with twelve other of great mark were taken prisoners, and brought Turke flaine. bound to Scanderbeg, who were presently ransomed for forty thouland Duckats.

Scanderbeg having obtained the victory, returned with triumph into Epirus, dayly expe-Ging the comming of the great army out of Italy: But fatal Desting, the mighty controller of mens highest designes, had not so appointed. For when Pins the great Bishop had out of al parts of Christendome assembled a great army (whereof the greatest part were voluntary foldiers) and all things were now in such readines, that he had put himself vpon the way, and was come to Ancona, a city vpon the sea side (where Christophorus Maurus duke of Venice came vnto him, with ten gallies well appointed, to have accompanied him in those wars : and all men were now in D expectation of some great matter to have bin done) suddenly he fell sieke of a sever, and died in the yere 1464. Whereupon the army was forthwith dispersed, and all that great preparation frustrated, to the exceeding grief of many Christian Princes; and no lesse ioy of the Turks, who now reioyced to see themselves delivered of so great a feare. About this same time, Villor Capella chiese persuader of this warre betwixt the Venetians and the Turks, was by the Senat sent general of their forces at sea, in stead of Lauret ann, whose yeare was then expired. He having received the charge from Lauretanus, and fayling out of Eubœa, in (hort time tooke from the enemy the city of Aulis in Peloponesus ouer against Chalcis, and also the city of Larsum in the gulfe of Thessalonica, with the Isle of Himber: afterwards landing his men by night at Pyræus, he fuddenly furprifed the city of Athens (now E called Sethina) sometime the mother of learning, and most noble city of Grecia; and from thence carried away with him into Euboea all the people he there found, as his prisoners, together with the rich spoyle of that city. Whilst he lay in Euboca, he was persuaded that the city of Patras in Peloponesus would be deliucred to him by the Christians that dwelt therein, if hedid but shew himselfe before it. Wherupon he departed from Eub cea, and comming into the gulfe of Patras, landed foure thousand footmen under the leading of Barbaricus, and two hundred horsemen, of whom one Nicholaus Ragius was Captaine. Barbaricus marching toward Patras, was come within a mile of the city; when many of the horsemen, and of thevnruly mariners, disorderly scattering abroad, neglected the intended service, and sought after pillage all about the countrey. The Turks garrifons taking this opportunity, fet vpon them F with their horsemen, and so easily overthrew them, being scattered and out of order. At the The Ventilane first encounter, Barbaricus himselse was slaine; Ragtus Captaine of the horsemen was taken, and attempting to aliue empailed upon a sharp stake. Of all them that were landed, scarce a thousand were left, coince press losse who faued their lives by flying vnto the gallies. With this overthrow Villor the Venetian admirall was greatly discomforted, yet having conceived some hope of better successe, in few daies after attempted again to haue taken Patras, but with like hap as before : for hauing loft of a thousand of his men about the city, and the rest glad to take their flight to the fleet, he was constrained with great dishonor to depart thence. And so full of forrow and heavings return ning into Eubœa, oppressed with melancholy he there suddenly died.

The Venetians deceived of the great hope they had conceived of the general preparation made against the Turks, and much troubled with the hard proceeding of their wars against fo mighty an enemy; by their Embassadors solicited Matthias, not long before chosen King of Hungary to join in league with them, and to take up arms against the Common Enemie. offering presently to furnish him with a great sum of money, besides a large yearly pension for the better maintenance of those wars. For which he should to his power by land defend all their Territory betwixt the Rhetian Alps and the Adriatique, against the invasion of the H

This Matthias (fyrnamed Corvinus) was the yonger fon of the most famous Captaine to Huniades, whose elder brother Vladislass, a gentleman of such courage as might well shew whose ion he was, being not able to difgest the injuries and difgraces don vnto him and his brother, by Viricus County of Cilic, and vncle to Ladifians the yong king of Hungary and Bri hemia, for the despight hee alwaies bare unto their sather Huniades; slew the same Viriem at Alba-Regalis, euen in the Kings court. Which injury the yong King was glad for the prefent to wink at, and also to grant him pardon; as having taken away the man whose immode rat power wel flood not with the Kings fafety : but indeed fearing the citisens of Alba, & the men of war, who exceedingly favored the fons of Huniades for their fathers fake. For all that, I Ladiflaus returning into Bohemia, caufed both the fons of Huniades vpon the fudden to beat prehended, and most cruelly executed, Kladislaus, being then about twenty six years old Man this the yonger brother was kept in prison, expecting nothing els but to be partaker of his brothers hard fortune; as vindoubtedly, he had, had not Ladiflans the yong King upon the full den, as he was voon the top of his mariage with Magdalen the French Kings daughter, by me timely death bin taken away. After whose death, the Hungarians for the love they bare onto the remembrance of Huniades, by a military election chose this Matthias his yongest son, then Mulbia of a prisoner at Prague, to be, their King. Wherof Pogebrache (who after the death of Ladislam, of an old gouernor, had made himself the yong King of Bohemia) having speedy intelligence, Kief Hungary. as he was fitting at supper, sent for Matthias his prisoner, and when he was come, commanded K him to fit down at the upperend of the table: wherat the yong gentleman, being then but about 18 years of age, and fore abashed, began to craue pardon. But when the King would needs have it so, and that he was set, to quiet his troubled thoughts, hee willed him to bee of good cheer, for that he had good news to tel him. Good news (faid he) if it would please your Majesty to grant me liberty. Yea that (said the King) and more too; and then saluting himby the name of the King of Hungary, brake vnto him the whole matter, how that he was by the general consent of the Hungarians chosen their King. And so in sew dayes after, married to him his daughter: which done, he furnished him with all things fit for his estate, and royally accompanied him into Hungary, where hee was with great ioy and triumph received of the Hungarians, ouer whom he afterwards gloriously reigned for the space of 38 years. In which L time he notably inlarged the kingdom of Hungary, and became a far greater terror vnto the Turks, than euer was his father Huniades. And therwithall (which is not to be accounted in the least part of his praises) was alwaies a great fauorer and furtherer of good letters and ingenious deuises.

But to return again to our purpose. Matthias having wel considered of that the Venetians had requested; answered them, That they had many times before in like case resused to give aid to the Hungarian kings his predecessors: yea and that more was, thought it a thing not reasonable, that any such thing should be requested at their hands, for a smuch as they then receiued no harm from the Turk, but were in league and amity with him: so that the Hungarian Kings wanting their help, had many times received greater loffe from the Turk than other. M wise they should have don, if they had bin by them aided. Yet for all that, he was content to forget all such vokindnes, and to grant them what they had requested; promising the next Spring to innade the Turks Dominion, and according to their request to take into his protectionall their Territory betwixt the Rhetian Alps and the Adriatique, Which thing hee

A most honorably performed; for with the first of Spring he passed over Danubius at Belgrade with a puissant army, and rased the forts which the Turks had built therabout; and so entring into Servia, laydall the Country wast before him: and afterwards laden with spoil returned home, carrying away with him twenty thousand Captines. Neither so rested hee, but with great good fortune maintained great wars with Mahomet during all the time of his reigne, and afterward with his fon Bajazet alfo; wherein he most commonly returned with victoric. So that it is of him as truely as briefly written, That no Christian King or Chiefetaine did more often or with greater fortune fight against the Turkish Nation, or had of them greater victories.

Mahomet deliuered of the great fear he had before conceived, of the general preparation of the Christian princes against him, determined now to work his will upon such as were neerest vnto him, and afterward not to forget them that were farther off. The proceeding of Seanderbeg with the late overthrow of Seremet with his army in Epirus, fluck in his flomacke : in reuenge wherof, he now fent Balabames Badera a most valiant Captaine, with fifteen thousand Milhomet lends horimen and three thousand foot to inuade Epirus. This Balabanus was an Epirot borne, a Balabanus to Churles son of that country; who being of a boy taken captine by the Turks, as he was keeping his fathers cattel, and of long time brought up in seruitude among st them, framing him-Telf vnto their religion and manners, after long feruice got the credit of a good common foldier. But when as at the taking of Constantinople it was his fortune to be the first man of the Turks army that gained the top of the walls, and entred into the City; he was for that piece of service euer afterwards of Mahomet greatly esteemed and besides his other great preferments now fent Generall of his Army into Epirus: Who as foon as he was come to Alchria, (a City vpon the frontiers of that Country) fent many rich prefents vnto Scanderbeg, making thew as if he had bin defirous peaceably to die upon the borders committed to his charge. without further purpole to trouble his Country: yet indeed waiting for nothing more than fome notable opportunitie, suddenly to do him the greatest mischief he could. But Scanderbee well feeing into the malice of the man, rejected his feigned friendship and gifts, and in derision sent him a spade; a mattock, a shall, with other such instruments belonging vito Husbandry; willing him to take in hand those tools, and to follow his fathers course of life, and to leave the conducting of Amnies vnto men of greater skill and better place. Which dif-D grace Balabanus tooke mexceeding ouilt part; purpofing with himselfe, if ever it lay in his power, to be therof sharply reuenged. Wherfore knowing that Scanderbeg with a smal power lay not fat off upon the borders of his Kingdom, hee determined fuddenly in the night to fet vpon him before hewas aware of his comming; and so if it were possible to overthrow him. But Scanderbee having knowlege therof by his Scouts, fet forward in good order to have met him. When Balabanus perceiuing that he was discouered, staid upon the way, and incamped Balabanus goes within two miles of Standerbeg, who had then in his army but four thousand horsemen, and against Scau. and one thousand and fine hundred foot, but all choise men, and most expert souldiers, and then lay in a large pleasant Vally called Valchel; at the farther end wherof Balabanus lay also incamped, neer unto a fough and wooddy hill which inclosed that part of the vally. Whilst A both Armies thus lay within view one of another, Scanderbeg well confidering the ground the Enemy had taken, and that it was like he would offer him battel, with cheerfull speeches encouraged his fouldiers: fireightly charging them upon pain of his displeasure, That if the Enemy woon the fortune of the bartell should chance to fly or to retyre, they should not in any case pursue them farther than the streights of the hil wherby the enemy lay. Ghessing too truly, that he would in so convenient a place leave part of his Army in amoush, as a sure refuge to trult vnto, whatfoeuer thould befall: Withen he hadehus endouraged and instructed his fouldiers, he rose with his Army', and in good order retyred vnto the rising of an hill, which was a good way behind the place where he before lay; of purpose to haue the aduantage of the ground, if the Enemy should follow to give him battell. Balabanus seeing him

F tetyre, and the small number of his army, thought verily that he had fled for sear: and there-

thinking vpon to great aduantage to have found no great relitance, followed after Sounderbeg

as if they had had him in chase; and by that time they were come vnto the place where hee

The hattell be- ers nothing difmayed with the hafty comming and hideous clamour of the Turks, received G them with great courage; so that there began a fierce battell, with much slaughter on both fides, which for a good while flood doubtfull. Yet fuch was the inuincible courage of Sean derbeas resolute soldiers, that the Turks (who as then fought in great disorder) were at last our to flight, and with much flaughter chased vnto the streights of the mountain, where Scanders beg had before commanded his men to stay. But certain of his best and principall Captains forgetting what he had faid to them, and led on (whether with the heat and fury of the battel or rather with inevitable destiny, is hard to say) vnaduisedly pursued the enemy into those Streights, wherof they were by Scanderbeg before warned, and charged that they should not enter: where they were on every fide befet by their enemies; arifing out of an ambush and after they had a long time desperatly fought as wild beafts inclosed with Hunters, at the last H oppressed with multitude, were together taken and brought to Balabauss, by whom they were forthwith fent to Mahomet to Constantinople. Who as soon as he heard of their taking is reported with great rejoicing to haue faid, Now am I fure that the strength of Scanderbee is broken. The names of the principal men which were there taken, was Mofes Golemus of Dibra, the greatest Captain of Epirus next vnto Scanderbeg himself; Giuriza Vladerius, Scanders beg his Kinfman : Musachine, Scanderbeg his Nephew by his fifter Angelina ; Ginius Musachine. Ioannes Perlatus, who valiantly defended Sfetigrade against Amurath; Nicolaus Berifius, Gen: gius Chucca, and Ginius Manefius: wherof every one of them was able to have conducted a great Army, and might worthily have bin accounted among ft the greatest Captaines of that Age. The taking of these worthy men brought such a generall forrow and heavinesse youn 1 Epirus, that the victory was nothing accounted of euery man lamenting the loffe of fuction table Leaders. Scanderbeg carefull of their deliverance presently fent an Embassadour vnto Mahomet, requesting that he might redeem his prisoners, wither by exchanging of others for them, or els for such ransom as it should please him to set down. But hee knowing them to be Scanderbeg his best Captains, would neither exchange them for others, nor grant that they Motor of other should be ransomed for any gold. But after he had vied them with all the despitht that hee could imagin, caused them all by little and little to be flain quicke; in which miserable topment they lived fifteen dayes, and so died. Scanderbeg hearing therof, was therwithrather in couraged than any way discouraged; and in reuenge thereof, with fire and sword entred into the Turks Dominions, sparing nothing that hee could of the burn, or possibly by any other K

Mahomet glad of the taking of these notable men (although they were bought with the lives of many of his people) commended Balabanus highly, as the only man who knew how to fight against Scanderbee; and in reward of his good service sent him divers rich gifts, with commandment to repair again his Army, & to proceed in his wars so happily begun. Which thing Balabanus with all diligence performed. Yet trusting more to his policie when to his ftrength, lying at Alchria, sent again divers rich presents to Scandenbedias desirous to limin peace by him; but feeking indeed to bring him into fecuritie, & fo fuddenly (if it were polfible) to intrap him, Which thing Scanderbeg well perceiuing rejected his feigned friendship together with his presents, as sent from a base pesant. Whereupon Balabanas entred into L new deuice, and by feeret means with great rewards corrupted sounderhegs feours, whereof fome were Balabanus his kinfmen, though it were to Scanderbeg ynknown . By which practile he had in the night vpon the sudden oppressed scanderate, lying incampod at Oronychium, it Scanderbeg himselfe (who commonly spent most part of the night in careful watch) going about the Camp, had not in the Glonce of the night a far off perceived the comming of the enemy by the noise of his horses; and therupon with wonderfull celeritie putting his army in fuch order as he best could, was ready to receive him, and at last after a great fight put him to flight, and having him in chale, flew most part of his army, Balabanus himself with a smalten nant hardly escaping.

Now when Mahamet vinderstood that Balabanus was ouerthrowness; and his Army loss, M he was indoubt whether to fend another Generall, or els to proue again the fortune of the old. But after he had wel confidered, that Balabanus was a right valiant Captain, and one that well knew the Countrey of Epirus, and withall a mortall enemy vnto Scanderbeg, he resolued wholly to stay upon him, and not to fend any other. So committing to his charge fourteene

A thousand horsmen and three thousand foot, sent him again to inuade Epirus; and the more to encourage him, promifed to make him King of that country, if he could fubdue Scanderbee, Bulabanus with his army comming to Alchria, and still in vaine plotting how he might circumuent his wary enemy; after his wonted manner sent divers presents to Scanderbee; which he still scornefully refused. Three months he lay still at Alchris, with nothing more troubled than with his own thoughts: but finding nothing that pleased himselfe, he determined to aduenture by plaine force to subdue him. And vpon that resolution marched with all his army The barrell of into the great plains neere vnto Sfetigrade, whither Scanderbeg came with his army also, which in stellars to the state of then confifted of eight thousand horsmen and fifteen hundred foot; with which small power nos and Scanherefuled not to joyne battell with Balabanus, being in number two to one. But after they derbig B were come to handy blows, to have seene Scanderbeg his men fight, a man would have thought them rather to have beene raging Lyons than men, they fo furiously affailed their enemies. without regard of perill or danger, as men nothing afraid to die. Scanderieg with great skill gouerned that battell, carefully prouiding for every danger: himfelfe valiantly fighting in the head of this battell, but not without care of the rest, still sending in speedy reliefe where most need was, and bringing in fresh supplies in stead of them that were wounded or slaine, performed all the parts of a most worthy chiefetaine and valiant soldier: where most perill was, there was he streight, and at his presence danger fled, as if victory had attended your him. But whilest he thus fought in the midst of his enemies, his horse fortuned to be slaine under him. and falling downe with him, fore bruifed one of his armes, whereof he complained long time C after. The Turks feeing him downe, pressed on fiercely to have slaine him: but he was quickly rescued by his own souldiers and remounted. And forthwith encountering with one Suliman. a great commander in the Turks army, flew him in fight hand to hand : whereupon fuch a terrour fell vpon the Turks, that they began to retire, and after a while to betake them elues to plaine flight. Scanderbeg pursuing them with such execution, that of that great army few escaped with Balabanus to carry newes home.

Balabanus now thrice vanquished by Scanderbeg, and in the last battell having lost what he could loofe, except he should have lost himselfe, returned to Mahomet at Constantinople, of whom he was sharply rebuked for the great ouerthrowes he had so often received. At which time Balabanus at first gaue place to the Kings sury : but afterward when the heat was ouer, he D with a large discourse cunningly excused himselse, imputing all these mishaps voto the appointment of God, and the fortune of war : and in the end told Mahomet plainly, That it was but in vaine to fend such small armies into Epirus. But if it would please him at once to send two valiant captaines with a puissant and strong army, who dividing the same betwiet them. & entering at one time into divers parts of Epirus, might spoile the country before them, and enclose Scanderbee betwixt them, if he should adventure to give either of them battell; being before resolved neither of them to offer him battell, or yet to accept of the same being by him offered, except the other were also at hand: and so by mutuall consent to vndertake him, but neuer fingle. By which course he promised vnto him an easie and affured victory: for as much as it were impossible for any man so beset, and as it were on every side coupt vp with his ene-E mies, either to escape or yet to make any great resistance. This persuasion of Balabanus so well fitted the Tyrants humor, that he appointed Balabanus himselfe to be the man to put his own deuise in execution: giuing him commission to leavy such an army as he should think sufficient for the performance of that service: and withall to associat vnto himselfe for his companion which focuer of his captaines he pleafed. Balabanus according to his commission, tooke musters of the men of war, and made choice of forty thousand good souldiers, and chose one lacup Arnauth (otherwise called lames the Epirot, because he was also borne in Epirus, a valiant captaine) to be his companion : whom he fent with fixteene thousand foldiers by the way of Theffalia and Grecia into Epirus, commanding him in no case to joine battel with Scanderbeg, vntill he himselse were also come into the country with the other part of the army. And F so setting both forward, Balabanus taking the necret way through Thracia and Macedonia, came first into Epirus with twenty thousand horsemen and source thousand foot, and encamped in the vally of Valchall. Scanderbeg both by his espials and letters from his secret friends in the Turks court, having certaine intelligence of all Balabanus his intent and purpose, had in readinesse against his comming a strong army of eight thousand horsemen and source thou-
